As many hon. Members wish to speak in the debate, I shall not repeat the comments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, East——

Mr. Mason: Barnsley, Central.

Mr. McGuire: I apologise to my right hon. Friend. Since the general election there have not been many points on which to fix. We used to remember the names of constituencies. My right hon. Friend mentioned the catalogue of interference by the Government, including their overturning of long-established rights to social security benefits to put pressure on miners and to persuade them that it was their fault that their families did not receive those benefits.

[Mr. McGuire]

Before I come to the central issue, I should say why I believe the Government's hands are not clean and why I believe that they have plotted the dispute for a long time. We warned the Government what might happen when they were contemplating appointing Mr. MacGregor as chairman of the NCB. It is odd that they appointed a man in his mid-70s when the age profile in the industry is that there are hardly any miners aged more than 58 and most top managers leave when they are 60. As my right hon. Friend said, Mr. MacGregor was appointed to help to take on the National Union of Mineworkers. He has been a disaster. Do hon. Members recall disputes in any of our great industries, nationalised or not, when the chairman of that industry did not defend his own arguments? To use a common expression, he has made such a cock-up of it that the coal board has had to use men of much inferior rank—men who are not even on the main board—to defend the NCB's case.

Time and again the Government have condemned Mr. Scargill for his obstinacy in saying that he would discuss anything except pit closures. Ministers and media spokesmen have said that Mr. Scargill's obstinacy stopped them getting round the table and settling the dispute. But that has changed. Nothing could be more fair than a trade union, which has been involved in a bitter dispute for 11 months, saying, "We will get round the table but only if there are no preconditions." The Government have seized the chance to say that they want something which no union would permit: the drawing up of an agenda before getting round the table. The Secretary of State was twisting and wriggling on this point. The NUM has said that it will talk without preconditions. It is the Government who say that there must be preconditions—something against which they railed during the past few months.

The Government have dirty hands. They want the strike to continue for the simple reason that if there are no talks, the drift back to work will continue. However, I should warn the Government that, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central and others have said, NACODS is deeply worried about the Government's position and will soon seek an assurance from the coal board on this matter. It will not be made a tool of the Government. If NACODS had gone on strike in October, the dispute would have taken a different turn—better for the miners and worse for the Government. The Government must not push their luck too far. Fair-minded people believe that they are trying to screw the NUM to the floor. They are trying to destroy the union.

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): And the communities and families.

Mr. McGuire: That is being done at the expense of people who have endured much for many months. Advantage will be taken of them by starvation and other methods in the hope that they will give up the struggle and go back to work.

The Government have repeatedly said that it is up to the coal board and the NUM to get together, so let them get together. Let us have an end to this strike. If they get round the table, the strike will be settled on fair and honourable terms.

Before any hon. Member starts chirping about the history of pit closures, I shall agree that they have happened. I want to tell some of the young Turks on the Conservative Benches something. In 1957, when I was a pit secretary, we closed pits, but there were then men in the industry who were over 80. We brought in a scheme so that they could retire at 70, and then so that they could retire at 65. We then got a reasonable redundancy payment scheme. However, in those days we were trying to find the statistics to prove that unemployment had gone above the magical 500,000 total figure. In other words, unemployment was at a piffling level. There may have been areas with 3 or 6 per cent. unemployment, but the average unemployment level in the country was 2·5 per cent. Today, there is a vastly different proposition, and in some areas the unemployment level is 40 or 50 per cent.

Pits may be closed because accountants say that they should be but, with the movement of the dollar and oil prices, they may become profitable again. I remember my right hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central saying that at one stage three pits in his area had been on the margin, and the coal board wanted to close them, but they became profitable because of the movement in oil prices. As a result, they were kept open, and communities were kept going. With that background in mind, one can understand the reluctance of miners to say that pits can be closed if accountants think that they are worth closing.

There is now an understanding on this matter, and I urge the Government to take advantage of it. If they do not, and if, as it seems, they want to humiliate the NUM, they will be making a big mistake. They will find out that the public will not stand for it. More importantly, the union most concerned—NACODS—will not stand for it. Such behaviour will rally other trade unions as well as the public to the support of the NUM, and this dispute will become even more bitter. I urge the Government to take this chance. They should get their hands off the matter and let the NUM and NCB get round the table. If they do, I believe that we can have an honourable settlement.

5.12 pm

Mr. David Lightbown (Stafferdshire, South-East): It may be helpful if I begin by setting out my credentials in the mining industry. I was first associated with this industry in the mid-1950s. In those days, there were 650,000 people employed in the industry and hand-cutting and loading were still taking place in most areas. Ponies were still hauling tubs. In those days, I was part of a mine mechanisation organisation, which introduced modern cutting, winding, decking and handling equipment, and this job took me to all the major coalfields in the United Kingdom.

The changes that have taken place over the past 30 years in the industry have resulted in improved productivity, safety and working conditions and earning levels for those still employed. Many hundreds of millions of pounds have been invested in the industry, but many pits have been closed, and the work force is now down to about 200,000. Although this radical change in the industry has occasionally caused local problems, they have generally been resolved by common sense and consultation until now.

The effects of this lunatic strike on the industry, the community and the individual have been disastrous—and for what? It has been to support the politically motivated leadership of the NUM, which has little regard for the industry and none for its membership. This dispute should never have started. Indeed, it would not have started had union procedures been followed and a ballot allowed.

The dispute could have been settled on a perfectly honourable basis five months ago, with the acceptance of the NACODS agreement, but it still goes on. This is mainly due to the impossible demands of the NUM leader and a few of his Marxist friends, and some Labour Members. The temptation to prolong Mr. Scargill's torment is almost irresistible, as a price that he should pay for the violence and damage that he has encouraged rent-a-mob to wreak on the individuals, communities and industry that he purports to represent.

The dispute still needs to be resolved in the interests of the industry and the vast majority of decent, honest miners — miners such as those living in my county and constituency, who have continued to work throughout the dispute despite the intimidation, and those miners who continue to stay out because of intimidation. It is more desirable that we have a negotiated settlement, but if that is not to be, then we must ask the NCB to hold out to the bitter end. There can be no concessions on the issue of who manages the industry, and we must maintain the historic consultation and closure procedures that have always existed in the industry, so that pits can be closed on grounds of economy as well as safety and exhaustion.

There can be no concessions to those who have been found guilty of sabotage, and of violence towards the individual, who have already been dismissed from the industry. However, the odd mistake may have occurred and an independent body such as ACAS may be helpful to both sides in solving this aspect of the dispute.

The coal board should increase its funding for the new enterprise company, which will provide finance, advice and accommodation for new businesses in any mining community adversely affected by closure. This was done by the British Steel Corporation when its closure programme went through. Although some said that that programme would desecrate whole communities, it has not. One has only to look at the progress made in towns such as Corby to realise that.

The NACODS offer is still on the table. If an offer based on that plus the additional suggestions that I have made proves still to be unacceptable to the leadership of the NUM, the dispute can be resolved only by the men in the industry. They will need to settle it by returning to work and purging their Marxist leadership. It is also important that the more sensible Labour Members, who have made genuine efforts to help rather than hinder the resolution of this appalling strike, should come off the fence and tell the divided work force that loyalty and solidarity are acceptable only if its leadership is right and its cause just.

I remind the House that this dispute has damaged and affected industries and individuals in the mining supply and equipment companies. Over the past 10 months, they have endured short-time working, lay-offs and redundancies. There have been no guaranteed jobs, no large lump sum payments for employees and no Govenment subsidies for their companies, some of which are now near to collapse.

This unnecessary and unconstitutional strike has damaged the economy, damaged allied industries, damaged communities and divided families. Above all, it has done permanent damage to the industry itself. The lasting geological and mechanical failures now occurring on a day-to-day basis will ensure that some coal faces and even whole pits are never worked again. The events at the Frances and Seafield collieries, announced today, are but two examples. If there is not an early return to work there will be no jobs available in the industry.

I pay tribute to and thank those people associated with ensuring the safety and the rights of my constituents and those of a like mind. Their actions have enabled them to get to their places of work when the picket violence has been at its worst. I commend especially the men of the Staffordshire police force and those policemen brought into the county on secondment to assist in this unpleasant and arduous duty.

5.21 pm

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): I wish to return immediately, and I hope briefly, to the central issue of today's debate, which has already been pressed so effectively by my right hon. Friends the Members for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) and for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason): how are we to get a settlement of the dispute?

It may be that we are quite near the possibility of a settlement. A week ago, there were unofficial discussions between representatives of the National Coal Board and the National Union of Mineworkers. The discussions pointed the way ahead, and both sides came away from them thinking that there was some hope. By the end of the week that hope has been dashed and, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central reminded us, the NCB representatives were saying that they themselves had broken off negotiations for the first time in the dispute. Many of us might question that latter claim, because we believe that they broke off negotiations on previous occasions.

What happened during the week? A document was issued, which said that the president, the general secretary and the executive of the NUM had to sign an undertaking before they came to the negotiations. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Salford, East said, that was an intolerable demand, and it was that demand which broke the discussions. However the Secretary of State may wriggle, that is the fact.

The Government claim that that document was originally issued by the NCB and that they only supported it on television and in the other ways that they did in the last few days of last week. Whichever way it happened, it does not alter the fact that it was the issue of that ultimatum to the NUM which broke the negotiations. It is impossible for the Government to deny that.

I have a question for the NCB and the Secretary of State for Energy. Before they decided to issue that document which wrecked the possibility of negotiations, did they consult anyone? Did they consult ACAS, for example? ACAS knows more about negotiations of this kind than the whole Cabinet rolled into one—and that is not a very big compliment. But did they consult ACAS? If they did, let them tell the country what ACAS said about the possibility of such a document being issued in such a negotiation at such a time. My guarantee is that if they had gone to ACAS and asked for advice, unofficially or in any other way, ACAS would have told them that such a demand was intolerable, especially at such a sensitive moment in the industrial dispute, and it would have told them that it would wreck the negotiations.

Let us have a clear answer. Did the Secretary of State and the NCB consult ACAS about whether that was an advisable course? If they did not, they were acting in a way that was not in accord with their duties as a Minister and a board pretending to try to settle the dispute. Did they ask ACAS whether such a document should be issued? More particularly, did the NCB ask ACAS before issuing it? Let us have a clear answer to that, if we cannot have clear answers to other questions.

It may be that the board consulted the spokesmen of NACODS on the matter. That would have been a sensible course. The board has an agreement with one union in the industry, which it claims throughout the country is a very good agreement. If the board was really trying to make an agreement with another union and it wondered how the two might affect each other, surely it would have been sensible to ask NACODS, even unofficially, what would be the effect of issuing such a document? If the board had done that, we know what the answer would have been. If it had gone to NACODS, with which the board had signed an agreement, NACODS would have told the board immediately not to do anything so foolish because it would wreck the negotiations.

The truth is that the Government and the NCB together wrecked the negotiations last week, and the Opposition say that today's debate can re-open negotiations by the simple method of getting the Government to withdraw the document. We demand to know why the Government will not do it. Ministers may say that one of the difficulties comes from the NCB, and there are difficulties from the board, especially when it is conducted by its present chairman.

On Sunday there was a report in The Observer of what was being said not only by people in the NUM and not only by Members of Parliament representing mining constituencies but by members of the board. One of the features of this industrial dispute has been the near chaos prevailing in the NCB itself. Its members have never had a clear idea, partly because of the way Mr. MacGregor conducts the board. He does not consult people properly —even members of his own board.

On Sunday, The Observer discussed what was wrecking the negotiations, and it mentioned the possibility of their being re-opened. Having stated the position, The Observer report ended:

"Many senior managers in the Coal Board continue to advise a conciliatory attitude in talks, fearing that a disorganised end to the strike would have serious long-term consequences for the industry."

All of us who know the industry, as we in South Wales do, for example, could give the names of the people in the NCB who are associated with the management and who take that view. The Observer concluded:

"Their advice is receiving little response from Mr. Ian Macgregor, the board Chairman."

So there are those in the NCB who say, "Let us have a conciliatory attitude"—which, of course, would mean withdrawing the ultimatum. Apparently, they are saying it in vain. Some of us are not surprised about that.

It appears that Mr. MacGregor has been taking advice from some very strange people. Who employs Mr. David Hart, for example? Is he paid by the NCB? Is he paid by Conservative Central Office? Possibly he is paid by The Times. The Opposition would like to know who pays him, because apparently he has been advising all three to call off any negotiations and to wreck any negotiations which may start, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Salford, East underlined.

We want to know from the Government whether they will now override Mr. MacGregor if he again insists on the document which is the obstacle to negotiations.

We could go back over the past discussion of the strike. It is a very different story from the one given by the Secretary of State. There is a very different account of what happened at the beginning at Cortonwood and at the time of the earlier closures, especially in the light of the way that the Prime Minister goes up and down the country parroting the suggestion that the sole cause of the dispute is an insistence by the NUM that there shall be no closures on economic grounds. That is not the case. The Minister shakes his head. He has discovered his head, if not his voice, when dealing with my questions. The NUM made a statement in the middle of last week which was examined by the labour editor of The Times, who is not always favourable to the NUM. The article said:

"Mr. Scargill was adamant that his 'peace plan' was the basis for negotiations to end the strike. His letter two days ago proposed: A review of the Plan for Coal 1974. The board has offered that."

The second proposal was the issue on which talks partly broke down before the Government and the NCB issued the document. It was, according to The Times:

"Reversion to the pre-March 6, 1984, colliery review procedure."

That is what the NUM insisted on. By doing that, it was merely upholding what had prevailed before. The article continued:

"The board says that cannot be accepted because it does not contain any reference to the economics of the collieries."

The NCB is refusing to accept proposals by the NUM for the maintenance of the pre-6 March position. Going deeper into the dispute, one discovers that it is what happened on 6 March that changed everything. How many times have we had to listen to the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Energy going through all their rigmarole about how many pits were closed under the previous procedures? These are the previous procedures —which the Government tore up.

The tale was rather different in the early days of the dispute. The Government were not intervening then, were they? How many months did we have to listen to the tale of combined fraud and deceit from Ministers that they were not intervening? If they had intervened, the dispute could have been stopped before it started. Many of us have claimed that if the Department of Employment had not been shut down by the Prime Minister, it would have known before 6 March that such proposals would cause a strike. For months the Government said that they were not intervening. They said that they were leaving it all to the Coal Board. Are they intervening now or are they not? Which is it this week? Perhaps they are doing a bit of both — not intervening on Monday and Tuesday but intervening on Friday and Saturday. That is what it looks like from how, last week, the Prime Minister's claque was sent in to destroy any chance of a decent, honourable agreement.

The House is telling the Government that it demands that decent and honourable negotiations be started. That means the withdrawal of the document which was issued last week. Negotiations can then start. The House and the country need people not to stand up to Arthur Scargill, as Conservative Members so often shriek, but to stand up to the Prime Minister and tell her that we shall not have matters settled by her dictation.

5.33 pm

Mr. Jim Lester (Broxtowe): I agree with part of the final statement made by the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot). There should be honourable and decent negotiations on an agenda that deals with the causes of the dispute and the reasons behind our having 11 months of misery.

As my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House has said, there are no winners in the dispute. Those who talk about victory and defeat do not understand the serious consequences of events during the past 11 months. I have tried hard to enable sensible people to meet to settle the dispute and I utterly reject the caricature of a Machiavellian plot by the Government to destroy the NUM and the mining industry, as suggested by the right hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason). If there were such a planned attack, the leader of the NUM would have had no hesitation in calling a ballot on 8 March. If such a plot had been so obvious, the leader of the NUM would have secured a majority. If the plot was so obvious, why did the Nottingham area, which was balloted, reject that interpretation by a majority of 75 per cent.? Moreover, there were two national ballots on pit closures.

Today's debate was not intended to raise the political temperature or to continue negotiations by the media, which have bedevilled the dispute. The last thing that we required was a word-by-word and nuance-by-nuance examination by the media. We have an industrial problem in traditional industries, especially extracting industries.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): With regard to the Government's long-standing policy, has the hon. Gentleman not heard of the Ridley report of 1978, which was leaked to The Economist? It revealed the strategy that the Government later adopted against the miners. The whole thing was laid out in that report. It is clear that even before the Conservatives got into office they were preparing plans to attack the NUM.

Mr. Lester: It all depends on how the Ridley report is interpreted. I interpret it as a means of preventing might from being right in an industrial dispute. Mr. Scargill perfected that strategy at the Saltley cokeworks, to which he often refers, where he used mass picketing to force the Government to give way through pressure and blackmail. He chose not to argue a reasoned case.

The level of production has varied from a peak of 270 million tonnes in 1914 to levels set under "Plan for Coal", because production must relate to the market and what we can use. Moreover, most Opposition Members who have worked down the pits know that when a pit is sunk, its life can be calculated to within five or six years.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): I am a geologist and have been involved in the mining industry. I assure the hon. Gentleman that it is not possible to predict the life of any colliery as he has suggested. Its life can depend on circumstances that change from day to day, such as strange geological conditions. The NUM has never resisted colliery closures when the winning of coal is difficult or likely to cause danger to its members.

Mr. Lester: I entirely accept that geological conditions can change. However, the hon. Gentleman must accept that before anyone makes a massive investment, as we did in Nottinghamshire at Cotgrave, there is a great deal of drilling and the extent of the coal reserves are assessed. Cotgrave pit is expected to last about 65 years.

We must consider the end of the life of older pits. There are plenty in Nottinghamshire and we have been through that procedure enough times. In the last years of a pit there are high production costs, unacceptably difficult conditions for miners and a real risk of additional subsidence and associated costs.

We have already been through this procedure. When we last looked at the future of one of the uneconomic pits in my area, the cost of working the two faces proved to be unacceptable in terms of working conditions for the men and subsidence problems for the community. The bill has increased. The losses made at that pit mean that other pits in the area have had to carry it. It has been producing coal that is not required. There is a logic to the closure of uneconomic pits over and above geology and exhaustion.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Can the hon. Member comment upon allocated expenditure, in particular the allocated expenditure referred to in the article that appeared in the January edition of Accountancy? It showed in relation to Cortonwood that the equivalent of £11 per tonne would have to be transferred elsewhere if Cortonwood were closed and that if it were kept open the cost to the coal board would be £5 per tonne less than closure. Are not questions relating to allocated costs and economic pits relevant to this argument?

Mr. Lester: Yes, indeed, and we have already agreed a formula for looking at that kind of argument. In my hearing the Government have offered to reopen Cortonwood and to put it through those procedures. There is also the problem of producing specialist coal that cannot be used because there is no market for it. Certain types of coal are produced that cannot be used in power stations. We have to import specialist coal for certain purposes because we do not produce that type of coal. The Government's record in terms of obtaining high production at low cost is good. There has been investment in new collieries and in new coal faces. No other Government have ever invested so heavily in the future of high production and coal faces.

Mr. Alec Woodall (Hemsworth): The Government have not opened a new pit in the last five years.

Mr. Lester: The hon. Gentleman is not correct. The Government have approved the opening of pits in the Vale of Belvoir, and in Nottinghamshire the Government have provided most of the new investment. Only when we produce coal at less than the current national average price shall we be able to attack those markets to which the Opposition refer. The fact is that before the strike began we were exporting double the coal production that we needed to import. Many Conservative Members who have spoken in coal debates during the last 10 years have pointed to the value of the European market and how essential it is for Britain to get into it. We can get into that market only if we produce coal at an economic price.

How do we deal with the problem of high-cost production that is in excess of our needs? This strike was totally unnecessary to deal with that problem. During the miners' strike the agreement with NACODS has been reached. It has provided an opportunity for a third party to assess the kind of problems to which the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) referred, the social consequences. I can think of no other industry in which management is prepared to accept a third party assessment of the facts before it reaches a final decision. Not even the Church of England is prepared to accept that kind of third party assessment before it decides to close a church in one of its parishes.

I am second to none in wanting to ensure that no community suffers because its sole employer has had to close down business. The new enterprise company is in existence to meet the needs of the few but very important communities that need help.

It is clear from the NUM proposals and from the actions of the Government that the system of redundancies and retirement could be refined to deal with the excess manpower in a perfectly reasonable way when men genuinely want to leave the industry on a voluntary basis. Having done a 31 to 35 year stint in the industry, who would deny that to those men? This could be worked out between sensible and reasonable men. However, what is so sad to Conservative Members who support the industry is the overwhelming evidence that this industrial problem has been turned into a major political dispute by the deliberate misuse of the NUM rule book.

The Nottinghamshire miners are not Tories. They will not support the Conservative party. The Nottinghamshire miners have not supported the Tory party against their national executive. They have supported their own deep instincts for democracy, for the rule book and for their union. They are very conscious of the effect that this damaging dispute has had upon their own lives, upon their own industry and upon their own union and also upon the long-term energy needs of this country.

If one looks back to what happened during the discussions on 6, 7 and 8 March, my understanding is that on 6 March the meeting with the coal board did not end in controversy. It ended with both sides agreeing to go to the Government to find out what additional investment was available to deal with this problem. However, between 6 and 8 March a variety of events occurred. By 8 March—we read it in the Sunday Telegraph and there is no reason to believe that the man who wrote the article——

Mr. Heffer: Who paid him for that?

Mr. Lester: Whether he was paid or not does not alter the fact that he recorded what happened at that meeting. What happened at that meeting was a total abuse of rule 41 and what it was drafted for. The ballot that would have legitimised the strike was not held. If a ballot had been held no Conservative Member could have argued against the strike. No Nottinghamshire miner would have balloted individually if a national ballot had been held and the call for a strike had been won. They would have come out on strike, as they have honoured totally the overtime ban that was legitimately and democratically arrived at.

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): I am interested to hear that if there had been a ballot Conservative Members would not have argued against the strike. Does the hon. Member recall that in 1974 the Secretary of State was going up and down the country condemning the miners, even though there had been a ballot?

Mr. Lester: We should not have argued against the result of a legitimate ballot, held nationally, and neither would the miners. What also happened on 8 March was that the executors of the funds of the NUM were changed from the original executors to Mr. McGahey and Mr. Peter Heathfield. On that day the NUM funds were moved. It is very difficult to convince any reasonable person that the NUM—or, indeed the board of GEC—could plot at that meeting the movement of those funds so successfully. Those funds moved to the Isle of Man and then to Dublin and to New York. They came back as bearer bonds to Jersey where they were put into a private aeroplane and flown to Luxembourg. Which hon. Member is going to tell me that that was done spontaneously?

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): Does my hon. Friend agree that it is something of an irony that the NUM has been able to move its funds freely around the world out of the reach of the courts of this land as a result of the abolition of exchange control by this Government, which the Opposition are asking to be reintroduced?

Mr. Lester: I do not expect the NUM would claim that that casts credit upon it. My point is that there was a plan to promote a political strike without using the NUM rule book. The plan was to move NUM funds because it was recognised that they might be at risk. Nobody is going to tell me that that was not well thought out long before 6 March. Nottinghamshire has continued to behave totally democratically and within the rule book. Nottinghamshire has held elections for branch official. Far from the sinister use of Mr. David Hart, whoever he might be——

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Who is he?

Mr. Lester: I have heard of him and I can tell the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) that the Nottinghamshire miners I have spoken to have no connection with him, or any time for him. However, when one looks for sinister things under stones one neglects the truth. The truth is that the Nottinghamshire working miners group came into existence when Colin Clark, an elected official, went one Friday afternoon to the solicitor who had handled his house purchase and conveyance, put on his desk the NUM rule book and said, "I need some help because I am sure that what is happening is wrong." It was from that moment that the Nottinghamshire miners formed their own group and elected branch officials. The president of the NUM now acknowledges that everything the Nottinghamshire miners have done is legal and legitimate.

That was not the case when he tried to bring in rule 51 and said that no Nottinghamshire miner would ever work again. But he has since found that what was done was legal and legitimate and that is great credit to them. Far from support from secret Tory party funds or whatever, over 6,000 individual contributions were made to the working miners' committee. That does not rank with any secret fund. They are all published and all available.

Mr. Barron: I am interested in the hon. Gentleman's point that the working miners' committee in Nottinghamshire has no political connections and that it was just composed of people who felt that the NUM rule book was not being operated correctly. Is the hon.

Gentleman aware that the Nottinghamshire-based working miners' committee held meetings in the Yorkshire coalfield with a Conservative Member?

Mr. Lester: I have news for the hon. Gentleman. Only last week a contingent of Yorkshire working miners, the vice-president, the secretary and representatives of several pits, had a meeting with me. I was pleased to meet them. I am pleased to meet anybody who applies to see me to talk about the future of an industry for which I have a great concern. But any suggestion that any Conservative Member has promoted anything or worked with or been consulted by anybody other than when they have been requested so to do is utterly wrong and completely without foundation.

When history comes to be written my version will be closer to the truth than some of what we have heard from Opposition Members. We need a negotiated settlement on the key issue of how to deal with surplus production in a reasonable, civilised and proper way, with a real respect for the people in the industry who have lived and worked in it, and those communities which have supported it.

The legacy with which we are currently involved is one of deep distrust at every level of the industry. The only way in which we shall start to deal with that deep distrust is if we have a clean and honourable end to the strike so that people can get back to refashioning a vital industry in the modern way that it deserves.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): The hon. Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester) has pointed out some home truths to the House about this debate and for that reason we should welcome the opportunity that it gives us to do just that. We regret the fact that although the dispute has been going on for almost a year now the House has had only two opportunities to debate it, despite its importance and the impact that it is having on the country. Time in the House is allocated by the Government and the Labour party and they have not chosen to debate this vital topic and to provide what should be the national forum for such debates with an opportunity to discuss the matter properly.

There is no doubt that the dispute is a tragedy for Britain. It is a personal tragedy for those who are directly involved and whose families are suffering the hardship of not having an income and who are without the means to keep body and soul together for so long. It is a tragedy for the nation because Britain's economy has been adversely affected by the dispute and therefore industry and our personal lives have suffered. Thirdly, it is a tragedy for the coal industry because a potentially great industry, which could have been of enormous service to Britain over the past year, has been substantially damaged by the dispute, and it will take many years for the industry and all its ancillary parts to recover.

I was pleased to hear what the Secretary of State said this afternoon about the recent boost to NCB Enterprises Ltd, both by the appointment of staff and additional resources. We on these Benches welcome what he said. We noted with satisfaction the right hon. Gentleman's undertaking that more funds would be forthcoming for NCB Enterprises Ltd. if they were needed.

However, it has taken the Government a great deal of time to recognise the need for the establishment of NCB Enterprises Ltd. My right hon. Friend the leader of the Social Democratic party proposed the establishment of that body back in March. It took the Government until August to establish it and it took them until now to start taking it seriously and to provide the resources for it to do the job properly. The Government must bear responsibility not just for that but for providing a background against which Mr. Scargill and his friends in the NUM could thrive and bring the dispute to the point that they have.

The Government have not handled the situation well. Against a background of 4 million people unemployed, the rundown of industry and some mishandling of negotiations during the dispute, they have played into Mr. Scargill's hands by providing him with fertile ground on which to plough his furrow and obtain the support of Britain's mineworkers. The Government must bear some of the responsibility for the state of affairs during the past nine months and for the present difficulties.

But that does not excuse what the NUM and its leadership have been doing during the dispute, and, indeed, the way in which it was brought about. There was no ballot at the start of the dispute as there should have been if the traditions and rules of the NUM had been properly followed. What the hon. Member for Broxtowe said about balloting is right. The country and the mineworkers would have felt that the dispute had been legitimised if there had been a ballot in favour of the dispute. The lack of a ballot undermined the dispute's credibility from the start. It is a great sadness that no Labour Member has been prepared to come out and be forthright in saying that since the dispute began.

There is no doubt that that happened because the leadership of the NUM had political objectives in starting the dispute and in pursuing it as vigorously as it has during the past nine months. Sadly, that still applies today because the NUM's leadership has used its membership as the infantry in its political battle, which is unjustified and unforgiveable.

What does "without preconditions" mean when the NUM's president said on the radio this morning that the NUM would not be party to an agreement that accepted pit closures on economic grounds? It is nonsense for that camouflage to be draped across our screens and to be given to the press when the NUM's president today and in correspondence makes it clear that he is still not prepared seriously to discuss economic pit closures.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh) rose——

Mr. Wrigglesworth: I shall not give way because I must finish quickly to allow other hon. Members to speak.

It is right that negotiations should not start again while the NUM is not prepared to accept that the central issue in the dispute is not on the table for serious discussion.

Mr. Holt rose——

Mr. Wrigglesworth: I want to be brief.

I hope that the miners will see what is happening to their industry and what is happening in the leadership of their union, and I hope that they will understand that it is not in their interests to continue the dispute on the present terms and under the present circumstances — [Interruption.] The industry has a great future but the miners — [Interruption.] — will understand that their interests are not being served by continuing the strike. Therefore, it is hoped that they will return to work in increasing numbers so that the great future that the industry has can be realised.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): Stop waffling. What advice does the hon. Gentleman give to the miners in Fife?

Mr. Wrigglesworth: If the hon. Gentleman wishes to intervene, he will have an opportunity to do so later.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for the hon. Member for Dunfermline, West (Mr. Douglas) to make so much noise that I cannot hear what the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) is saying?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Many hon. Members are anxious to catch my eye. Interruptions only prevent people from speaking.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: I am anxious that other hon. Members, such as those who have been bawling at me from the Labour Benches, should have an opportunity to speak.

Mr. Douglas: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Wrigglesworth: If the hon. Gentleman would resume his seat and behave in the way that one expects an hon. Member to behave, we could proceed with the debate.

It is in the interests of the miners that they should return to work to ensure that the great future that the industry could have is realised. We very much hope that——

Mr. Douglas: That they will crawl back.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: We hope that pressure will build up on the leadership of the NUM so that they are prepared——

Mr. Douglas: Prepared to crawl back.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: So that they are prepared to accept that the closure of uneconomic pits can be put on the agenda. When 80 per cent. of the losses of the NCB come from 10 per cent. of the pits, we do not need to study the facts for long to realise that something must be done.

Mr. Bob Clay (Sunderland, North): So the hon. Gentleman favours closing the pits in Durham? Why does he not say that in Durham?

Mr. Wrigglesworth: A lot of people from Durham will be listening to this and they will see what good sense there is in it.

Many people in the mining industry have fears about their jobs. We recognise that, but it is not in the interests of miners who have worries about the future to continue the dispute. They have been given guarantees that jobs will be on offer to them despite any closures that take place. In those circumstances, it is in their interests to go back to work and to allow discussions to take place on the closure of uneconomic pits so that the dispute can be brought to an end and the potential great future of the industry can be realised.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind hon. Members that the 10-minute limit now comes into operation. No injury time is added for interventions.

6.1 pm

Mr. Martin M. Brandon-Bravo (Nottingham, South): My hon. Friends have demonstrated beyond question their respect for the mining industry and miners and, in particular, their respect for Nottinghamshire miners.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester) said, we did not assume that the Nottinghamshire miners supported Government policies. They have been seeking to protect the integrity of their union. That has been their prime motivation and I am sure that, when the strike is over, they will be the first to want to put their union back together again, in the hope that they will find leadership that will represent their interests and not use them as political cannon fodder.

It is surely not in dispute that the strike has been a political strike. The prime aim of the miners' leader has been spelt out time and again. He said in February 1983:

"Capitalism is an obscence system which deserves to be overthrown."

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: I am grateful for that response by Labour Members. It illustrates more clearly than anything else what the strike is about.

Mr. Scargill continued:

"It must be overthrown before it disintegrates into a Fascist dictatorship."

What a nerve. Can there ever have been, since the dark days of pre-1939, a more odious example of the Fascist approach—and spelt out in advance, just as in "Mein Kampf"? But that is what Scargillism has become in these last months.

Demands have been formulated in terms that could not be fulfilled, but that was no accident. It was not a corner into which circumstances forced an unwilling NUM leadership. That is the Trotskyist style of negotiation: to ensure the maximum damage and frustration among the gullible, en route to insurrection.

Mr. Jimmy Reid is not exactly a friend of the Conservative party. [HON. MEMBERS: "He is no friend of ours either."] Apparently, he is no longer a friend of the Labour party. He said on television:

"I recoil in horror at the scenes of a miner's home daubed 'Scab' and into my mind flood visions of Jewish homes defaced in Hitler's Germany."

All the more reason why I am sorry that the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) is not here and all the more reason why I felt a sense of sadness that he who, of all people, should have known better, has acquiesced in these acts of violence and accusations against the police.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: That is not true.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: I have to say——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: No.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Will you use your position to ask the hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo) to withdraw a statement which is patently untrue and a misrepresentation of the truth?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo) is responsible for his own speech. He must decide, in the light of what is said, whether to withdraw any statement.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The hon. Gentleman made a personal attack on my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman).

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: I cannot withdraw those remarks, because I have felt a sense of personal shame, as a co-religionist of the right hon. Member for Gorton, at his attitude over the past months. That is why I feel that I can stand up and say what I have said.

I have made those comments because back in April, when we discussed the strike for the first time—though we were primarily concerned with the actions of the police—the right hon. Member for Gorton put a large red folder on the Opposition Dispatch Box.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): Red? Disgraceful!

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: You are a silly woman.

That heavy folder contained nothing but hearsay comments about problems on the picket lines. I know that to be a fact. The only reason why it was placed on the Dispatch Box was to give some spurious evidence of cases that had been laid before the right hon. Gentleman. I know that not one of those cases was laid before the chief constable of Nottingham, because every one was pure hearsay.

In all the row that has taken place, the right to work and the case for coal have been obscured by the outrageous conduct that has occurred. The right to work is a just principle, but it is not an argument for a particular job in a particular place for a miner and his children, regardless of whether the rest of the community wants or needs the product of that labour.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe implied, society must accept the social consequences, but that is a different solution from continuing to make unwanted goods or mining unwanted coal at too high a cost.

"Alice Through the Looking Glass" logic is offered as democracy by the miners' leaders. When the Nottinghamshire miners balloted on whether to strike, 27 per cent. voted for a strike and 73 per cent. voted to work. Our area went to work and fewer than 1,000 of the 31,000 miners there are still on strike.

However, striking miners now say that the majority have no right to vote their colleagues out of work. That now seems to be their argument. Of course, that is why the miners' leaders do not need a ballot any more. If they hold a ballot and obtain the majority they seek, they will be happy, but if they do not obtain that majority, they will argue that the majority has no right to put the minority's views in jeopardy.

This is a political showdown — [HON. MEMBERS: "Ah!"]—but not between this Government and miners, or working people in general. The showdown is between evil men, who now lead working people, and parliamentary democracy. It is a showdown in which both sides of the House should ensure that Parliament succeeds.

6.9 pm

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): Having heard the Secretary of State and the hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo), I can understand why the Government did not want a debate. It is now quite clear that, far from believing in the prerogative of management and in not intervening, the Secretary of State has masterminded the strike from the beginning. The preparations were made long ago, as the Ridley report proves. The police were equipped and trained to work on picket lines. The whole strike was organised to break the NUM.

If any Conservative Member wonders why Arthur Scargill is so highly respected, he should realise that for five years—and long before he was president of the NUM — Arthur Scargill went to countless miners' meetings saying, "Mind my words, the Government have a hit list of pits." Ministers and coal board officials denied that, but miners have followed Arthur Scargill because he has stayed loyal to them. No Conservative Member or Minister has taken that factor into account. Since no other hon. Member has done so, I should like to place on record my tribute to the 130,000 miners and their families who have endured appalling hardship in the past, almost, 12 months in order to defend the industry, their jobs, and their communities. I feel great pride for them.

It is a great tragedy that, because of many secondary issues, the real question has never been allowed to be properly discussed. That question involves the link between this country's economy and coal. I am very proud to have signed the 1977 "Plan For Coal". I negotiated it with the NUM. The basis of it was that there would be a joint agreement on the industry's future. Much has been made of pit closures under the Labour Government. I am not saying that all of them were right — [HON. MEMBERS: "Ah!"] Of course I am not saying that, but when, as Secretary of State, I offered a veto to the NUM on pit closures, it represented a recognition that one cannot run the mining industry without the goodwill of the British miners. Any Government who try to convert the "enemy within" to the "enemy underground" by driving men back to work through hardship will destroy the industry and its prospects.

The NUM has never objected to pit closures when there is genuine exhaustion. I am not talking about being down to the last tonne of coal. Anyone who has had anything to do with the industry knows that generally the argument is whether a bit more investment would reveal more coal faces. The argument is not about the last tonne of coal, and to say that the NUM has said that is a blatant lie designed to deceive those who do not know the truth. If there are geological faults or dangerous conditions, the NUM insists on pit closures. It will not put its members at risk. The argument is whether the Government now have a case for closure on what are called harsh economic grounds. The plain truth is that they do not.

If a pit is denied investment, it can be turned into what is called an "uneconomic" pit, just as, if the roof of a home or a burst pipe is not mended, or if broken windows are not replaced, that home will be turned into a slum. The charge that the NUM rightly makes is that the Government have deliberately starved pits that have great reserves of coal in order to feed money into the so-called high productivity pits with the intention of selling them off when the Government get the chance. Conservative Members should not shake their heads as if to suggest privatisation was a wicked smear against the Government. This Government would sell off the royal family if they could make a quick profit.

The second argument concerns the relative costs of nuclear power and coal. As the House knows, not a single penny of equity capital has ever been put into nuclear power anywhere in the world. Not a single penny has been put into it in the United States. The United States has cancelled 90 nuclear power stations, and has not ordered one since 1977. Nuclear power is financed for defence reasons. Therefore the argument that nuclear power is cheaper than coal is quite false.

We sell our oil from the North sea to the CEGB at three times the cost of production, because OPEC fixes the price. There is no case for saying that coal is uneconomic compared with nuclear power or oil. The social cost to the Exchequer of closure where there is no other work is twice that of keeping the pit open. SDP Members with their fake statistics come along and try to pretend that they are presenting mathematical realities that others have to face, but in doing so they are just proving that they are on the Right wing of the Tory party. I think that that is clear

Then, of course, it is said that there is no market for coal. But as coal is cheaper than nuclear power or oil, we should be converting from nuclear power and oil to coal, and providing free fuel to pensioners, who now die in their hundreds from hypothermia during the winter. Those old people cannot afford to keep warm in winter. But the miners who dig that coal could keep their jobs, save the country money and save the lives of the old.

Also, with the pound at half the value of two or three years ago, British coal is exported at half the price and British imports of energy——

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Benn: I shall not give way. If the hon. Gentleman had wanted a debate, he could have demanded a debate in Government time. He should listen to the arguments being put forward.

Energy imports now cost twice the price. Not for the first time in our history the NUM is defending the national interest—[Interruption.] Yes it is. When the oil runs out—and it is being depleted at a disgraceful rate—and when gas runs out, Britain will again depend on coal.

The Government have tried to bribe and starve the miners into giving up. They have put thousands of policemen on the picket lines who are trained in techniques perfected in Northern Ireland. The magistrates have abused bail conditions by taking away civil liberties without trial. The judges have sequestrated funds that the miners donated with the very aim of defending their jobs if the union was under attack. The mass media gathered up there in the Press Gallery have been pouring out propaganda against the miners. For example, when BBC television covered the Orgreave picket, it showed stones being thrown, and then cavalry charges being made by the police. I know from BBC editors who took part in that bulletin that there were three cavalry charges by the police before a single stone was thrown. But the BBC, pretending to be impartial, put out a bulletin designed to mislead the British people about the sources of violence.

Time is short, so I must be brief. There are 130,000 miners on strike. There have been some casualties—those who have gone back to work because they could not survive. But I tell the House that 90 per cent. of the miners who have ever been on strike are still on strike. As one third of miners never went on strike, it means that, even if the 51 per cent. mark was achieved, all that money and propaganda and all the police would have shifted only 16 per cent. of miners from their original view.

The cost of the strike has been enormous, but the miners have received massive support. They have received support from their communities, from women's action groups and from people and communities all over the country and the world. The public now know that what my right hon. Friend the Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) said is true—we are witnessing an attack on the jobs, living conditions, trade union rights and civil liberties of working people in Britain. The Government rely on cold and hunger to try to drive the miners back, but I do not believe that they will succeed. The other way to end the strike quickly is to follow the lead of the National Union of Railwaymen, the Associated Society of Locomotive Engineers and Firemen and the National Union of Seamen and provide industrial support and further political action.

Ministers should study their history. After the 1926 general strike, the Tory Government were swept from office in the following general election. In 1974, when the present Secretary of State was making the same speeches, even though there had been a ballot, he was swept from office. The British people will never, never, never allow the Tory party to destroy the miners, their families and their communities, because, given the choice of the ballot box, they prefer the quality, decency, dedication and loyalty of the miners to the get-rich-quick people who support the Tory party and have contributed to the creation of this strike.

Mr. Peter Rost (Erewash): The right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) conveniently forgot to tell the House that in Derbyshire the majority of miners are working, having had a ballot locally against the strike. The people of Derbyshire and the miners there cannot understand what the dispute is about and why it was started by the NUM leadership. Derbyshire miners have always accepted that the closure of pits near the end of their economic life is a necessary and normal part of the business.

Many of my constituents are disgusted at the Labour party's nauseating display of licking Arthur Scargill's jackboots. They are particularly disgusted at Labour Members representing Derbyshire constituencies, including the right hon. Member for Chesterfield, who never speak up on behalf of the majority of miners who are working. The Labour party stands condemned tonight out of its own mouth.

Time and again the Labour party has failed to condemn the picketing, the violence and the intimidation. It has failed to speak up for the working miners. It has failed to support the democratic vote and failed to support union rule books. It has failed to condemn a senseless dispute. The Labour party's only cry has been to ask the National Coal Board to surrender to Mr. Arthur Scargill's impossible demands.

The Labour party has used its influence, not to protect the miners, not to protect the union and not to protect the coal industry, but to aid and abet a disastrous conflict which is damaging the economy, preventing the modernisation of the coal industry and preventing lower energy prices.

Members of the Labour party are the guilty men. We have heard them again tonight. They have encouraged an irresponsible NUM leadership which has cheated its own members out of earnings, cheated them out of jobs and cheated them out of a future for their industry.

Of course pits must continue to close. The Labour Government closed hundreds of them. The Labour Government even provided, under the Coal Industry Act 1977, for the closure of uneconomic pits. We must consider the cost to the nation of maintaining subsidies in the marginal, hopelessly uneconomic pits. We must reallocate resources and invest in the new pits for tomorrow to secure the energy and the jobs that we need. We must provide for more economic energy prices.

Goodness knows how many jobs have been lost over the last few years because of high energy prices. We lost whole industries because our coal was too expensive. There is a huge market for coal—it is bigger than today's—if we concentrated on producing it in the new fields where it can be mined more economically.

Coal could recapture markets that it has lost over the years if only we had a sensible expansion of the industry in the economic areas. That is what the NUM leadership is preventing, and that is what the Labour party is supporting.

If the NUM is really prepared to negotiate on economic pits, why does it not just say so? All that it has to admit is that uneconomic pits have to close. Let us get round the table and discuss how best to do it. The industry must have a right to manage. Every other industry has that right. If the industry had exercised that right in the past we should not be having a dispute now because more of the uneconomic production would have been phased out long ago and new investment would have gone ahead faster instead of being used to subsidise the loss-making pits. If that had happened, we should now have lower cost coal and secure jobs. Instead of wasting subsidies on maintaining loss-making pits, we should reallocate more of the resources into the new mines. Management must be given the right to manage.

In every other industry—private and state—workers and management have to face the facts of life to survive. It may be painful but it is accepted. Uneconomic steel plants, older power stations and remote railway lines which are uneconomic in today's circumstances have been closed. In private industry the realities of economic life have been even more harsh.

If Mr. Scargill were the leader of the engineering union, we should still be producing thousands of steam engines. If Mr. Scargill were leader of the transport union, we should probably still be running stage coaches on mud tracks. If we accepted Scargillism here, Britain would have no modern new technological industries such as aerospace and nuclear electronics and our living standards would be about as high as they are in Bulgaria.

I want to say a word about the future of the industry. When all this is over and the majority of miners have finally voted with their feet, we shall have to start to put the pieces together. There must be some fundamental changes and I hope that the Government Front Bench will take account of them. There must be genuine competition in the coal industry. There must be privatisation and better management.

We have a private sector coal industry. Why have we stifled it? We have private coal mines and mining expertise in the private sector. Why do we not encourage it? Why should the coal industry be retained as a state monopoly? There is plenty of scope for providing efficient competition in the private sector. It is nonsense that companies such as BP should have to mine coal in Australia and elsewhere and are prohibited from using their expertise to mine coal in Britain. It is nonsense that our profitable, opencast mining industry should be deliberately stifled by the National Coal Board. Instead of encouraging more licensing, the NCB is abusing its monopoly to hold back that profitable private sector.

Why should not new reserves of coal, like oil and gas be licensed to encourage private investment for the benefit of the economy as a whole? Why should not miners have a better deal in the private sector, as every other privatised industry provides? There is plenty of scope for introducing genuine competition to the NCB. We could sell off some of the profitable pits, so that the coal board could concentrate on putting right the unprofitable pits.

Let us get on with what we have done in the other industries for the benefit of the economy, the consumer and, above all, the employees in that industry.

The nation should note the way in which the Labour party encouraged the miners to believe that they were supporting an honourable dispute, when it knew that the miners had been tricked, bullied and intimidated into supporting a lost cause. It is time that the country realised that Labour's attitude has been to wreck a once great union, and now it has the nerve to demand that the coal board surrender to impossible terms.

Even today, when the disastrous NUM leadership has been discredited and exposed for its shameful deception of its members, and when the suicidal policies of Arthur Scargill are rejected by more and more disillusioned miners, who remains to support Scargillism and all that it represents? Not the miners, not the TUC and not even any other union—just the Labour party and Her Majesty's official Opposition. Long may they remain the Opposition.

Mr. Martin Redmond (Don Valley): It gives me no pleasure to speak in this debate about a dispute that should not have taken place.

The Secretary of State must take full responsibility. He should have got off his backside and involved himself more openly in trying to resolve the dispute. His failure to do so shows either that he agrees with the Prime Minister's policy or that he does not have the guts to stand up for what is right.

I said recently that the Secretary of State knew nothing about industrial relations. It is now apparent that he knows even less about the coal industry. In view of the duration of the strike and the right hon. Gentleman's failure to do anything, he should do the honourable thing and resign.

The various plans for coal are not worth the paper on which they are written if there is no overall energy policy, and there can be no such policy while the Government allow short-term market forces to dictate the size of the industry. An overall energy policy based on coal must be implemented for the long-term good of the nation.

The Government and the NCB have shown that their pea-sized brains are incapable of understanding and discharging their duties. The Government, who have allowed the dispute to cost £5·5 billion, should be charged with treason, for it is obvious that they do not comprehend the figures. If not charged with treason, they should be committed to Rampton hospital. Having worked in the industry and served on various committees, I would not trust the coal board to run a children's tea party.

As for the Cortonwood issue, when Yorkshire took the decision to strike — because the NCB refused to implement the then policies on pit closures — the Government sat on their backsides, did nothing and allowed the strike to start the following Monday.

Hickleton pit was made uneconomic some years ago, as the result of bad investment and bad management. Bentley pit, under the old ABC hit list, was to close, but as a result of the Doncaster NUM panel threatening total strike action, the then area director caused investment to be made in that pit. Meanwhile, the rest of the pits in the Doncaster area were being asked to produce the same excellent profits for the industry. That shows that, when good investment takes place, a pit—even one on the hit list—can produce a profit for the good of the industry and the local community.

I could go on at length giving examples of stupid decisions made by the coal board, but time does not permit me to deal with that aspect in depth. One can only hope that if these points are made often enough, they will penetrate even the minds of Tory Members, who may then feel able to question whether the Government are pursuing policies that are good for the nation.

It is strange that in other countries the private sector is investing in their coal industries—anticipating the future demand for coal—while the British Government would sooner import coal and see our miners on the dole, with all the consequences of deprivation and so on. It is economics gone crazy.

Comparisons have been made between Labour and Conservative Administrations closing pits. The main difference is that, under previous Labour Governments, there were alternative jobs for the miners. There is clear evidence to support the aims and objectives of the NUM.

A number of reports have been made on the method of accountancy employed by the coal board, reference has been made to the Government's stance throughout the dispute and much has been said about the social cost of it all to the mining communities. Lord Kaldor has argued a simple and overwhelming case against the Government's and the coal board's policy. Andrew Glyn has argued that the NCB's policy is wrong. Barnsley council in south Yorkshire has produced a booklet entitled, "Coal Mining and Barnsley". It is a study of employment prospects in the area, especially if the Government have their way. If the Secretary of State cannot afford to buy a copy of that booklet, I will purchase one for him.

The University of Manchester Institute of Science of Technology has argued against the misleading method of accountancy employed by the NCB, yet the Secretary of State buries his head in the sand like an ostrich. He should spend more time reading suggestions and reports which conflict with the methods employed by the NCB, especially in the light of the financial jargon that emanates from the board.

Not once have the Government argued their case on logic and truth. In reality, there is no logic or reason in their policy. If there had been, Government time would have been provided for us to debate the problems facing the mining industry. If the Government were correct in their policy—and they are not—they would argue their case for pit closures before an independent body, which would have the final say on whether a pit should close. The Government will not do that, because they are like frightened children. They do not have the guts to argue their case before an independent panel. Their policy is a total disaster for the nation.

I have seen all the correspondence that has passed between the union and the coal board, and I can say with confidence that the NCB and the Government are pathetic in their lack of understanding of industrial relations. The letter listing five negotiating points sent by the NUM to Mr. Spanton last Friday was most reasonable. For the coal board to have refused to act in accordance with that—either on its own or at the direction of the Government—makes one question the sanity of those involved.

A bold, imaginative policy of investment in the mining industry by men with the vision to think of the future needs of the industry would receive the grateful thanks of future generations, but the present Government will stand condemned. The propaganda that has appeared in the media would no doubt warm the cockles of Goebbels' heart, because the media have distorted the truth. I hope that this debate will give the public some of the knowledge that has not yet appeared in the media.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): The media cannot have distorted Mr. Scargill's position sufficiently, as he made it absolutely plain on radio this morning that he has not budged an inch. On a day when a record 2,237 men have gone back to work for the first time, I warmly welcome this debate. I have the privilege of representing many miners—

Mr. Patchett: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Howarth: No, I have only just started.

I reject the description of the dispute as "the miners' strike" because my constituents care about their jobs. To their great credit, the vast majority of miners in Staffordshire are at work today. Many of my constituents work at Littleton colliery in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack). That colliery is not just working virtually as normal but is back in profit. That is a great achievement.

Mr. Patchett: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Howarth: I doubt whether the Leader of the Opposition welcomes this debate, as it has taken him eight months to find time for it. Despite the appearance of unanimity, this issue divides the Labour party from top to bottom. The miners have never had a better deal—significantly better than they had under the stewardship of the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), who was booted out at the last election. Picket line violence is losing support for the Labour party like a haemorrhage. That support is now coming to the Conservative party, certainly in my constituency.

The Leader of the Opposition knows that the real purpose of the strike is an assault on the democratic system of this country. Above all, he knows that economics must play a part in pit closures, as he said himself today and on radio last Friday morning. He had to stage this debate because he knows that the Labour party is now controlled by men who wish to introduce the tactics of the picket line into this very Chamber. If leadership is woefully lacking among the Opposition, no such deficiency exists on the Conservative side. The leadership of the NUM has sought to challenge democracy.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Howarth: The Opposition's belief in freedom of expression is skin deep. The NUM leadership has sought to challenge democracy, to turn out the lights of Britain, to deny heat to the elderly and infirm and to paralyse the economy. The people of Britain expect the Government to be robust and to give all necesary support to the NCB in its attempt to manage the industry. I believe that the people of Britain have not been disappointed by the resolution of my right hon. and hon. Friends in supporting management's right to manage. Management was always undermined when the nation had the misfortune to be ruled by a Labour Government. Under the Conservative Government, management has been given the authority to manage, and I congratulate my right hon. and hon. Friends on their achievement in this difficult and damaging strike.

Mr. Allen McKay: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Howarth: I know that the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. McKay) is a fair man. I am sorry that I cannot give way now. Perhaps I shall have time later. I wish to make three brief points.

First, pit closures are nothing new in my constituency. In a very small geographical area, 12 pits have been closed since 1947 with the loss of 9,650 jobs, but not one day was lost in strike action as a result.

Mr. Barron: By agreement.

Mr. Howarth: Yes, those closures were by agreement, but they took place on economic grounds as well as on grounds of exhaustion.

Secondly, intimidation has been the worst since the war and has been a major feature in the campaign to stop men going back to work. Constituents are still coming to me, saying that they have been hounded out of the business by the extent of picketing, sometimes on the insistence of their wives, who could not stand it any longer. Those men have lost their jobs and have no new jobs to go to. There has been a conspiracy to organise mass picketing up and down the country. How else could there have been 6,000 men at Orgreave on one day?

Mr. Corbyn: What about mass policing?

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Gentleman seems uncertain where we stand on liberty. The police are there in support of liberty, although I do not expect him to appreciate that. Only yesterday, the president of the NUM called for further mass picketing. I submit that, under section 7 of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act 1875, such acts constitute a conspiracy to organise illegal picketing throughout the country. My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has said that he wishes to encourage chief constables to do all in their power to find evidence of conspiracy. In that, he is supported by my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General. The people of Britain believe that there must be evidence of conspiracy. Without organisation, how can 6,000 men gather at the same place?

Mr. Corbyn: Or 7,000 policemen.

Mr. Howarth: I believe that the strike will soon be over. When it is over, there should be an inquiry into the way in which picketing is organised so that, if necessary, provision can be made to ensure that in the future mass intimidation of this kind is not inflicted on the working men and women of Britain.

Thirdly, my area contains one of the largest opencast pits in the country, producing about 1 million tonnes per annum. Coal has been mined at that pit for the past year, but between the end of March and the end of September there was no movement from the pit because the railwaymen and signalmen refused to move it. The strikers' friends and the destroyers of the British economy are on the Opposition Benches. That coal is now in a volatile condition and has to be moved, so it is being moved by road—with consequent effects on the road system of Staffordshire and surrounding counties.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will say something today about the role of the railwaymen in the dispute. I know that there are drivers willing to move coal. It is outrageous that an industry bleating for more public investment for electrification and so on is shooting itself in the head by refusing to move coal and thus losing at least £50 million per year. What kind of economics or job protection is that? If railwaymen refuse to move coal by rail, there is one remedy left to British Rail—to dismiss them for failing to fulfil their contracts of employment.

I believe that the Government have done extremely well in a difficult and damaging dispute. I believe that the people of Britain are grateful to have a Government who have resolution and who are prepared to stand up to the thugs because—let us make no mistake about it—Mr. Scargill and his formation brick-throwers have been spoiling for this fight for years. The Saltley coke depot business in 1972 was but the forerunner of it.

I believe that there should be no further concessions and that my right hon. and hon. Friends are absolutely right in supporting the coal board, and in standing firm until the NUM agrees to talk about the closure of uneconomic pits that are costing the taxpayer dearly.

6.50 pm

Mr. Jack Dormand (Easington): I am sorry that the Secretary of State is not present—but I understand why not. The most memorable episode in the debate will be his wriggling at the Dispatch Box while attempting to answer the many probing questions asked by the Opposition not only about the content of last week's agenda for peace talks in the dispute but about the interpretation of it. Normally—I stress the word "normally"—I find the Secretary of State a forthright debater, someone who gives straight answers. I did not find that today. Therefore, I can deduce only that he was rather less than honest in answering a question which, frankly, could have been answered with a straight yes or no. We did not get that today.

Some people genuinely believed that the Government's policy towards the coal industry was to rid the industry of uneconomic capacity, so pit closures were inevitable. There can be little doubt that the Government wanted and still want a coal industry in which economics plays the most important part, regardless of the consequences. Those who took that view were both naive and misguided. I do not say that there were not other objectives, but the major aim was to destroy the power of the NUM and, having done that, to pave the way for similar policies against the whole trade union movement. The planning of the operation was as precise and deliberate as that of a military campaign. It is worth while taking a few sentences to say what constituted that operation and why I believe it to be so.

When the miners made the Prime Minister climb down over wages in 1981, several things happened. Coal production was stepped up until a total of 53 million tonnes was stocked, but—this is important—the Government ensured that 26 million tonnes of that stock were placed at the power stations. That was the crucial part of the operation. Incidentally, that amount was more than twice as much as had ever been stocked at the power stations in the history of the industry.

While that was happening, the Government were, in the House, changing the social security laws and regulations to the detriment of strikers. We now see the most infamous operating, in that miners on strike are deemed to be receiving strike pay—a sum of £16, which they never receive. That directly affects their social security entitlement and is part of the reason for the hardship among miners' families.

The Government were more explicit with other legislation. Their three trade union and employment Acts constitute a direct attack on the unions and form an important part of the whole structure of the offensive not only on the miners but on the whole of the organised labour movement. The most flagrant attack on the miners was yet to come. Anyone who had any doubts at the time about the Government's intentions had them dispelled with the appointment of Ian MacGregor as chairman of the NCB. His record in the United States and this country was an ideal qualification, in the eyes of the most callous of Prime Ministers, for the rundown of the industry, regardless of the social costs, and, as some of us would argue, regardless of the economic costs to the country. Some of my hon. Friends demonstrated that today.

Had that been the end of the story, it would have been bad enough, but there was more to come. MacGregor chose when and how to launch his attack with considerable ease. He provoked the strike at the beginning of spring so that some six months of fine weather could be expected. In the event, that fine weather materialised. He also announced the closure of five pits without carrying out the normal consultations or procedures that were in operation at the time. That is one of the most disgraceful acts that has taken place in the dispute.

I have not said anything new in describing those events, but they constitute the most devious operations against organised labour in this century and are reminiscent of the action taken by employers in the 18th and 19th centuries, when trade unions were beginning to make themselves heard. I have to say that the Government and the NCB have had some success, but I say to the Secretary of State that it is a short-term success, and the Government had better not forget it.

The original purpose of the Government's and the NCB's policy was to remove 4 million tonnes of capacity from production and to reduce the number of jobs by 20,000. There are various estimates of how much has been taken out of the industry, but it is reasonable to assume, on the basis of past production figures, that 80 million tonnes will have been taken out because of the strike. There will be no trouble for the Government with regard to manpower because they will get rid of the 20,000 workers with no problem when the strike comes to a conclusion.

As that is the situation, why on earth are the board and the Government being so stubborn, obstinate and, above all, so vindictive about it? The answer is plain for everyone to see. They are revelling unashamedly in a political strike of their own making.

However, I warn the Government. I said a few moments ago that they were having some short-term success. In the longer term, people who do not hold any particular brief for the miners will say—indeed, they are saying it now—"Enough is enough." They are appalled by the hardship among miners' families, they are frightened by the alienation of the police and the new uses to which police forces have been put, and they are bewildered by the divisions in the mining communities and the conflict between some mining and non-mining areas. They fear, with justification, that the fabric of our society, torn as it has been by almost a year of strife, will not be the same for a generation; that the changes will affect every man, woman and child for a generation.

The Government may believe that their war is won. We have seen evidence of that in the speeches today. Thinking that would be foolish in the extreme. Thousands of miners—many in my constituency—are determined to stay out in the absence of an honourable settlement, and that will exacerbate the present difficulties in the dispute, regardless of whether more than 50 per cent. go back to work. The Government have not persuaded miners to return to work by the force of their arguments; that has been done by the hardship brought upon the miners by the sheer political spite of the Prime Minister and her senior colleagues.

The Government have left and continue to leave unanswered several important questions. Let me put them quickly. I have already mentioned one, about why the Government do not recognise the loss of production and manpower. Several of my hon. Friends have raised my second point. Why do the Government not have the grace and humility to consider that their concept of the "profitability" of a pit is now under serious question? There are at least four studies—indeed, about half a dozen have been mentioned in the debate—which are objective and have no connection with the NUM or the NCB, and which dispute the accountancy methods of the board and the Government. After all, this is at the centre of the dispute, and it is arrogance in the extreme for the Government to believe that they hold a monopoly of wisdom on such a crucial issue in the face of such contrary evidence.

I remind the Government that the miners see this as a dispute about jobs and the destruction of the mining communities. The belated offer of £5 million towards a company to provide new jobs is a disgrace to a mining community which has such a great tradition. Indeed, the Government themselves were shamefaced, because that figure has now been increased to £10 million. When I asked the Secretary of State about this last week, he said, "Well, of course, we can consider a higher figure if necessary." That reveals the weakness of the Government's case.

If the Government are really serious about helping to create alternative employment, they will have to think much more seriously than they have done so far. If I had time, I could draw a parallel with Consett in my own area.

The case for coal is overwhelming. If we had a Government who believed in an expanding economy, we would never have coal stocks of more than 50 million tonnes. An increase in exports, the extension of the boiler conversion scheme and taking coal liquefaction seriously are only some of the things that could produce a successful and expanding coal industry.

Mr. John Hannam (Exeter): It is appropriate that on this day, when a hesitant and reluctant Labour party leadership has been forced to use its Supply day for a coal debate, a record number of striking miners have returned to work. By lunchtime alone, 2,237 miners had turned their backs on Mr. Scargill and the dinosaurian NUM, including 870 in the north-east in Northumbria and Durham and 552 in the Scargill home area of Yorkshire.

That clearly shows that the stream is now turning into a flood and that the NUM case is collapsing around its ears. Therefore, this debate is not about the war—the dispute—but about the peace. The war is effectively over. The soldiers are putting down their weapons and are on their way back. Therefore, I do not wish to go over the old ground but to concentrate on the present position.

Many hon. Members will speak as representatives of coal mining constituencies, and their evidence and advice is always valuable to the House. But as we know, our loyalties to our constituents to a great extent often influence our attitudes. That is only to be expected. My position is that of one who since the early 1970s has been involved in the energy sector. I do not represent a coal mining constituency but I can claim to have shown consistent support for the development of a successful coal industry.

Through Coal Bill after Coal Bill throughout the 1970s and under different Governments, I have seen financial provision for miners, their families and the industry increase substantially. I have seen Labour Governments close pits on uneconomic grounds, just as I have Conservative Governments—matched at the same time by stupendous amounts of investment in new fields. I must, however, say that the Conservative record on pit closures comes nowhere near the numbers closed under the Labour Governments of 1964 and 1974, when 295 pits were closed and 250,000 miners put out of work at derisory levels of compensation compared with those now offered by this Government.

Many uneconomic pits have closed under Labour. Provision for that was included in the Coal Industry Act 1977, when the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), then Secretary of State for Energy, took the powers necessary to assist financially with the Coal Board's "elimination of uneconomic colliery capacity".

The clearest evidence of the political nature of this dispute is the fact that the NUM sat down and took passively the Labour Government's massive closure programme without strike action, while a small and relatively well-cushioned closure of about 20 pits has produced this crippling and self-destructive unballoted strike.

Mr. Allen McKay rose——

Mr. Hannam: I am sorry, but time does not allow me to give way to interventions.

The Labour leadership has known the NUM case to be flimsy from the very beginning. It has also known that the actions of the strikers have been undemocratic. That is why the Opposition have been so equivocal about debating this issue or about standing up to be counted on the real reason for the dispute, which is obviously a naked attempt to overthrow an elected Government by violent methods.

Once again, the country can see the hypocrisy of the Labour party, which says one thing in government and another in opposition. It is like Dr. Doolittle's "push-me-pull-you", which faced both ways at the same time. Throughout this dispute, the Opposition have argued that the Government should intervene. There has now been a reversal, and the Opposition are saying that the Government must take no action, even when the most sensible statements are made by the Prime Minister or by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy. The coal board requirement that any further talks must include the closure of uneconomic pits is surely common sense. That is the very nub of the dispute. After seven previous negotiations and a rejected ACAS arbitration, any final set of talks must evolve around an agreed system for such closures.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): Why?

Mr. Hannam: Because that is the very nub of the dispute.

To try to make political capital through accusations of revenge and malice on the part of the coal board and the Government is just stuff and nonsense, and totally irresponsible at that. The Labour party should be persuading the beleaguered NUM executive that it must agree to uneconomic pits being top of the agenda because, as I have said, that is the crux of the whole dispute.

Mr. Scargill's desire to fight on does not necessarily mean the loss of his job, his car or his pension, but it means that, day by day, the union is facing disruption and loss of integrity and the miners are facing the loss of coal faces and coal markets. I do not think that Mr. Scargill is too bothered about the effect on the Labour party. If that collapsed, I am sure that along with some of his friends he would be happy to pick up the pieces and remould it into a shape that he would like.

In my work in the energy sector, I meet many industy representatives who at various times present their views on energy matters which affect their firms. In recent weeks and months, the one message that has come through strong and clear is that, if we could put the coal industry on to a competitive, productive footing, industry which uses large amounts of energy would invest large amounts of capital in new coal firing plant and processes.

Only last week I met the leaders of the British Paper and Board Industries Federation, who use large amounts of energy for their continuous process mills. They informed us that, just before the beginning of the coal dispute last March, that industry had decided in principle to convert to coal. This was based on its evaluation of Mr. MacGregor's plans for an expanding, competitive coal industry, including the phasing out of heavily uneconomic pits and the development of new low-cost fields. The investment programmes of those industries ran into millions of pounds per plant, with resultant large orders and jobs as well as new customers for the coal industry. All those plans were shelved when the dispute began.

Labour Members must realise that these major investments in coal-burning plant will not take place if coal does not become more competitive. In other words, if for one political reason or another a final deal is fudged and uneconomic pit closures do not take place, we shall lose the opportunity for these major advances in the installation of coal-burning plant.

That was confirmed at a CBI meeting last week, when I was informed that the wholesale price of coal had to come down from about £55 a tonne to about £35 a tonne. That is why this is a crucial and fundamental issue, and why I fully support the coal board's determination to achieve that aim. It represents the future of the British coal industry. With a competitive price, coal production could rise to between 130 million and 140 million tonnes a year, as Mr. MacGregor stated before the strike began. Without a successful outcome, the continuation of high-cost fuel and coal production will cause the industry to wither away and production to decline to between 70 million and 80 million tonnes.

I want to see the targets for exports of British coal achieved, an increase in the numbers of firms converting to the use of coal, and a modern industry emerging. I want that industry to be highly paid, highly skilled and highly successful. That is why the NCB is absolutely right to insist on this fundamental issue being top of the agenda.

7.10 pm

Mr. D. E. Thomas (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): I shall deal with the central issue of the dispute and the debate —the definition of the word "economic". In a letter to The Guardian in the autumn Lord Kaldor said:

> "Uneconomic pits, though they cause financial losses, bring a net benefit in the form of an additional supply of exhaustible resources which otherwise would not be retrievable."

That simple text shows that we cannot talk about coal and fossil fuels as if they were manufactured goods which could be produced at a development agency advance factory.

Since I have been a Member of the House, the Conservative party has not produced any arguments about uneconomic farming. We have not heard arguments about the economics of food production, yet the same arguments apply to the extractive industry of coal production as to the extractive industry of agriculture. I should like Ministers and Tory supporters who talk about economic pits to address their remarks to agriculture.

We hear that individual pits are uneconomic, yet the Trident missile programme at £11 billion, the fortress Falklands policy at £5 billion—an uneconomic pit if ever there was one — and the advanced gas-cooled reactor nuclear programme are within the Government's definition of "economic". Only the coal industry is not economic. The only way to explain that is by understanding the economics of the coal industry in terms of the Government's overall approach to public expenditure, and especially to those who work in the coal industry and the National Union of Mineworkers.

Recently we heard a further analysis of the Government's assessment of uneconomic pits. I refer to the work done by two economists at the university of Wales — Tony Cutler and Karel Williams. They examined the basis of the NCB's calculations that were presented to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission in 1981. Their analysis shows clearly that the 70 pits identified by the NCB as big loss-makers and highly uneconomic, many of which are in the south Wales coalfield, are not high-cost pits, but pits that are marginal to the board's investment strategy. There is an important difference between those two points.

An uneconomic pit is not one that is losing large sums, but a pit that is marginal to the NCB's investment strategy. It is noticeable that the real link between the 70 pits is not a lack of profitability but a lack of investment. They are located in the geographically peripheral coalfields in Wales, Scotland and Durham. The comparative figures in cash and percentage totals for mining investment by NCB area between 1979-80 and 1983-84 show that Scotland received 4·5 per cent. of the total investment, and south Wales 3·5 per cent. In cash terms the investment level in south Wales has declined from £52 million in 1979-80 to £24 million in 1983-84. The NCB's investment strategy creates uneconomic pits.

The Government argue, and the NCB confirms, that the free market determines the price of coal and the energy market, and therefore that the economics of the free market and the profitability of a product in the free market determine what is economic. That is wholly spurious economics. The shape of the energy market is determined by the Central Electricity Generating Board, which takes about 70 per cent. of the NCB's output. Therefore, there is no free market in coal. That notion is pure Thatcherite-Government propaganda. The price, profitability and investment prospects of coal are not dictated by a spurious free market but determined by negotiations between two Government-controlled monopolies—the CEGB and the NCB. The CEGB is encouraged to increase its selling prices, and the NCB is expected to cut its prices so that coal price rises are kept below the rate of inflation. A continued hidden subsidy is coming increasingly into the open—the hidden subsidy from the CEGB to the NCB, which makes the CEGB economic and the NCB uneconomic. Therefore, the shape of the energy market is determined by the Government.

The investment strategy of the NCB is also decided by the Government, and therefore it is an essentially political decision to invest heavily in the super-pits in Nottinghamshire and to starve the south Wales pits with their irreplaceable reserves of low sulphur-content coal. That strategy is a self-fulfilling prophecy. As the so-called uneconomic pits of south Wales are starved of resources, they become, in the Government's terms, more uneconomic.

In 1983 in south Wales, investment per head was £11,400, and incurred operating costs of £58·8 per tonne. The north Nottinghamshire coalfield received £21,900 per head and had an operating cost of £32 per tonne. There is a clear link between the level of investment and the productivity in so-called uneconomic pits. The profitability of pits has as much, if not more, to do with the amount of investment in them as with their geological condition, to which Conservative Members always refer when they talk about uneconomic pits.

The Government have not found funds for new investment, and the NCB has not placed its new investment in the peripheral areas. As a result it is a political decision to centralise production in the large capital-intensive and ultimately union-free areas. The central coalfields will no doubt be privatised. At the same time those areas which are economic in real terms—in terms of the energy needs of Britain—are starved of investment.

I have a nuclear power station in my constituency and I represent nuclear power workers. If we applied the same accounting practice to nuclear power stations, there would be a large number of uneconomic nuclear power stations, but the Government do not apply the same practices. While the Government face their sterling crisis, their argument about the relative costs of imported coal and home-produced coal is turned on its head. NCB profitability was calculated on an exchange rate of $1·70, but the rate has now declined. At the present rate, home-produced coal is as profitable in the Government's own free market terms as imported coal.

The Government will not heed what I have said because they are not interested in the economics of energy policy, to which many hon. Members have sought to refer during the debate. Their main interest is in the political outcome of the dispute. They are conducting a campaign on the basis, not of economic rationality, but of the Thatcherite philosophy of a free market, and especially on the restructuring of politics of Britain. Because the mining areas have continually produced Socialist leaders who have challenged the economics of the free market, the Government seek to destroy the mining communities. In south Wales we understand that the enemy within is not found in the pits of west Yorkshire or west Wales, but here in the Palace of Westminster.

Mr. T. H. H. Skeet (Bedfordshire, North): I listened with great interest to the speech of the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), who congratulated the people on strike on their forbearance during the tough winter. I remind him that the winter is almost over, and that stocks are high. I wish to pay tribute to the 70,000 miners—42 per cent. of the work force—who are working. The striking miners can end their plight by going back to work tomorrow if they so choose.

An interesting point about the debate is that so far Opposition Members have focused on the Government and have not mentioned Mr. Scargill. Let us examine what Mr. Scargill has done. There have been seven rounds of talks, and on each occasion he could have put many matters on the agenda. After each set of talks, he said, "What a good man I have been. I have not moved an inch." Mr. Scargill has disregarded the law. In the Financial Times of 3 October, Mr. Scargill is quoted as saying:

> "Let me say this. The High Court decision, as far as we are concerned, will not be accepted. Our rules and constitution have been upheld, and the Derbyshire strike is official. The Yorkshire strike is official, and 86 per cent. of the members in an individual ballot voted for the decision . . . There is no High Court judge going to take away the democratic right of our union to deal with internal affairs. We are an independent democratic trade union."

Here is a man who is prepared to defy the law to vindicate his actions. He says, "To hell with the law of the land." No one in the House, from the Conservative party and I dare say from the Opposition, would give credence to those remarks.

I have never heard Mr. Scargill say that he condones intimidation or that he is prepared to accept a picket of six or seven, as laid down by the CBI—[HON. MEMBERS: "The CBI?"] The CBI has accepted some discipline, as has the TUC. Mr. Scargill is prepared to cast aside TUC advice because he wishes to goad by intimidation. It is remarkable that the Opposition have exonerated him from all responsibility, but have fixed all the responsibility on a Government who provide investment in the industry. The Government have said that none of the 20,000 workers involved will become unemployed. They will all be engaged elsewhere and there will be no mandatory redundancies. Those who wish to accept the redundancy terms—probably the best in British industry—can do so. Will they not accept those terms?

I wish that I could persuade the NUM to accept that coal cannot live in a market which is out of balance. In the 20 most profitable and successful pits, it costs £28 to produce a tonne of coal, whereas in the 20 worst pits, it costs about £90 a tonne. But it is precisely the latter pits which Mr. Scargill will not allow to be closed. That is ridiculous. Does not the NUM realise that the future of mining will be a small, efficient industry producing about 100 million tonnes a year, with production increasing gradually in response to market conditions?

This is the most ludicrous dispute in British history, and it is about the closure of 20 pits that were outlined by the chairman of the coal board. Since the dispute began almost a year ago, about 37 coal faces have collapsed because of fire or convergence. That destruction could have been avoided. Although the NUM is trying to safeguard 20 pits, other coal faces have been collapsing right, left and centre. The miners are destroying their own facilities. From where will the money come to recreate those facilities in new pits?

The hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) said that many pits could be made economic if we spent more money on them. We already spend £700 million a year on capital investment in the industry. Further, there are deficit and and other grants payable to the board. The coal industry is pre-empting too much of the nation's wealth. What about the rest of industry, including high technology industry, which requires money? It is being neglected.

The hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Thomas) mentioned pit closures. I should like to go through all the points he made with him. I have also received documents from Gavyn Davies of Simon and Coates and from David Metcalf. It is not for us to argue during this short debate about what should happen now and what should be taken into account. When the coal board regains the confidence of the mining communities after the dispute, it is for the NCB to reach the right conclusions about the industry. I hope that when the strike is over, the board's finances will be reconstructed. The board is completely and technically insolvent, and much of its debt will have to be written off.

Mr. Nellist: How can the hon. Gentleman say that pits are uneconomic?

Mr. Skeet: The coal board exists only because the taxpayer is prepared to subsidise it enormously. It is subsidised much more than any other industry, and the public are becoming fed up with it. The coal board survives only because the public are prepared to pay higher prices for electricity than they need do. Everyone knows that that is true. The Government have been able to get through this winter successfully because more than 18 per cent. of our power is produced by nuclear and oil power stations, and we have obtained cheap, imported coal. I acknowledge that British coal is becoming more competitive as the pound falls against the dollar. However, we must remember that to keep British prices competitive for the consumer, we must have some imports.

[Mr. Skeet]

During our debates on the Coal Industry Act 1980, the Government talked about their hopes for the profitability of the industry by 1983-84. When that time arrived, the coal board was no nearer profitability. We were then told that there could be a vast expansion in the mines and that we had many years of reserves. But, of course, that was not true. We have also been told that we should invest heavily in the industry because we have security of supply. We have had no such thing. We had trouble with the mining community in 1971-72, interruptions in coal supplies in 1973 and 1974, and serious disruption in supplies in 1984 and 1985.

Finally, may I say this to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy and the Government: we must remember the Government's responsibility to the nation to ensure that we have enough stocks to see us through the winter, and to ensure that the prices charged for that fuel are reasonable.

Mr. Ray Ellis (Derbyshire, North-East): This debate has been like nearly all other debates. At least the Government's track record is consistent. When they first took office in 1979, they started to blame everything on previous Governments, and five and half years later they are still doing it. I do not absolve from my strictures any Government, past, present or to come, who will sterilise vast tracts of the nation's precious coal wealth underground for the sake of temporary economic expedience.

I would prefer to consider the acquired wisdom of the ages. Let us start with Lord Stockton. He had recently been in the headlines for attacking the Government's monetary policies. I refer to the days when he was Britain's Prime Minister — "Supermac". He went to Washington to speak to the Government on Capitol Hill on behalf of Britain. He told the Yanks that they could not compare their economy to ours. They are fortunate and have the benefits of farmlands, forests and mineral wealth. In Britain, he pointed out, the only thing that we have is fish around our shores, the coal under our feet and the skills of our workpeople. His words to the Senate were:

"Our greatest asset is the quality of our workforce".

Our skills in industry enable Britain to survive and compete. Of the three important things—fish, coal and skill—the Government have discarded all three.

Macmillan went to the United States to defend Britain —MacGregor has been brought from the United States to destroy Britain. The roots of the miners' strike must lie in the series of deliberate acts of provocation committed by MacGregor on behalf of the Government. They have sought a battle, provoked a battle and, by the spirits, they have got a battle. No doubt they will argue that they did not want to destroy the coal mining industry, but intended only to destroy the spirit of the workers. Events have shown that they cannot have one without the other. The day will never come when we have a quiescent work force in Britain that will accept the stupid diktats that come from the monetarist policy of the Prime Minister.

No one in the NCB, and certainly no one in the Government, would have believed that the great bulk of the miners would still be out when the strike approached its first anniversary. However, the miners are still out, and it is not because they have been hypnotised by Arthur Scargill or anyone else. It is because they see that the continued existence of their pit is the only alternative to generations of abject poverty.

They are not on strike because they are masochists or because they are enamoured of being locked away from daylight underground, scrabbling for a living on their hands and knees and eating coal dust. Like the Prime Minister, they see no alternative. There is no other hope. Since 1979, they have seen the steelworks decimated, jobs lost in their communities, in the service industries for which they had hopes for their kids, in the Health Service and in education. They have seen whole factories packed up in crates to be sent off to be used by our competitors. They have seen the Government busily exporting whatever other alternative employment there has been.

It is indisputable that the logic of the Prime Minister's monetary policy taken to its conclusion decrees that there can be no reversal of the trend of constant grinding down until the living standards of ordinary British working people are driven below those of the peasants in Korea, Hong Kong and Hanoi. There are many on the Government Benches who know this to be true and some who applaud it.

I can give an enlightening example of the thinking behind the talk, of the philosophy of the chairman of the coal board and the Government who imported him. It can be found in Mr. MacGregor's choice of words—if they are his. Earlier in the strike, Mr. MacGregor manipulated words, and offered the word "beneficial" as the criterion for pit closures. The Prime Minister applauded it and repeated it here. However, she got that word from her study of Victorian values. In 1848, when giving evidence to a public inquiry, the agent for the Countess of Durham, who owned 23 coal mines, objected to the abolition of child labour underground on the grounds that it would not be "beneficial". If anybody has been in any doubt as to what this dispute has been about, they should know now.

The Government's policies are debasing Britain, and selling us short. There are some on the Government Benches who know that this is so and disagree with it. They should assert themselves to ensure that the trend is reversed. They should start now, tonight, by voting with us to ensure that the Prime Minister is compelled to tell MacGregor to get the coal board back to the negotiating table, in the interests not only of the miners but of the future of the nation.

Mr. David Ashby (Leicestershire, North-West): As the House knows, a large number of coal mining constituencies are represented by Conservative Members, and that can only be because a large number of miners voted for this Government.

In this debate, we have heard what can only be described as a confidence trick deployed by the Labour party—a sleight of mouth if not of hand. No doubt, when the hon. Member for Midlothian (Mr. Eadie) winds up, we shall hear not only about the sweat of the brow but about starving miners, one of the great confidence tricks perpetrated on the British people. We have heard of food being sent from Poland—food that would be better sent to Ethiopia. I have not seen any starving miners. They all seem to be as well-padded as I am.

Mr. Flannery: The hon. Gentleman has never seen a miner.

Mr. Ashby: Of course I have—I have a mining constituency.

This confidence trick has been so well carried out that the Leader of the Opposition had to tell the Russians that the miners were not starving. That is a measure of the untruths that have been coming from Labour Members.

Another untruth is the use of the word "vindictive". The Government are said to be "vindictive". This is said to be a "vindictive" policy. It would be vindictive if the Government were to say that there was no more money for the industry and that they were going to stop supporting it. Instead, we are supporting it in a way that the Opposition never did, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State told the House today.

The other word that we have heard is "provocation". Apparently it was a provocation to appoint as chairman of the NCB one of the most knowledgeable men in the mining industry who, at the age of 73, has been in mining throughout almost all his life and who has more knowledge of the industry in his little finger than most Opposition Members have in their bodies. Apparently it is a provocation to refuse to give in to economic madness. If that is provocation, let us have a bit more of it.

My constituency includes two minefields—the south Leicester minefield and about 80 per cent. of the south Derbyshire minefield—[Interruption.] I apologise to the House. I meant, of course, coalfield.

Mr. Flannery: The hon. Gentleman is in a minefield, all right.

Mr. Ashby: It may be one, I agree.

In south Leicestershire, only 30 out of 6,000 miners are on strike. The men there insisted that they would continue to work until there was a ballot. They demanded a ballot in Leicestershire. There was no ballot, so they continued to work. Because they have chosen to work, they are subjected to violence and intimidation. Villages in north-west Leicestershire have suffered at the hands of hordes of pickets from as far afield as Kent. They damage gardens. They urinate in gardens. They make life quite impossible for the people who live in those villages. Shops have been broken into. There has been a general aura of intimidation and violence in the area.

The resolve of my constituents who work in the industry has not been broken, and I should tell the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) that Mr. Scargill — [Interruption.] I call him "Mr. Scargill", although we keep hearing from Opposition Members about "MacGregor". There seems to be no politeness among the Opposition. What is more, it is surprising how, when a Government supporter who represents a mining constituency is on his feet, the noise begins to come from the Opposition. We are seeing exactly the intimidation in the House that we see outside.

When Mr. Scargill visited Rawdon colliery in my constituency, he stayed for only about five minutes. The miners bundled him into a car and made him leave.

Mr. Flannery: Intimidation.

Mr. Ashby: I ask why Mr. Scargill is loathed by Leicestershire and south Derbyshire miners to the extent that he is. It is because he has linked the NUM closely with unprecedented intimidation and blackmail. He has destroyed one of the finer unions. He has destroyed villages, pitting father against son and brother against brother—all for a spurious claim about the supposed destruction of pits and jobs which is not sustained by the facts. In Leicestershire, it is known that the Government and the NCB have stood by their pledges. The board is going ahead at Asfordby, for example, and the Government are providing the capital.

Mr. Flannery: The taxpayer.

Mr. Ashby: Leicestershire miners know that the precondition of the NUM not to discuss the closure of pits on economic grounds flies in the face of reason. They know that that is why the Labour party closed so many pits when they formed the Government.

Mr. Flannery: By agreement.

Mr. Ashby: They also know that the NCB has negotiated seven times and failed seven times because the NUM would not discuss the very heart and core of the matters needing to be discussed. Seven meetings later, the NUM has the cheek to say that it has no preconditions. It says that, but it also says that it will not talk about the closure of pits on economic grounds. That seems to be the prime precondition that the NUM and Mr. Scargill are putting forward.

It is Mr. Scargill who has not given an inch in the last 11 months. He has perpetrated a confidence trick on the nation by saying that he has no preconditions. I say that that is a cruel and heartless confidence trick played on the many who pray for the end of this madness.

Mr. Scargill talks about the decimation of whole villages because they are dependent on mining. If they are, why not put NUM money, as National Coal Board Enterprises Ltd. has put its money, into profitable ventures which diversify industry in those areas, instead of putting it, as it has done, into Luxembourg banks? Why not unite with and inspire local authorities positively to improve their towns?

We have seen Corby recover from the loss of its steel industry, and it has recovered very well. Coal areas recover from pit closures, but that recovery needs a positive attitude and not a negative one.

Given a partnership between all, everyone can benefit. In my constituency, Coalville has lost one pit and is close to losing another. Vigorous efforts have been made with National Coal Board Enterprises Ltd and with the European Coal and Steel Community—and we could do with NUM money as well—to revitalise the area and to look for new industries and jobs to replace those being lost. Instead, we find that the NUM is so busy playing power politics that it forgets about the very people whom it purports to represent.

I also wonder about the resolve of some of these areas. Many of them have Labour councils. I wonder whether those areas have the resolve to provide the extra industry that is required.

Everyone should get together. We must see NUM money injected into these areas as well. Let us build for the future.

7.47 pm

Mr. Michael Welsh (Doncaster, North): At the outset, I want to put the record straight, because the Secretary of State made yet another announcement today to the effect that Arthur Scargill wanted every pit to stay open until the last tonne of coal had been brought out. That is quite wrong. No one who knows anything about mining would make such a statement. When a mine ends production, a certain amount of coal must be left to support the roofs so that the chocks can be removed. Arthur Scargill, to my knowledge, has never said that, and I am interested to know from where the right hon. Gentleman picked up that assertion. If it is not the case and the right hon. Gentleman made it up, I hope that he will not repeat it, because it is a foolish statement and not worthy of any man, even of his character.

I want also to put the record straight about Arthur Scargill. It must be emphasised that he takes his orders from the national executive. As a member of that executive, I happen to know what goes on there. Arthur only carries out its wishes.

I should like to make another correction for the record. The Secretary of State said that Arthur Scargill was holding on to meet ACAS to delay negotiations. ACAS telephoned the national executive of the TUC at about 1.45 pm on Friday and asked to see Arthur, Mick McGahey and Peter Heathfield. The information came by telephone. ACAS asked to see Arthur, not the other way around. I attended the meeting when Arthur gave ACAS the reply "information?" I do not wish to make a point about that, just to set the record straight.

The dispute is about the right to work. The NUM believes that it should have that right and the Government do not. The NUM has written to the NCB asking for negotiations without preconditions many times and the board has refused. On 1 February the board asked the NUM to provide a basis for negotiations. The NUM therefore set down five issues. They were discussions on "Plan for Coal" — the board agrees on that — future collieries and units, the five collieries threatened with immediate closure, the 6 March 1984 proposals and an amnesty. The NUM sent that agenda only because it was asked to do so by the NCB but, as far as I know, the NCB has not replied.

The Government and the NCB want to close uneconomic areas. If so, the first area that should be closed is Nottingham. It has been working all year and is making losses of millions of pounds. I am sure that Conservative Members do not want Nottinghamshire to be closed because it is uneconomic.

Mr. Andy Stewart: It is not true that Nottinghamshire is uneconomic.

Mr. Welsh: I am using NCB figures. To be fair to the NCB, all annual accounts in any industry are suspect because of how they are compiled. If units are closed on the basis of suspect accounts, nobody knows whether the units being closed are genuinely uneconomic. That is why there should be detailed negotiations between the NUM and the NCB to define an uneconomic unit.

It should not be forgotten that when a pit is closed, the one next to it is made uneconomic as a pit carries a lot of on-costs, which are thrown on the pit that remains open. Therefore, pits that are profitable according to their own accounts can be made unprofitable by closing the pits next to them. The result could be just one open pit because all of the others have been closed as a result of having to bear the on-costs of pits that were closed before them. Such a result would be daft and, as the NUM said, the issue should be discussed in more detail.

When pits are closed, shaft capacity is closed. Demand for coal will increase towards the end of the century but it cannot be met as is the case with a factory. It is possible to get out of a pit only what the shaft capacity allows. Moreover, the critical path of a pit takes 12 to 15 years to meet increased demand.

One of the great issues is the NCB's right to manage. The Government are not asking that it be allowed to manage, they are asking that MacGregor be allowed to dictate. That is a different kettle of fish. They are asking that he should be allowed to dictate just as the Prime Minister dictates to her Cabinet and Back Benchers. I should like to give an example of management.

In 1940, I was pony driving at Bullcroft colliery when the west side went up. Management knew that there had been an explosion, and we had to send six lads in. When they went in there was a second explosion. That often happens underground. We sent in another team, which could get in only so far, and it found the first two lads who were dead. When it came to sending in another team to get the other four who we thought were dead, and most probably were, management came to the union and said, "Please order us to seal it off." We said, "Why do not you take the decision—you are management?" They replied, "Oh, but it's your pit an all, why don't you?" The union had to decide to seal off the corridor. That was probably the right decision but those four kiddies are still down there. We cannot expect managers just to manage pits. They must manage and work with the union through consultation, and more consultation, but that is not what the Prime Minister wants.

There is no such thing as the right to manage in an extraction industry. It is not possible to have a young manager coming in and saying, "Do this, do that." At a coal face he would ask the men, "Which is the best way to do it?" As to the right to manage, it should be done correctly. There should not be dictatorship, which is what MacGregor wants.

Mr. Spencer Batiste (Elmet): I am proud and privileged to represent a mining constituency in the Yorkshire coalfield. I hope that I share with the majority of right hon. and hon. Members the conviction and belief that coal should be at the centre of the provision of energy requirements for Britain long into the future.

However, that future can come only if the price charged by the industry is competitive and if the industry is profitable. An industry or company that is not profitable in the long term will never be able to protect or preserve the jobs of the people who work in it. That inevitably means that the coal industry must look to its future from investment rather than subsidy and that uneconomic pits must be closed, albeit within the framework of a proper consultation process.

Pit closures have always occurred and Opposition Members are right to say that circumstances are now different. The principal difference is that Arthur Scargill is president of the NUM. From the day of his election, he has been determined to have a strike. He has tried to do that through the democratic process and failed repeatedly.

As we have read in the newspapers during the weekend and this morning, the machinations of that man on the executive committee of the National Union of Mineworkers have led to the calling of this deeply undemocratic strike. He has not only denied to the rank and file members of his union the benefit of the ballot to which they are entitled; he has even manoeuvred his own executive so that the strike was called without the majority support of the members of the executive. Because the miners are a deeply democratic group of people this strike has inevitably opened up the deepest rifts within the mining community. It can only be enforced by intimidation and violence by the leadership of the union.

There have been various references to me during the course of the debate. I should like to put on record certain circumstances that were erroneously reported in The Times a couple of weeks ago. I am proud to be the president of the Yorkshire area of the Conservative trade unionist organisation and in that capacity will accept — [Laughter.] The laughter on the Labour benches masks the fear that lurks within them. They know that millions of ordinary trade unionists now vote for the Conservative party because their aims and objectives have been betrayed by the Labour party. I have always accepted invitations to speak to groups of miners, but I have never encouraged anybody to break away from the National Union of Mineworkers. Quite the contrary. When people come to me and say that they are dissatisfied with their officials or with their leadership in the NUM I say to them, "You stay in the NUM and fight for what you believe in." If people drop out of the union it will be for ever condemned to the extremists. Those who come to meetings say, "We are not Tories, but it is only the Tories who will stand up for those who wish to preserve their democratic rights."

Despite all the noise that we hear tonight from the Labour Benches and despite all their intimidation I shall continue, as will all my hon. Friends, to fight for the rights of people to work in the mining industry free from the intimidation of Arthur Scargill and his colleagues. It is those people who are really fighting for the future of the British mining industry. It is their courage and commitment to democracy within the NUM that is an inspiration to this country. It is also a signpost to the way forward. As yet further negotiations founder on Arthur Scargill's intransigence, these men are showing how to fight for the future of their industry.

Arthur Scargill boasts that he has not moved an inch since the strike began. There is a belief among Conservative Members of Parliament and in the country that whenever the return to work builds up steam Arthur Scargill calls for another set of abortive negotiations to try to set it back. All Conservative Members of Parliament believe that the best way for this strike to end is by means of a negotiated settlement. However, there must be only one more set of negotiations. That must be the one to end the strike. And there is no way for the strike to be ended unless at the top of the agenda is the closure of uneconomic pits. That is what the strike has been about from the very beginning.

There are also other important matters that the Government must consider. This strike is nearing its end. As everybody recognises, it has been lost. Therefore we must look to the future of this industry. We must consider what the Government need to do to reassure the people who have been working so hard to preserve that future. The Government must continue to reaffirm and confirm their commitment to investment in the industry in order to ensure that large scale, profitable production will be continued for many years ahead. The Government must continue to guarantee unequivocally to the working miners their fullest protection against intimidation — not just now during the strike, but against any victimisation in the years ahead after the strike is over. The Government must ensure that when the strike is over there is a general amnesty within the industry for those who have worked and for those who have not worked. Those coming back to work must be sure that they will be free from such pressures and that they will not lose either because they have worked or because they have not worked.

The Government must look again at the funding of National Coal Board Enterprises. This type of vehicle could be very successful in stimulating new jobs. The Government must also look at the work of the enterprise agencies which have been successful and try to pull them together by means of adequate funding. In areas such as mine all miners who wish to continue to work when their pits are closed will be offered jobs in other mines in the area. I believe that the NCB must look at the provision of a proper transport network so that people can remain in their communities while accepting jobs that are some distance away.

Mr. Lofthouse: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Batiste: No, I shall not give way to the hon. Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Mr. Lofthouse). I have a limited time in which to speak and I shall finish what I have to say. No amount of yobbo yelling from the Left will make me change my mind. Not only must the NCB provide a system of transport so that the fabric of those communities can be preserved, but it is also obliged——

Mr. Lofthouse rose——

The Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) has said definitely that he is not giving way.

Mr. Batiste: If you will give me extra time, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall have no fear about giving way to the Opposition, but I have promised to be brief. Because so many people may in the future live some distance away from their work—[Interruption.]

The Deputy Speaker: Order. I believe the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. McKay) has a point of order.

Mr. Allen McKay: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Will you please give a ruling upon whether the hon. Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) is either deliberately or unintentionally misleading the House?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As far as I could hear, the hon. Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) made no definite allegation against any other hon. Member.

Mr. Batiste: Because the future pattern may be that miners will live at a greater distance from their pits than has been traditionally the case, I believe that the NCB must look at the provision that it makes for the holding of branch meetings, both as to the timing and the facilities offered for those meetings.

Having listened to the debate and to the noise on the Labour Benches, appreciating that the face of the rabble they are demonstrating here is the same sort of face that they are showing in the coalfields to the members of the NUM, I am ever more proud that I am a Conservative representative of a mining constituency and I am ever more determined to fight against the abuses of democracy that, unfortunately, in this day are typified by the Labour party.

8.6 pm

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): Already during the debate I have noticed that Conservative Members have accused my hon. Friends and me of noise and rowdiness. The charge is unjust. At the beginning of the debate my right hon. Friend the Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) was virtually shouted down. No Conservative Member has been shouted down by my hon. Friends and me, although from time to time we have been roused either to mockery or to irritation by some of the silly things that have been said.

I want to say a word or two about my constituency, which is where the strike began. During the past 12 months I have been horrified on numerous occasions by the deliberate attempts that have been made to provide disinformation, first by senior people in the coal board and then to a very real extent by the Secretary of State for Energy who said this afternoon that no decision had been taken to close Cortonwood colliery—that it had merely been suggested that its future should be reviewed. However, the Minister knows that all of the mining unions in the south Yorkshire area were brought together and told that Cortonwood would cease to produce coal in five weeks' time, that the men would be transferred and that the matter would then be put before the colliery review procedure — an absolute mockery of the supposed arrangement.

Conservative Members have said that nobody wants collieries to be closed. My hon. Friends and I accept that all collieries have a life and that collieries do close. The Minister is well aware that only a couple of miles away from Cortonwood is Elsecar colliery. That colliery ceased to produce coal towards the end of 1983. The miners in my constituency and in the constituencies of my hon. Friends recognised that Elsecar had to close. They were surprised when the National Coal Board guaranteed Cortonwood for five years and persuaded 100 men from the Elsecar colliery to transfer to Cortonwood. Some of those men had not even done a shift down Cortonwood before the decision was taken that it should cease to produce coal.

The hardship, sacrifice and bitterness that has developed during the past 12 months make this a very serious day for the House. We are entitled to demand that the Conservatives as well as my hon. Friends should treat this as a very serious matter.

I hope that when the Minister replies he will answer the point that I have just made and recognise that the Secretary of State may inadvertently have been indulging in the same disinformation as we have heard from the chairman and deputy chairman of the board and, in a letter in The Times, from the secretary to the board.

I was not surprised when the decision was taken. In a debate in December 1983 Labour Members were warning the Government that the situation in the mining industry was dreadful. We called on the Secretary of State to intervene to bring the parties together and to stop the crisis that we could see developing. He flatly refused to carry out what I thought then, and still think now, were his responsibilities. He was perhaps contributing to the situation that we have described today in which we allege that the strike was largely engineered and manipulated by the Government; that it was "a good investment" for the Government, if I may quote the Chancellor. It is no good the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, North (Mr. Skeet) waving his hand. The Chancellor of the Exchequer described the strike as "a good investment".

I do not know how much the strike has cost. The fiscal burden may be £5 billion. It will be an enormous sum. I am concerned not so much about the money that it has cost but the damage which has been done to the social chemistry of our coal fields. The immeasurable consequences of the dispute which have already been described are such as should make any intelligent sensitive politician aware of the enormity of the events.

A situation has developed in areas such as my own which a year ago none of us, not even the most experienced in public life, could have anticipated. Problems have been created that some of us will have to try to resolve. It is about time that Her Majesty's Government contributed to the settlement that they pretend they seek.

I was hopeful after the talks that resumed recently that there would be movement. But the fact remains—here I think that I am quoting the general view of NACODS, the association with which I am involved, and it is a view widely shared in the mining communities generally—that a settlement was in sight until No. 10 intervened. Nothing has been said from the Conservative Benches which in any way removes such suspicions which some of my hon. Friends may regard as a certainty.

The strike has gone on long enough. The miners who are on strike know that it has gone on long enough. I spoke to miner after miner in Swinton, Silverwood, Cortonwood miners welfare and in a hostelry yesterday at Rawmarsh frequented by members of the Kilnhurst NUM. Every one of them agrees with me that it is time that the strike was over. But they want to walk back to their pits. They are not prepared to be subjected to abject humiliation. They are not prepared to be treated like Argentine conscripts in the Falklands war. Those men have put up with more than any Conservative Member can begin to imagine. They are in debt to their eyeballs. They have suffered hardship.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South) rose——

Mr. Hardy: No, I shall not give way.

Mrs. Currie rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is obviously not giving way.

Mr. Hardy: Some of my hon. Friends have been sitting here all day hoping to speak in this debate. The hon. Lady comes in late and then expects to get the headlines. I am not giving way for one reason and that is that while I hope that I shall never behave churlishly in the House, if I were to give way to the hon. Lady, I would feel tempted, when she sat down, to use the same response that one of the Scottish Members offered her the other day.

I intervened in the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) and in the speech of the Secretary of State to try to clear up one important matter. It is important, and questions remain. The insistence of the Government or the board—I am not prepared to argue which is responsible — is that the NUM must write out in surrender terms that it accepts that collieries will be closed. That is a contradiction to or a conflict with the agreement about which Ministers—I include the Prime Minister—have boasted since before Christmas.

If the NUM is to accept that collieries are to close without regard to the review procedures and the independent element which is firmly part of the NACODS agreement, the members of NACODS will definitely feel that their agreement is rendered worthless. They are increasingly angry because they are coming to believe that they have been led astray and used by a rather ruthless Administration.

If the Minister wants to see the situation degenerate further he will allow that uncertainty to continue. If he can relieve that uncertainty he will create a climate in which urgent negotiations can begin and a settlement achieved. That settlement is so urgently needed that the Minister should secure approval to clarify the matter before the debate ends.

We expect collieries to close. I have a number of collieries in my constituency and some of them have a short life. I do not know the score today, but the numbers returning to work in the collieries in my area are lower than the average in Yorkshire. When someone makes a critical analysis—a detailed history—of the dispute they will realise that the pits where few men have returned happen to be situated in areas of high unemployment.

I can understand the men in my area not being eager to return to work because they know that when their pit closes, as Cortonwood was supposed to close, a huge additional unemployment burden will be created in an area where one person in three is unemployed and where four out of five of our young people are idle.

Our people know that their pits will close but they should be closing in due time in a proper season after we have had some opportunity to create the alternative industry and employment that we need. For the Government to close collieries in areas where one in three is unemployed is foolish. It justifies one of the powerful arguments used in the industry that in some cases it may seem expensive to keep a colliery open but it can be far more costly to close it, particularly given the enormous social and other costs that are incurred.

The Minister must carry out a fine task. He must balance whether it is wise to close or keep open a pit. The NUM and my association recognise that the Government have not given adequate attention to that factor. We do not want to be merely remittance areas—areas where once there was a pride in work, a low level of unemployment and a real social stability. We do not want to get rid of that and become merely remittance areas to which the affluent parts of the country will offer a grudging dole.

There is a future for our area if we have a wise Administration. But a Government who have allowed the dispute to go on as long as it has, who have allowed such costs to be incurred as have been incurred, who have seen the bitterness and trouble we have had to bear in our areas, have so far not been very wise and it is about time that they were.

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): This is a debate which the Opposition leaders clearly wish had not taken place. Traditional Labour voters have been appalled at the fence-sitting of Labour leaders over the miners' strike. They have failed to condemn the worst violence that we have seen over the past 50 years in industrial history. They have failed to tell the nation that my constituents and others should have a right to a ballot before we had this appalling carnage in the mining industry. They have failed to protect the welfare of those who are still in striking areas who fear to go to work because of the vengeance of the mob on themselves and their families if they do so. They have failed to support the police in upholding the rule of law and people's right to work.

In their efforts to be all things to all men, the leaders of the Labour party have let down their traditional supporters, and they know it. Instead, they have used the strike for their own political ends, just as blatantly as the president of the NUM. They have tried to build up in miners' minds the feeling that it is not a strike against the NCB, but a strike against the Prime Minister and the Tory Government. They know that that is wrong, but they are making political capital at the expense of their supporters' jobs.

Every fair-minded thinking person knows that the generous pay and redundancy terms and the outstanding investment proposed in the industry prove that the Labour Members are wrong, yet Mr. Scargill and the Labour party continue to bluster. Mr. Scargill said recently:

"There is increased determination on the part of miners to stay on strike and win this dispute."

That is not true. Mr. Scargill knows that it is not true and today's figures of thousands of miners going back to work prove that it is not true.

The days of bluster and rant by the leadership of the NUM are almost over and it should be the duty of the Labour party, whose conference last year was so much an Arthur Scargill benefit match, to tell the president of the NUM just that. The alternative is to let the industry bleed and to build fear and resentment in the miners who are still on strike, and to leave them with despair and anger.

On behalf of working miners in my constituency, who have a divided union as a result of what has happened, I express anger against the president of the NUM and the spineless Labour Opposition who have supported him. Miners in my area were and are proud of their union, but they see it dragged down, split from top to bottom, sacrificed——

Mr. Nellist: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I understand that the rules of debate give you authority to rule that something is repetitious or that an argument has been presented for the second, third or fourth time in a debate. The hon. Member for Newark (Mr. Alexander) is reading the same Tory brief that other Conservative Members have already read.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Alexander: It is perfectly proper to say that miners are being sacrificed on the altar of one man's crusade against the Prime Minister and the Government and that that man is being propped up by violent mobs of pickets.

The Labour party, by giving Mr. Scargill support, is part of the tragedy. As a loyal Opposition, Labour Members should have stood up for democracy and decency in one of their most traditional heartlands. They have let their own people down and they have let the country down. Their motion deserves to fail.

8.23 pm

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): The House cannot negotiate an end to the dispute, but we can focus attention on what has happened and the public can determine for themselves which party is anxious to get an honourable settlement of the dispute and which party is anxious to exacerbate the dispute to humiliate men and women who have been on strike for 11 months.

I speak only from a constituency point of view, but among the outstanding features of the dispute are the tenacity and loyalty expressed by the communities involved. The men on strike have been fortified by their womenfolk. In my humble opinion, the women have stood behind their men and sustained them. I speak for strike centres at Steelend, Oakley, Blairhall, High Valleyfield, Kincardine and Woodmill.

The leader of the Liberal party came to my constituency, but did not go to one strike centre or near one pit. Yet the Liberal party will be pronouncing on the strike tonight. The SDP Bench is empty. Where is the hon. Member for Stockport, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) who told us what we should do and what we should tell our people? What is the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) doing talking about courage? My God, if we turned to him for courage we would be hard put to find it. We have seen courage in the mining areas against a management that has violated trust. I believe that Mr. MacGregor was put there to violate trust.

It is the anniversary of a pit closure in my constituency that was caused not by the strike, but because Mr. MacGregor in his American way, said, "I run a decentralised industry." He told the area directors that they must get their share of a 4-million tonnes cut in production and their share of a reduction in the labour force. We saw that in Dunfermline before the strike began. We saw it in the closure of Bogside. My hon. Friends know that I have probed the reasons for that.

Labour Members have asked for an inquiry into the operation of the coal industry in Scotland. The Government will cast some of the blame on the NUM, but will they give us an investigation into the management of the coal industry in Scotland? Will they let any investigation examine what cut in production Mr. Albert Wheeler had to obtain in Mr. MacGregor's decentralised management?

People who want a settlement of the dispute should look at what the miners had before 6 March. One young man in a strike centre said to me a few weeks ago, "We are on strike for something that we thought we had on 6 March in relation to the review procedure." Are the Government seeking to go back on that procedure? It was an agreement on how collieries would close. The NUM has fought to preserve that.

We could argue from now until doomsday about how to define an uneconomic pit. The situation will be settled only if the parties are willing to get round the table.

The Under-Secretary of State for Energy who is responsible for the coal industry nods his head, but the Secretary of State for Energy had the temerity earlier to ask my right hon. Friend the Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme), in effect, to deliver the NUM, and its leader in particular, to the negotiating table. If the Secretary of State had done so much to try to get a settlement as my right hon. Friend has done, we would have had a settlement long ago. The Secretary of State has spent billions of pounds in fortifying the dispute, but could not spend 10p on a telephone call to bring the parties together.

It may be said that it is within my right hon. Friend's gift to suggest the terms and conditions upon which the NUM executive as a whole would go to the negotiating table, but what terms and conditions can the Minister obtain from Mr. MacGregor? Will the Minister say that he can get Mr. MacGregor to the negotiating table only if the NUM virtually capitulates? Is that what is in his mind? It is a long time since I have been involved in trade union negotiations, but I know that no union worth its salt would put itself in the position that the Minister suggests.

If the Minister wants a solution to the dispute, he and the Secretary of State for Employment should use their good offices to bring the parties together. We are entitled to ask what the Secretary of State's intentions are with regard to the dispute. I think that the Opposition recognise that the dispute has gone on for too long. In my constituency I have played a part in keeping my folk out. It is no good the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland tut-tutting. If he wants to intervene he should get up and speak. I will tell him why I have done that. That is the way to preserve dignity and peace in my community. It is also the way to preserve unity and self-respect. I shall certainly not advise those miners to crawl back. If Conservative Members were in the same position as me, they would, on analysis, give the same advice.

If the Secretary of State wants a solution instead of acrimony and if he does not want to humiliate people, particularly in Scotland, he will get the parties round the table. But if he wants bitterness and strife, they are also in his gift. I for one will not advise my folk to go back to work. They came out together, and they will go back together. That is the prescription for unity, understanding and self-respect in my area. The Under-Secretary of State keeps interrupting from a sedentary position, but he is not the Scottish Minister responsible for industry—because that Minister has not been present—and there are not many pits in Argyll.

We are arguing about the cohesion and dignity of our people. Against a background of colossal and rising unemployment in Dunfermline and Fife generally, my miners fear that if they lose their jobs there will be no other jobs to go to. Of course, we have had pit closures which have been negotiated. I was unhappy about some of them, but they were negotiated against a background of sustained employment in the area. However, if pits close now there is no alternative employment. Unemployment is high in those areas, and is growing under this Government.

I say to Conservative Members that the nation must judge who really wants an honourable and dignified solution to the dispute. I passionately want that, but I also want everyone to go back. I do not want people to be dismissed, potentially for life, because of the action that they took on picket lines. I want dignity and understanding, and I want my folk to realise that to preserve that, they must stay united and stay out until the Government bring the parties round the table and obtain a solution.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): The hon. Member for Dunfermline, West (Mr. Douglas) comes from a mining constituency and spoke with some of the passion that has been a hallmark of many of the speeches made so far. He referred to the bitterness and strife that have also regrettably been a hallmark of the dispute.

Perhaps not surprisingly, but nevertheless regrettably, that bitterness and strife have often been reflected in the debate.

Recrimination, or going over the history, is no way forward to the solution that all of us want. I do not believe for a moment that recriminations can do the future of the coal industry any good. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, West, referred to the difficulties of unemployment in Fife. That cannot have been helped by yesterday's announcement of the closure of Frances colliery, at a cost of about 500 jobs. But the recriminations have already started.

Albert Wheeler, the Scottish director of the coal board, has blamed the striking miners who, he has claimed, gave the board little or no assistance to control an underground fire. In response, a union official has said that the board did not approach the union until Thursday about undertaking work that could have saved the coal face, and that after the union had offered to start preparatory work, the NCB refused to meet it. I am in no position to judge whose version is closest to the truth, but I know that a failure to establish and build upon a community of interest —an interest that must be shared by both employees and management—has led to the loss of that pit and that recriminations will not repair the damage——

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian) rose——

Mr. Wallace: I would normally give way to the hon. Gentleman, but I want to be brief so that other hon. Members can speak.

The continued dispute can only increase the likelihood of such damage being repeated elsewhere. Would that this House could help to foster that community of interest as much as it emphasises division. I believe that there must be a community of interest. Because of our resources of coal, it must play a major role in supplying our long-term energy needs. As a result of the dispute the industry faces dangers from the loss of coal faces and because the coal-firing scheme that was so successful in 1983 has—I am sure that the Minister will confirm this—been nowhere near as successful in 1984 for industrialists wishing to convert from oil to coal.

The dispute has also been an absolute gift to those who propose further expansion of the nuclear industry. Many of us who fear that further expansion and who are very cautious about it because of the understandable questions hanging over safety and the environment, feel that the continuation of the dispute serves only to strengthen the hand of those who would like greater dependence on nuclear energy. Recriminations cannot bring the dispute to an end. We must seek ways of finding that common ground.

There are two further unacceptable ways of ending the dispute. First, it would be unacceptable to pin everything on a gradual return to work. That could be only a very ragged way of proceeding. As has been said, it ultimately would not succeed, because significant pockets of miners throughout the country would not go back. Secondly, it would be wholly unacceptable to bring about an end to the dispute by crowing about victory wrought at the expense of rubbing the miners' noses in the dust. I regret that one or two Conservative Members have said that that might be acceptable to them. I hope that that is not generally true of them. Indeed, the hon. Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester) said that talk of victory would not help the way forward. The right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) has said that we must seek a decent and honourable settlement, and we should be considering how to achieve such a settlement.

The Labour party's motion welcomes the NUM's decision to seek immediate resumption of negotiations with the NCB without any preconditions. On the radio this morning, the president of the NUM said that he would not be party to an agreement that took economic considerations into account. That must be termed a precondition and makes any further meaningful negotiations a non-starter. It is not a radical departure to suggest that economic considerations should be brought into play. Reference has already been made to the Coal Industry Act 1977. The leader of the Labour party has said that commercial considerations must now be taken into account.

The right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), when he was Secretary of State for Energy, said:

> "I have never found the NUM in any way unreasonable where closures are necessary because of exhaustion or because pits are out of line in economic terms." — [Official Report, 4 December 1978; Vol. 959, c. 1015-6.]

Economic conditions must be high on the agenda and there must be meaningful discussions on how to determine the future of pits which are said to be uneconomic.

The NACODS agreement did allow for some review. It is essential for any negotiations about pits which the coal board regards as uneconomic to include full consultation at local level. Each pit depends upon its local conditions, geology and social conditions. Management or diktat from the centre in London cannot guarantee the stability of the coal industry.

Mr. Cambell-Savours: Which way will the hon. Gentleman vote?

Mr. Wallace: If the hon. Gentleman waits, he will learn.

At one stage during exchanges between the two Front Benches, I thought that there was a meeting of minds but there was a problem of semantics. "Plan for Coal" says:

> "Some pits will have to close as their useful economic reserves of coal are depleted."

That item must be on the agenda. I should welcome it if the hon. Member for Midlothian (Mr. Eadie) could assure the House that he and his right hon. Friends have brought influence to bear on the NUM to accept that.

Obviously, some pits with uneconomic capacity will be withdrawn from production, but there is a future for the coal industry. We must have new capacity through new investment. We welcome the assurance that more funds will be made available to National Coal Board Enterprises Ltd., but that is not all that is required.

It is said that the Labour movement closed about 300 pits, but that was when there was more employment. The fear in mining communities today is that the pit closures are taking place at a time of very high unemployment. The recession which brought about the fall in demand for coal also makes the miners afraid for their jobs and for their families. The failure of the Conservative Government to acknowledge that that is what is causing the fears in the mining areas means that we shall not be able to support them in the Lobby tonight.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): We are left wondering exactly what the Liberal party's position is. It is certain that they are standing in the middle of the road again and will probably be run down.

The hon. Member for Dunfermline, West (Mr. Douglas), who spoke with such passion, said that the strike had gone on far too long. I agree with him. Anyone who has studied the mining communities and the miners will be in no doubt that they are among the finest people in the country. They are loyal and dedicated, and believe in what they are doing. The sad thing is that this time, as once before, to their regret, they are not speaking and acting with one voice. One must ask why.

I can accept that in some instances one can describe a few people as scabs. As an ex-trade unionist I understand the language. But to describe a substantial number as scabs in unrealistic. I was a member of the Transport and General Workers Union and proud to be so.

I feel sad about the whole business. We should be maximising our skills instead of fighting amongst ourselves. We should be asking why so many miners are unwilling to follow their leadership. That is the question which should be asked in the mining communities. If the miners' case is so good, and believed to be so good, why was the leadership unable to convince so many of its own active members? We are not talking about individuals who are inactive in the union, but about members who are active. What is wrong?

Opposition Members should be considering how the NUM executive has handled the affair. No one can get any pleasure out of watching one of our finest unions destroying itself. I get no pleasure from that — [Interruption.] Opposition Members can make as much noise as they like, but I get no pleasure from such an event. The country needs trade unions that are responsible and organised, in the same way as it needs responsible and organised management. We cannot run a modern democratic country without a balance.

What has brought about the present situation? On occasions during the dispute any reasonable person would have thought that there was a solution. In the past an answer would have been found.

The hon. Member for Dunfermline, West suggested an inquiry into the way in which the coal board has been run in Scotland. I am certain that within the NUM an inquiry will take place into the way in which the executive has handled the dispute. That will come about because the ordinary members who are dissatisfied with the outcome, the protracted nature of the strike and the awful suffering that it has caused will ask, "What went wrong? Why didn't we have some answers? Why, when we looked about to find a solution, didn't we find one?"

The answer is that the NUM does not have the calibre of leadership that it enjoyed in the past. It does not have the quality of conciliation that it has enjoyed in the past. I go further, it does not have the people with the political nous to know that one does not make political speeches in the middle of a delicate strike if one is striking about matters with an industrial base.

The great mistake made by the NUM executive was to allow its spokesperson to decide who wears the cap and to misrepresent its case. Its case has been badly misrepresented. It has been presented to the country, the people and the Government as a battle against entrenched Tory doctrines. — [Interruption.] Opposition Members will have their opportunity, inside and outside the House, to put their views. I am putting the view of people in a non-mining constituency. I have no knowledge of mining, but I understand that when involved in delicate and difficult negotiations one does not stand up and divert attention from the real issue.

I have a high regard for the hon. Member for Midlothian (Mr. Eadie). He represents all that is good in industrial relations. I mean that sincerely. Without people of integrity on both sides, there is lack of trust.

The problems really started when the overtime ban was introduced. The problems within the NUM began when the union could not throughout accept the productivity deal. The time when some NUM regions accepted the productivity deal and began to make more money was the opportunity for the high productivity areas to become high income-earning areas.—[Interruption.]

While I know nothing about mining, I have studied the problems of the union. I know something of what goes on inside unions, and it is sad that the leaders of the NUM, who are the real culprits, have led their troops into a disastrous situation. Yet those same people are still making speeches that leave no room for an honourable compromise. There cannot be an honourable compromise when one side is clearly stating that it will not budge an inch.

If Opposition Members genuinely believe, as I am sure they do, that pits with an economic future are being scheduled for closure, they have an alternative. Those pits need not close. They could be taken over as miners' co-operatives, perhaps with some public assistance. I would not argue with that. If it is right to do it in other spheres, why not do it in mining?

The nationalised industry could not make a go of Scott Lithgow and it was taken over. I am not stressing privatisation on this issue. I am simply suggesting that there should be a middle ground on which all concerned —the Government, the NCB and the NUM—can stand comfortably. That will be possible only if we look for realistic and viable avenues or escape routes.

In this ghastly dispute, many people have been sacked because they have broken the law. I judge that that will be a more difficult problem to resolve, in terms of reinstatement, than some of the other issues about which I have spoken. After all, some of the crimes have been hideous. I accept that the more trivial ones should be dealt with in a more trivial way, but the really nasty ones cannot be overlooked.

We cannot ignore the fact that many policemen have been severely injured. The public would never forgive us or the Government if we did not acknowledge that the police, in carrying out the duties that they were instructed to perform—in other words, to maintain law and order —had been injured. Whatever one's view, it must be accepted that the police were doing their job. Nor must we forget that those policemen have families. We in this House have a duty and responsibility to them, particularly those among them who were injured.

That, if we are not careful, will sour the final stages of negotiation. We must watch that problem carefully because I caution hon. Members to reflect that it is unlikely that the public would accept a situation in which men convicted of serious crimes were allowed to demand reinstatement.

I agree with the hon. Member for Dunfermline, West that the dispute has gone on for far too long. It is time that the leadership of the NUM adopted realistic trade union negotiating postures.

8.54 pm

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Almost a year ago the National Coal Board announced its intention to reduce deep mined coal capacity in Britain by 4 million tonnes. I must at the outset put that in context.

I asked the Library to tell me the year when Britain last deep mined 97 million tonnes of coal. The Library officials had to go into the basement of the building to discover the answer, for the date was 1864. In other words, 121 years of history and sacrifice by miners and their families were threatened to be wiped away by the coal board's announcement on that occasion.

No wonder we have had the bitterest and longest national dispute there has been in this country this century. About 9,000 people have been arrested, 600 sacked and almost 200 put in prison, including the four strike leaders from Keresley colliery, Coventry, last Wednesday. That has all occurred in defence of 70,000 jobs in their own industry and 85,000 jobs which were due to be affected outside the industry by the proposed closure programme. The miners took their action not just for themselves but for the children, the school leavers, of this generation for whom those jobs will disappear, even if the existing miners are able to get transfers to other collieries.

This strike was provoked, and it has been prolonged, by the Tory Cabinet. We have heard of the so-called Ridley plan, a scheme drawn up by the present Secretary of State for Transport in the mid-1970s. It was designed to provoke this strike because at that time he saw the NUM as the main political enemy of a future Tory Government.

We have heard of the preparations that were made for cutting the benefits of starving families, for increasing coal stocks before the strike was provoked, for increasing the oil burn, for increasing the importation of coal, for increasing the use of non-union scab drivers by haulage firms and the use of highly mobile police squads, invented to deal with the dispute. We know of all those developments.

In recent days, however, events have shown that during the dispute the Prime Minister sought politically to intervene in an effort to carry out the real reasons why the strike was provoked—namely, to split the NUM as an effective trade union. Mr. David Hart, a leading adviser of the Prime Minister, said in The Times a few days ago that the main aim of the strike was to gain victory over Arthur Scargill. What is perhaps less well known is Mr. Hart's involvement in setting up the scab organisation, the national working miners' committee, meetings of which he attended on 11, 19, 25 and 28 August.

He, while in the payment of the Prime Minister's office, placed advertisements in the Daily Express, the Daily Mail and The Sunday Times, advertisements which were designed in the offices of Saatchi and Saatchi by Mr. Tim Bell, another adviser to the Prime Minister, the money having been provided by Sir Hector Laing, whose company gave £43,000 to the Tory party last year.

The promotion of the drift back to work by some miners has, throughout the dispute, particularly in the early stages of the strike, represented a Tory propaganda coup designed within No. 10 Downing street. It is clear that the Government bear responsibility for trying to split the NUM. However, that attempt to demoralise — to fracture, to use a word used by the Secretary of State— and to neuter the trade union movement is the real reason why the Chancellor of the Exchequer regards the cost of the strike as a worthwhile investment, paving the way for attacks on other trade unions.

From the Government's point of view, this dispute has nothing to do with economic or uneconomic pits, except perhaps in preparation for the privatisation of parts of the central Midlands coal field. Last year in this Chamber the Secretary of State said that the reason why the Government were trying to tackle the so-called uneconomic capacity of 12 per cent. of the coal fields was to save £275 million. In the last 11 months the Government have spent 20 times that, £5·5 billion, trying to defeat the strike.

Even if the dispute ended tomorrow on the terms set by the Government, everything else being equal, the Government would not be back in an economic position, until the year 2005. Where is the economics in that? Where are savings to be found from what has occurred? That £5·5 billion would have paid for a £25 a week increase in the dole packets of every registered person or for a £4 decrease in every taxpayer's contribution to the Revenue. To put it another way, £100 million—one week's Government spending—is enough to build a hospital, six large comprehensive schools and 1,000 council houses in a town the size of Coventry. The cost of this strike organised by the Government could have provided those much-needed public services for 55 towns the size of Coventry.

The Government and the NCB talk about economics and the need to get rid of uneconomic pits, but the coal board's accounts include the cost of subsidence, mainly in the Mansfield area of Nottinghamshire, the cost of early retirement for miners who have left the industry, interest charges and a rate of return back to the Government twice that of any other industry. If the Minister closed every pit in the country, he would still have to pay compensation for subsidence and early retirement, so those are not genuine costs on the present generation of miners. If those costs are removed from the accounts, instead of a loss of £6·20 per tonne, Cortonwood would show a profit of £5·50 per tonne. The Tories harp on uneconomic pits, but those are the true circumstances.

In the past 11 months I have been proud to be associated with miners and their families and with the other workers — the seamen, the power station workers, the railwaymen—who have supported them. I pay special tribute to the women of the coalfields. In the first week of the dispute Mr. MacGregor said that he would like to hear from the miners' wives. He never said that again. There are now 172 miners' wives support groups throughout the country. The Prime Minister has created—or re-created —a new generation of Socialist men and women in the coalfields. Those people have drawn lessons from the strike. They realise that there is a certain logic in the Government's argument. Since 1979, the Government have closed one factory in five in this country. They have increased unemployment to 3·3 million officially and 5 million in reality. They have reduced investment in manufacturing industry by 27 per cent. If there are fewer factories there is less need for steel and electricity, so there is less need for coal.

The real lesson of the past six years is this. If one thing has been utterly uneconomic for the working people of this country it is the capitalist system over which the Tory

[Mr. Dave Nellist]

Government preside. The system itself is uneconomic because it cannot afford jobs, homes, schools or hospitals. Under that system, for every £1 invested in Britain £2·50 goes to South Africa, Korea, Brazil and Argentina. For every £1 worth of machinery that wears out only 82p worth is replaced. The Tory solution is to cut the wages of working people, especially youth, so as to restore profits to their gaffers in manufacturing industry. That is why they want to destroy the trade union movement, beginning with the National Union of Mineworkers.

That strategy will not work. Mr. MacGregor was transferred from the British Steel Corporation to the National Coal Board on the personal recommendation of Lord Chapple to the then Secretary of State for Energy, now Chancellor of the Exchequer, but it will not destroy the NUM. One per cent. of the population has held the Government at bay for 11 months. Labour Members and working people are now asking themselves what would have happened if every member of trade unions affiliated to the TUC had given as much support to the miners as the wives and kids in the coalfields have. The Government would not have lasted four weeks. That is the lesson being absorbed by the Labour and trade union movement and it will rebound on the Tory Government in the months and years ahead.

Mr. Speaker: I call Mr. Alex Eadie.

Mr. Lofthouse: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the difficulty of the Chair on these occasions, but it may have escaped your notice that there has been no voice from the west Yorkshire coalfield in this debate, and the same seems to have been the case in previous debates. Is it not time that consideration was given to discontinuing the privilege and patronage accorded to Privy Councillors in giving them priority in these debates?

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. As more than 30 Opposition Members wished to speak, and in view of the content of the debate, would it be possible to arrange a further debate at very short notice?

Mr. Speaker: Fortunately, that is not a matter for me. I have done my best to balance the debate. Privy Councillors have a right to speak, but they have all acceded to my request for brevity. I call Mr. Eadie.

9.4 pm

Mr. Alexander Eadie (Midlothian): At the outset of my speech, I think that my right hon. and hon. Friends would like me to mention the role that my right hon. Friend the Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) has played in trying to get a negotiated settlement to the dispute. We in the Opposition want to put that on the record for this purpose. If the Secretary of State for Energy had put half the energy that my right hon. Friend has put in to try to resolve the dispute, we would not be debating this costly and damaging industrial dispute tonight.

We are in greater crisis since we last debated the matter in the House of Commons. The miners' funds have been sequestrated and put into the hands of the receiver. To put a trade union in the hands of a receiver is to break the law in a new way.

"It is not good for trade unions that they should be brought into contact with the courts, and it is not good for the courts . . . but where class issues are involved . . . it is impossible to pretend that the courts command the same degree of general confidence. On the contrary, they do not, and a very large number of our population have been led to the opinion that they are, unconsciously, no doubt, biassed."—[Official Report, 30 May 1911; Vol. 26, c. 1022.]

If any Conservative Members objects to that, I must inform him that those are not my words, but the words of Sir Winston Churchill in May 1911, in a debate in the House of Commons. He was Home Secretary at that time. His words are evidence of how, since 1911, the clock has turned back and our industrial relations have been polluted in the year of 1985 because the Government's policy ordains that industrial relations be conducted on the streets and picket lines.

Mrs. Currie: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Eadie: No, I shall not give way.

Mrs. Currie rose——

Mr. Eadie: In the last major debate——

Mrs. Currie rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is not giving way.

Mr. Eadie: In the last major debate that we had on the miners' strike, the Government defended their appointment of Mr. Ian MacGregor. I should like to ask the Secretary of State or the Under-Secretary whether the Government are still defending Mr. MacGregor after 11 months of one of the most costly industrial disputes in our industrial history. We said then and we are saying now that the appointment of Mr. MacGregor as chairman of the National Coal Board was a disaster. Not only was it provocative but it was a recipe for industrial conflict. It is even more bizarre now because since we last debated the dispute, Mr. MacGregor has chucked in his hand at trying to explain personally to the media what he is about and his current views, particularly on the miners' strike. Mr. Michael Eaton, the area director in Yorkshire, is the voice that we now hear on radio and the face that we now see on television as the NCB communicator because Mr. MacGregor cannot do it.

I can think of no other parallel in which the head of a nationalised industry is not only allowed to keep his job but has Government support and backing in such circumstances. When we last debated the matter, one of the Government's defences was that they were pursuing a policy of non-intervention in the dispute. We did not believe them; we still do not believe them. That guise and that deception cannot be trailered in today's debate. Not only are they interfering in this dispute, but they are preventing an honourable negotiated settlement. Mr. Geoffrey Kirk, a former public relations officer, who was sacked in November and then reinstated only to refuse his reinstatement, blew the gaff when he described how a consultant from Saatchi and Saatchi, Mr. Tim Bell, had been working with or for Mr. Ian MacGregor and how a Mr. David Hart, a freelance journalist, who apparently is not unknown in the portals of No. 10 Downing Street, has tripped in and out of NCB headquarters.

As an aside I should add that the House observed that, when one of my hon. Friends referred to the article in The Times and asked whether the Government agreed with Mr. Hart's remarks, the Prime Minister nodded yes and the Secretary of State for Energy nodded no. That is an example of the confusion among the Government Front Bench.

That brings me to Mr. Gordon Reece, the Prime Minister's adviser, who according to Mr. Kirk turned up at a "News at Ten" interview in which the chairman of the NCB was supposed to appear. Is it any wonder that "the Government echo", this invisible man, Mr. Ian MacGregor, keeps his job and gets Government support? The Government can now more openly be identified with interfering in achieving a settlement. The voice of the Prime Minister—a voice which is a triumph of social engineering—and those of her Ministers are evidence of that.

The NUM has stated that it wants to get back to the negotiating table without preconditions.

Mr. Rost rose——

Mr. Eadie: That would leave either side free to raise or discuss anything. It does not mean that one demands something before one starts. When playing chess, one does not forfeit one's queen the moment the game has started, but that is what the coal board is suggesting. There cannot be written preconditions if one asks for no preconditions before getting to the negotiating table.

Mr. Alexander: A few moments ago the hon. Gentleman referred to the press. Did he see the article in the Sunday Telegraph yesterday stating that of the 22 members of the NUM executive, 12 demanded a ballot before there should be a strike? The hon. Gentleman is a member of that executive. Did he support that call?

Mr. Eadie: I do not read the Daily Telegraph. However, if it has not dawned on the hon. Gentleman, I remind him that this dispute has continued for 11 months. To talk at this stage about a ballot, when we should be talking about a negotiated settlement, is completely irresponsible.

The House must be made aware of the origin of the phrase "no preconditions" as a basis for settling the dispute. It did not come from the NUM or the Labour party but from the NCB last year through the mouth of its chairman. Now that they have it, neither the NCB nor the Government want to know.

Another aspect of the dispute, the negotiating team, must be mentioned. The board called for changes in it. More than a fortnight ago the national executive of the NUM decided that the whole national executive would comprise the negotiating team. After both suggestions were carried out, derision was heaped from many quarters on the prospect of the entire national executive being involved, as if it was the first time that it had happened. However, it happened in 1972.

Mr. Rost rose——

Mr. Eadie: The dispute could have been settled three times but for Government intervention, and the Secretary of State knows that. If all parties could get round the negotiating table, we could resolve the dispute within 24 hours. There is a good precedent for that. I was present in 1972, when the national executive spent most of the day at the Department of Employment with the then Secretary of State.

Mr. Rost rose——

Mr. Eadie: The day culminated with all of us going to 10 Downing street where the dispute was settled. There was no tea and sandwiches because it was too late, but we got what we do not have now. All parties were willing to resolve the dispute, but then that was before the Conservative party was hijacked by the Thatcherite militant tendency. That was before the day when a Conservative Prime Minister boasted that she wanted to be known as the Prime Minister who broke the consensus in British politics. Confrontation not conciliation is one of our images of the Government. All the evidence shows that the NCB, at the Government's diktat, scuppered attempts to start negotiations last week and at the beginning of this week.

I have full copies of the correspondence that took place last week when the forerunner meeting to the entire national executive negotiating team was in London. There was a meeting between Mr. Peter Heathfield and Ned Smith, who works in industrial relations at the NCB, which lasted nearly four hours. They agreed on the parameters that could lead to negotiations being resumed and the strike being settled. However, eventually Mr. Ned Smith was dropped from the negotiating team, despite his willingness to see the negotiations through to a conclusion. He had given notice to leave the employ of the NCB in January. The allegation is that the NCB, with Government connivance, rattled on the parameters agreed by Peter Heathfield and Ned Smith.

Mr. Rost rose——

Mr. Eadie: I have evidence. The NUM was informed that the replacement was to be Mr. Merrik Spanton. He asked for an informal meeting on Tuesday 29 January. At that meeting all the ground that had already been covered with Ned Smith had to be gone over again. After three hours they had managed to draft an agenda, but then Mr. Spanton was called to the telephone, in the same room, and after his telephone conversation he changed his mind. The general secretary of the NUM had to take back the agenda that had been drafted.

Then we had what were described as talks about talks by post, despite the fact that all parties were in London to talk and reach an honourable negotiated settlement. It is absurd that Mr. Spanton should have written in a letter of 30 January that the National Coal Board had no way of recollecting the content of the agenda drawn up by him and Peter Heathfield, and asking that the agenda be forwarded again. His letter also stated that the talks had to include uneconomic capacity. There were four NCB representatives in that room, yet they claimed that they could not recall what was on the draft agenda. I refuse to believe that. They are not stupid men. I know some of them—[Laughter.] I know some of them, and may I say that Britain has the finest mining engineers. It is despicable that the Government should betray men in the way that I have described. I repeat that they are not stupid men, but they were forced to look stupid by superiors who want not a negotiated settlement, but nothing less than complete victory over the striking miners and the NUM.

However, the NUM was not to be deterred. On Friday 1 February, it submitted another agenda as a basis for resuming negotiations. The agenda had five points, the first of which related to "Plan for Coal". The agenda stated:

> "This proposal is based upon previous submissions by the Board which have been accepted by the Union."

There can be no argument about that. I speak with some authority, because I am a co-author of "Plan for Coal".

[Mr. Eadie]

Incidentally, although "Plan for Coal" provides for the closure of pits, it also deals with new capacity and new pits. Not one pit has been sunk during the lifetime of this Government. Without new pits, the industry will inevitably contract.

The second point on the agenda dealt with the future of collieries units. The House should pay close attention to this agenda, because it could be the basis of negotiations. The NUM stated:

"The Union's proposal takes account of the Board's own suggestions when we met with ACAS. This would provide for all matters relating to the future of Collieries Units to be dealt with in accordance with procedures operating prior to 6 March 1984"— on television, Mr. Eaton gilded the lily on the next point—

"and of course the Union have previously accepted an amendment to the procedures to provide for an Independent Review Body, and we feel that the broad recognition given to this proposal during informal discussions could lead to agreement in negotiations."

The third point on the agenda is about the five collieries, which have been mentioned in the debate. It says:

"The Union's proposal accepts that these five pits remain within the procedure on the understanding that undertakings given by the Board within the Procedure will be honoured. This new proposal also provides for any unforeseen major mining problems to be discussed in the normal way, and we feel this point is manifestly fair and sensible."

The 6 March proposals have also been mentioned in the debate, and they are the fourth point on the agenda, which says:

"The Union's proposal is, of course, a statement on the present situation and has been publicly acknowledged by the Board's spokesman, Mr. Eaton, in an Independent Radio News interview on 31st January."

From that there was the initiative about the 4 million-tonne capacity which is now out of date because it is doubtful that the industry could get back to 1 million tonnes once work begins. There is no argument about that.

There is then the problem of the amnesty. I understand that Mr. MacGregor has been running around the coal fields saying that only over his dead body will an amnesty be given. I listened carefully to what the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) said. He was not being so hard. He said that there were difficulties, as there are, but for the chairman of the NCB to say what he did is irresponsible.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Breach of the peace. Law breakers.

Mr. Eadie: I feel emotional about this matter because my father was a mining leader in 1926 and for eight years he was victimised because he was associated with the struggle to win recognition for the mining union.

Mr. Bruinvels rose——

Mr. Eadie: The union agenda says about the amnesty:

"It is inconceivable that in any discussions leading to a resolution of this dispute that the question of dealing with those men who have been dismissed in the course of the dispute cannot be a matter for discussion between the National Coal Board and the National Union of Mineworkers."

That is what Peter Heathfield said, and that is why I said that there was dirty work at the crossroads involving Ned Smith. Mr. Heathfield continues:

"In my meeting with Mr. Smith on the 21st January, it was acknowledged that the Union would pursue this matter when negotiations resumed."

We are not breaking new ground with this. The NUM proposals continue:

"It seems a matter of equity that the same principle applied in 1972 and 1974 be applied in the current situation."

There are already established procedures.

Mr. Peter Walker: As the hon. Gentleman has just given the impression that Mr. Ned Smith implied some approval on the point about the amnesty, I shall read out the minutes of the meeting between Ned Smith and Mr. Heathfield. The words are as follows:

"The NUM representatives said that they thought that part of any settlement would have to be related to discussion on that amnesty. The Board's representatives said that this would not be acceptable to the Board."

Mr. Eadie: The right hon. Gentleman is gilding the lily a bit again. I have the minutes from Mr. Ned Smith. They say that there was disagreement but, nevertheless, negotiations without preconditions means that both the NUM and the NCB can put anything that they like on the agenda. If the right hon. Gentleman does not know the meaning of the words "no preconditions", I suggest that he consults a dictionary.

The Secretary of State was embarrassed today, and almost started arguing with himself. I hope that we shall get an answer from the Under-Secretary of State for Energy who is to wind up. He will have to answer categorically the question put to him: is the NACODS agreement now being scuppered? Is it now in tatters as a consequence of what my right hon. Friend the Member for Salford, East said? Mr. Spanton would not give an assurance to Mr. McNestry this afternoon. If the Under-Secretary can say that the NACODS agreement is sacrosanct, why does the NCB want the NUM to write a script saying that it agrees to economic closures? The hon. Gentleman is impaled on his own statement. It is not necessary to have it.

Mr. Peter Walker: Does the hon. Gentleman, as a member of the NUM executive, approve of the NACODS settlement?

Mr. Eadie: When the Secretary of State tells me that the NACODS settlement is sacrosanct, he will get the answer that he wants—or the answer that he thinks he wants.

Mr. Peter Walker rose——

Mr. Eadie: I am telling the right hon. Gentleman——

Mr. Peter Walker rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that this is getting a bit personalised.

Mr. Eadie: I am not personalising it, Mr. Speaker. I am treating the right hon. Gentleman as the Secretary of State for Energy, who is responsible for these matters. All I say to him is that he or his hon. Friend the Under-Secretary should say whether the NACODS agreement is sacrosanct. Mr. McNestry does not believe that it is. Over the weekend Mr. McNestry said that if the NCB insisted that the NUM must write a script on economic closures, the agreement that his union had entered into with the National Coal Board was in absolute tatters. I think that I have demonstrated that.

We talk about there being no preconditions. But what has come to light is that negotiations have been scuppered by the NCB, I suspect with Government connivance.

The NUM went to see ACAS, but I understand that a statement was issued by the NCB. This is how we conduct industrial relations nowadays: ACAS went to the NCB to see whether it could make a contribution towards resolving the strike, but before it got there, the board issued a statement saying:

"The Board stress that until the NUM firmly indicate in writing that they have changed their position on this main issue facing the industry, any talk of resuming negotiations would only be raising false hopes."

I have trailered the negotiations to the House. If there is no response to the proposals that I have outlined fairly and accurately, it will become clear that the NCB strategy, with the support of the Prime Minister, is that it wants total victory against and humiliation for the NUM. It wants to starve the miners into submission, because it must be aware of the hunger and starvation already in the coalfields. Gas and electricity supplies are being cut off. Bairns are having difficulty in getting clothes and footwear. There are financial problems—[Laughter.]—when it comes to burying the dead. That is nothing to laugh at.

I can best illustrate the present course of events by reminding the House of the Vietnam war and President Johnson, who was not the worst President that the United States has had, in my view. He was a kindly man, and he was deeply wounded by the cry in parts of his country: "Hey, hey, LBJ. How many kids have you killed today?"

If the Government adopt a strategy of starvation and misery, the cries of the starving in mining areas will be, "Hey, hey, Maggie May. How many kids have you starved today?" Victory for the NCB and the Government is unacceptable. We believe that the British people want, and we demand from the Government, a principled, honourable and negotiated settlement of the dispute which has cost the nation and miners so dear.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. David Hunt): I hope that the hon. Member for Midlothian (Mr. Eadie) is ashamed of what he said. I should have thought that all the years he has spent in negotiations and industrial relations — nobody has doubted his commitment to the great coal industry — would have led him not to make the quite provocative speech that he made today.

I have listened with interest and attention to all of those who have spoken. As my hon. Friend the Member for Newark (Mr. Alexander) said, this is the debate that was never supposed to take place, but it has. I can tell the Leader of the Opposition that the nightmare will shortly be over, because the debate, as he would know if he had attended it throughout, has shown that opinion in the House, like opinion throughout the country, is united in calling on the NUM leadership to change its stance and to come and talk realistically to the NCB. The House is also united in condemning the tactics that miners' leaders have condoned and encouraged in pursuit of the strike. The only dissenting voices in the country and among the miners and in the House have been the militant ones. They are a small and increasingly isolated minority. Their message holds no future for this great industry and they will not succeed.

As my hon. Friends the Members for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester) and for Staffordshire, South-East (Mr. Lightbown) said, this is a strike that should never have happened. There would never have been a strike if there had been a national ballot in accordance with the NUM's democratic traditions and that union's rule 43, which provides that a national strike shall be entered upon only as a result of a ballot vote of members. [Interruption.] Opposition Members might try to shout me down but the truth will out. Like everyone else, they know that there would have been no strike if there had been a ballot. That was amply demonstrated by NUM areas which held their own ballots. They voted overwhelmingly against strike action and in favour of continuing to work for the future of their industry.

Ms. Clare Short: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Hunt: No.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) and others are rightly proud of their constituents who have gone to work in the face of the most disgraceful scenes of mobs and intimidation.

This is the first time in our lifetime that the NUM has called a strike without a ballot. The Labour Front Bench know what a disgrace and a stain that is upon that union's great record. My hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo) stressed that point.

But occasionally the Opposition have had the courage to say so. At the start of the dispute the Leader of the Opposition called for a ballot. So did the deputy Leader of the Opposition, the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley). Indeed, many Opposition Members referred to the lack of a ballot. This theme has been evident throughout the debate. In April the Leader of the Opposition said that if he had been a member of the NUM executive he would have been favour of a national ballot. But it was a timid approach. It did not cut any ice with Arthur Scargill. Rather like an individual who has tried to interefere with the course of history, Arthur Scargill roared and the Leader of the Opposition quickly left the stage. Shakespeare had a stage direction for it: "Exit pursued by a bear". Appearing with Arthur Scargill at the Durham miners gala, the Leader of the Opposition said, "There is no alternative but to fight." The right hon. Gentleman decided that, as the NUM had taken no notice at all of his views he would drop them. What a shamefaced attitude for the Leader of the Opposition to adopt.

However, the right hon. Gentleman has come back on to the stage. Last Friday, he tentatively suggested on the "Today" programme that commercial considerations had a part to play. I shall turn to that point in a moment. If only the right hon. Gentleman had had the courage at the start of the strike to call for a ballot, the strike would not have happened. My hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe and many other hon. Members referred during the debate to Mr. Ottey's explanation of what happened at that first meeting.

Mr. Eadie rose——

Mr. Hunt: The hon. Member for Midlothian knows what happened at that meeting. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will intervene and correct me if I am wrong and if Mr. Ottey is wrong. Mr. Ottey quoted Mr. Morgan, the general secretary of the colliers, as saying at that meeting, "If I had the confidence that a ballot would go the right way, I would vote for it." What a disgraceful comment. Mr. Wadsworth, one of the leaders of the NUM in Yorkshire, said recently on breakfast television, "The reason we did not have a ballot was because we knew we would not win it." Talk about plotting, as the hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McGuire) talked about plotting at the start of the dispute! I hope the House will agree with Mr. Ottey who said that the meeting was "an outstanding betrayal of the miners' constitutional rights". Those are not my words, but the words of a man who spent 45 years in the mining industry and who for 18 years was a member of the national executive.

Miners know that this strike should never have happened and, denied a ballot, miners have voted with their feet. More than 81,000 members of the NUM—over 43 per cent. of its membership—are no longer on strike. Since the start of this year over 13,000 miners have left the strike. Today, communicating a message that, sadly, the Opposition do not seem ready to hear, over 2,300 members of the NUM—a record number—have voted with their feet. Over 30,000 miners have returned to work since the negotiations broke down. In that time the NUM has not changed its position. When will it ever learn?

It is time the strike was over. Of course we agree with the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy), but, as many hon. Members have said, we have had seven rounds of negotiations lasting over 175 hours and we have a right to ask: why have the negotiations failed? The answer is that the NUM has refused to acknowledge that the cost of production is an important factor in decisions about the industry.

I refer again to the Leader of the Opposition's words: "including commercial considerations". Arthur Scargill went on the same programme soon afterwards and was given the opportunity to say whether he agreed with the Leader of the Opposition. If he had said, "Yes, commercial considerations have always counted," the strike would now be over. Everybody knows that. But he did not. He said that the Leader of the Opposition must answer for what he said.

This has been a rather artificial debate in some ways. It has been acknowledged by almost every speaker that economic considerations have always played a part. That has been the underlying theme throughout the debate. I do not need to echo the words of the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace). Everybody knows that economic considerations have always counted. It was the then right hon. Member for Newton who, when he was Labour Minister for Power in 1965, said:

"The industry has made great strides in mechanisation, efficiency and productivity. A substantial part of it has relatively low costs. It is, however, carrying the burden of a good deal of uneconomic production that can become—indeed, has become—a threat to the industry itself . . . this huge on-cost of uneconomic coal is one of the greatest threats to the prosperity of the whole industry."

That was a Labour Minister. He continued:

"the coal industry is weighed down by a part of it that is uneconomic and because of this coal is in danger of losing markets".

He asked the House this question:

"Why should the good pits be dragged down?"—[Official Report, 25 November 1965; Vol. 721, c. 780, 883-84.]

The same question applies today. Why should the good pits be dragged down by those which are uneconomic?

Mr. Hardy: The Minister has just asked the House a question, but will he answer the question that I put to him? Will he categorically assure the House that the NUM will not be expected to agree to the closure of collieries in advance of the colliery review procedure or in advance of the consideration which is pledged for independent construction?

Mr. Hunt: I shall give the hon. Gentleman that categoric assurance. I shall amplify that in a moment.

In 1966, the Minister for Power, the then right hon. Member for Greenwich, said something which is relevant to our debate tonight:

"the greatest threat to the future of the industry would be any attempt to average up the cost of economic low cost pits to subsidise pits which can only be a burden on the economy in general and the coal industry in particular."—[Official Report, 20 May 1966; Vol. 728, c. 1849.]

Those statements were made by Labour Ministers. The industry faces the same problem today. The right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) knows about the 22 pits which were closed when he was responsible for the industry. The right hon. Gentleman is an expert on the closure of pits. I could reel off a long list. I could ask the right hon. Gentleman about Graig Merthyr, which had three or four years' resources left; I could ask him about Langwith, which had 1·5 million tonnes left. The right hon. Gentleman ignores the points that I make, but he ignores them at his peril.

Mr. David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): Is not one of the difficulties about the superficial attraction of negotiations without preconditions the statement of the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) on Tuesday:

"not a single pit in Britain is uneconomic".—[Official Report, 29 January 1985; Vol. 72, c. 154.]?

Mr. Hunt: I completely agree. I wish that the debate could have taken place against a background of renewed negotiations, leading quickly to a constructive, realistic, negotiated settlement. I am sure that I speak for many hon. Members when I say that. No one wishes to see a negotiated settlement more than the Government; I stress that fact to the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot).

Hon. Members have asked that there should be more give from the NCB. But the story of the dispute is that it has been all give by the NCB and all take by the NUM. In seven rounds of negotiations, lasting 175 hours, the NCB has given and the NUM has taken.

Mr. Rost: Is my hon. Friend aware that a few minutes ago, Mr. Arthur Scargill, interviewed on the BBC television programme "Panorama" said yet again that he was not prepared to talk to the NCB about the closure of uneconomic pits? How can we have a negotiated settlement?

Mr. Hunt: We ask ourselves where the true debate is taking place. If only Opposition leaders were to engage in discussions with the president of the NUM and explain to him the economic facts of life, the dispute would be over.

The hon. Member for Midlothian quoted many documents, but the problem in the dispute has been that, although the NUM has sent documents in writing and has said things on television and face to face, every time the president has said anything about the dispute he has said that uneconomic pits must stay open. [HON. MEMBERS: "No!"] Of course he has. The hon. Member for Doncaster, North (Mr. Welsh) said that Mr. Scargill carries out the wishes of the NUM executive. Mr. Scargill said on the "Today" programme this morning:

"What we are saying is that we are not being parties to an agreement that accepts the closure of pits on economic grounds." He shut the door on any possibility of negotiations.

Mr. Barron: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hunt: Just a moment.

Later in the interview, Mr. Scargill said:

"We haven't got any demands on the negotiating table."

Yet he had just made the demand that stopped negotiations from the start.

We have had discussions at ACAS and we have had a just and honourable settlement with NACODS. We have seen these discussions take place. The hon. Member for Wentworth asked me to deal with that point. Let me make it quite clear that the NACODS agreement, which provided, inter alia, for the enhancement and improvement of the industry's established colliery review procedure, stands in full. It was there on the table for the NUM to accept last October and the union rejected it. It is still there today.

If the NUM moves its position and is willing to withdraw the unreasonable demand that there should be no closure of uneconomic pits, there can be a negotiated settlement. All that the leadership of the NUM has to agree is that the closure of uneconomic pits should be included in the first item on the agenda for negotiations. That was conspicuously absent from the agenda that the hon. Member for Midlothian read out. So far, they have refused to agree.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Hunt: I shall not give way, as this is an important point.

If the Leader of the Opposition or the TUC can persuade the president of the NUM to accept an agenda that deals with the issue that Mr. Scargill has made the main issue of the dispute and can accept the reality of the situation, the dispute will end, just as it could have done last October, last July and, indeed, last March, before it had even started. I hope that I have made that absolutely clear.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Hunt: The Leader of the Opposition shouted to me about the NACODS agreement, and I should make it clear that, if the NACODS agreement is accepted, there will of course be no need for any written undertakings. It is a written agreement and can be accepted by the NUM. It has always been on the table.

Mr. Douglas: What the Under-Secretary of State is saying is very important. Are we to take it that the suggestion put forward from the Dispatch Box is deliverable by him through the NCB, and that there will be no request to the NUM to give a written undertaking to the NCB in that regard?

Mr. Hunt: I have made it quite clear and will repeat again that if the NUM wishes to accept the NACODS agreement, there is no need for any written undertakings of any sort. I have made that absolutely clear — [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are coming towards the end of a very important debate.

Mr. Hunt: I can only say that it seems clear that the Opposition Front Bench does not want a settlement. The approach of the Government and of the NCB towards the coal industry has been enormously positive. It is curious that no hon. Member has said in the debate that the NCB's offer is not sufficiently generous. No one has questioned the generosity of the offer secured for the NCB by this Prime Minister, this Secretary of State and this Government underwriting the most generous offer to miners since nationalisation.

Let those in communication with the leader of the NUM get straight on the telephone to him to try to talk some sense into the NUM so that we can obtain an end to the dispute. Today we have heard of a record number of miners voting with their feet. They have been denied a ballot. They had no other course open to them and they have now voted with their feet. When will the president of the NUM listen? Seven rounds of negotiations have foundered on the refusal of the NUM's leadership to recognise the crucial reality that was implicit in almost every speech today. I have just one message for those who care—as we all do—for this great coal industry. The Government will not let down the miners. Miners who have worked and who are returning to work every day have shown their loyalty to the industry. They have kept faith with the coal industry and we intend to keep faith with them.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe said, there are, of course, no winners in the dispute. Yet the tragedy is still being played out. Mr. Scargill seems set to fight to the bitter end, but has not the bitter end come? Can he ignore any longer the relentless tread of his members returning to work? Today's record number of returns once again highlights the growing dissatisfaction with his leadership. When will he listen to the rising tide of opinion? [Interruption.] When will he settle on the reasonable terms available to him so that this tragic, pointless and damaging dispute, for which there was never any industrial justification, can be brought to an end? The message is that moderation——

Mr. Michael Cocks (Bristol, South) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question accordingly agreed to.

MR. SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House deeply regrets the damage done to the coal industry, miners, miners' families and mining communities by the unnecessary industrial action of some sections of the National Union of Mineworkers; recognises that this action is totally unjustified since this Government have provided more capital investment for the industry than any previous Government, far in excess of that provided by the last Labour Government, and substantially exceeding the scale of investment envisaged in 'Plan for Coal'; recognises it is also unjustified in the light of the National Coal Board's extremely generous offer on pay, early retirement and voluntary redundancy terms, and on the creation of a scheme designed to bring new enterprises and job opportunities to mining communities; notes the acceptance of the Board's offer by the industry's other two unions, and the refusal to strike by those sections of the National Union of Mineworkers which in that union's normal tradition decided to hold a ballot; deplores the Opposition's failure to persuade the National Union of Mineworkers both to arrange a national ballot and to use methods of picketing complying with the National Union of Mineworkers and Trades Union Congress guidelines on picketing; regrets the National Union of Mineworkers leadership's intransigence, displayed in seven rounds of negotiations, including with the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service whose compromise proposal was accepted by the Board but rejected by the National Union of Mineworkers; and expresses the hope that this intransigence will now cease so that a realistic settlement can quickly be achieved which recognises that the cost of production is an important factor in securing a good and prosperous future for the industry.

Immigration

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): I beg to move,

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Immigration Appeals (Procedure) Rules 1984 (S.I. 1984, No. 2041), dated 21st December 1984, a copy of which was laid before this House on 11th January, be annulled.

We have the opportunity for only a short debate on this issue, although immigration is clearly a matter of major interest to many people. The specific point this evening covers only a narrow issue about immigration as, sadly, the prayer does not enable us to criticise or consider the entire Immigration Act 1971 or the immigration rules.

I note that next week the Commission for Racial Equality is expected to publish its report on immigration procedures. It must be a matter of regret that with such an important report shortly to come before us, the Minister has attempted to pre-empt it by laying down these rules before we have had a chance to consider the CRE's report. In passing, I should note that when those procedures were before the House for the first time in 1969, under the Immigration Appeals Act 1969, the Minister voted against the Second Reading, although, as he did not speak in that debate, it is impossible to judge what his views were.

It is clearly unsatisfactory to have such a limited procedure to deal with such complex rules, because even in one hour we can hardly discuss the details adequately and we cannot suggest amendments. It would have been much better had the Minister introduced draft rules which we could have discussed, on the lines of the procedure adopted by the House in recent years of discussing immigration rules in draft form so that amendments suggested by the House can, if the Minister is willing, be incorporated. It is a pity that we do not have the benefit of that approach this evening.

The new rules are the product of a review of immigration appeals that was announced in 1980. In 1981, the Government published a discussion document, and many organisations commented. Sadly, those comments were never published, although the rules are clearly the product of the review. This is the House's first chance thoroughly to examine the procedure for immigration appeals.

It will come as no surprise to the Minister if I contend that the present immigration appeals system is fundamentally unjust, as is the entire immigration system. May I draw to his attention several specific examples of that. First it is almost valueless to tell people that they have a right of appeal provided that they exercise it outside Britain. That is true of people whom the Minister would call illegal entrants, but it is a travesty to say, "Leave this country and appeal from another country." We all know that that does not work.

Secondly, there is no right of appeal for refugees seeking asylum in Britain. Such a right would bring Britain more into line with the international convention and protocol on the status of refugees, of which Britain is a signatory.

A further criticism is that in half the present immigration appeals, the appellant is not present at the hearing.

Another criticism is that adjudicators are appointed by the Home Office, although the Wilson committee recommended that they should be appointed by the Lord Chancellor. Adjudicators sit alone, but I should have thought that it would be preferable to have more than one adjudicator. Furthermore, there is no legal aid, although the United Kingdom Immigrants Advisory Service and the Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants do good work in helping appellants. Nevertheless, in 1979, the Royal Commission on Legal Services recommended that legal aid should be available for immigration appeals.

There is no right of appeal to the High Court on a point of law, and there is no procedure for the tape recording of immigration interviews and the use of such tapes in immigration appeals. Such tape recording would provide an essential safeguard for many people who feel aggrieved by the present approach. I hope that the Minister will consider introducing tape recording. It was considered by the Select Committee on Home Affairs some years ago, and I was a member of the Race Relations and Immigration Sub-Committee which produced a report. The arguments that we heard from Home Office representatives did not convince most of us that it would not be a good idea to introduce tape recording. One argument was that as an immigration officer or entry certificate officer would be interviewing an applicant, and as an interpreter would be present, tape recording would be confusing as no one would know who was speaking. That is an absurd suggestion, but it was put forward in all seriousness. Our appeals procedure would be significantly improved and made much fairer if there were tape recording, and such tapes were admissible in evidence during appeal proceedings.

Several changes have been made in the immigration rules, but time allows me to discuss only one or two of them. Two rules in particular concern me over and above the others. Under rule 41, all appeals from an appellant to a tribunal can be carried out, if the rules are passed today, only with the leave either of the tribunal or the adjudicator, whereas at present, there is an automatic right of appeal. That is unnecessarily limiting the rights of anybody who wishes to appeal.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): Disgraceful.

Mr. Dubs: As my hon. and learned Friend says, it is disgraceful. I can see no justification for the Minister having done this.

The other rule that concerns me particularly is rule 21(c), which gives tribunals additional powers to dispose of appeals without a hearing. Already, there are enough instances of appellants having their futures decided without their presence. Here is an extension of that power. It particularly affects cases where the granting of leave to appeal to a tribunal is mandatory under section 22(5) of the Immigration Act 1971. It particularly affects those people who have applied for entry certificates, been granted one, but, on arrival in the United Kingdom, are refused entry. This is really an attempt to circumvent section 22(5) of the Immigration Act. It certainly goes against the spirit of that Act, and may well go against the letter of it. It is a significant diminution of the rights of the individual when faced with the new rules.

I remind the Minister that the Afia Begum case came roughly into this category. It is true that her tribunal appeal was unfortunately lost, but perhaps the enormous support that she received from all over the country while awaiting the appeal persuaded the Home Office to change the procedure so that in future it could no longer be used. Most hon. Members will be aware of the circumstances, but I shall briefly remind them of the facts. Afia Begum was a 19-year-old woman, who married a man who was settled here, and under the immigration rules required entry clearance. She applied for it, but by the time that she got it and arrived in the country, her husband had died tragically in a fire in his home.

When Afia Begum sought to enter the country, she was refused entry. She appealed and lost the case. Under the suggested new system, she would not have had even that right of appeal. In future, people will be denied such a right. It is disgraceful that the Minister is seeking to weaken existing rights in this way.

A number of rules have not been changed but are still undesirable in their effects. Under rule 4, there is a time limit for appeals, and an appellant in Britain has only 14 days in which to get his appeal in. That 14-day period starts on the day when the Home Office posts the notice of decision. That means that appellants may miss their chance to appeal because by the time that delays in the post have had their effect, there is little time left. If the appellant is not being advised by somebody who knows a lot about the matter, or if he does not know about it and does not speak fluent English, he may lose his chance to appeal to stay. Sometimes people even miss the date when they are advised by solicitors. It is wrong to impose a rigorous time limit.

The time limit of 14 days applies also under rule 15, in an appeal from an appellant to a tribunal. Again, the same objections apply here. Under rule 5, there is no provision for an appeal out of time from an appellant to a tribunal, although there is some provision for this in an appeal to an adjudicator. Under rule 27, appellants have no right to insist that Home Office officials or immigration officers should give oral evidence or present themselves for cross-examination. Again, that is a significant diminution in the right of an individual.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Waddington): To which rule is the hon. Gentleman referring?

Mr. Dubs: Rule 27.

Mr. Waddington: Surely, the hon. Gentleman will agree that there has been no alteration in rule 27.

Mr. Dubs: I said that this was one of the rules that had not been changed, but nevertheless, with the passage of time, I find it undesirable. If we are presented with a set of rules that incorporate some amendments, it is reasonable to say that we disagree both with some of the amendments and with some of the original rules.

The Minister followed a consultation procedure, but many of the rules have been criticised by organisations and individuals that have made representations in response to the consultation document. It is unfortunate that the Minister has not heeded those representations. It is unfortunate also that he has not explained why, but perhaps we shall hear the reason later this evening. It is against that background that I am arguing that some of the rules that the Minister has not changed are still undesirable. That is part of the Opposition's case.

An appellant has a limited right to demand the production of documents and adjudicators have no general power to order relevant documents to be produced. Indeed, an ajudicator cannot even require an entry clearance officer's notes to be produced as part of a hearing. In the absence of tape recordings a great deal has to be attached to the accuracy of the notes of an entry clearance officer at the time of the interview. The fact that these notes cannot be made available at the time of a hearing weakens the right of the appellant, as a critical part of the evidence is denied to the ajudicator or the tribunal.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): It seems that no other system claims to be judicial in which a hostile witness—the entry clearance officer who has refused someone entry—is required to give the major part of the evidence on which an appeal is heard. Surely this is a defect in the system that can be remedied only by the adoption of tape recording.

Mr. Dubs: My hon. Friend is right and I agree fully with the argument that she has advanced.

Rule 23 is concerned with the requirements of bail applications. It is a matter of regret that there is no necessity for the applicant authority to deal speedily with applications for bail when someone is held in custody under the Immigration Act. It can take quite a long time for such a hearing to take place. Someone may be held in custody in the London area for as long as a couple of weeks before, if his bail application is successful, he is released from custody. Surely that is not the right way in which to proceed.

The rules are typified by delays and discrimination. As a result, they assist materially in keeping families apart. The main responsibility rests with the rules and the Act and not the procedures here. However, there is so much discontent with the way in which our immigration procedures operate and the way in which appeals are conducted that there is a great feeling of injustice at the discrimination that takes place in our immigration system, of which the rules are a part.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): The Minister's staff are invariably courteous when we telephone to deal with immigration cases. Unfortunately, their courtesy is not always matched by the Minister's decisions. I do not wish in any sense to let him off the hook, but all hon. Members are grateful for the speed and infinite patience with which out telephone calls are handled by his private office and for the letters which follow those calls.

Secondly, there has been some improvement in the procedures at Lunar house as a result of our debates. Lunar house now has a human face, but previously it had no face. It was impossible to employ the ears of Lunar house by telephone. It seemed impossible to speak to one of its officials, and very often one felt that the staff were not reading the submissions which had been made. However, the result of criticisms of Lunar house is that officials respond by means of telephone calls. It is possible to make telephone calls to them, although the telephone lines are engaged on some occasions. I hope that the Minister will regard this situation as an improvement in some ways on what was happening previously and not as perfect.

Mr. Waddington: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for what he said. I am proud of the staff who serve under me. However, I am slightly mystified by his remarks. One must not have too thin a skin in my position, but I do not know what he means when he suggests that I have been discourteous. I have had no personal dealings with him about any immigration case. If he feels that I have been discourteous at third or fourth hand, I wish that he would let me know, and I shall gladly look into the matter.

Mr. Fraser: I have not made myself clear. I intended to say that the courtesy of the Minister's private office was not always matched by the welcomeness of the Minister's decisions. I acquit him of any discourtesy and did not intend to imply that there was any.

One requirement of immigration rules and procedure is that the substance of the rules should be fair. That cannot be said of them at the moment. The rules remain sexist in the extreme, and have not been helped by a recent decision of the Divisional court that the husband of a United Kingdom citizen will not be allowed to stay if one purpose of the marriage was to enable that person to remain in Britain.

The procedure ought to be fair. It ought not to be full of booby traps. Immigration appeal rules that create tripwires are unjust and create a grave sense of injustice and unfairness among those who have to operate them. I should like the Minister to give special attention to the way in which he has changed rule 6 so that there is no longer a prescribed form of appeal against the decision of an entry clearance officer or an immigration officer. The procedure is full of traps, not least because the time limit of 14 days in which to make an appeal does not commence when the decision is received by the applicant but when the decision is made.

If a decision is made and posted on a Friday during the Christmas period, it might not arrive until Tuesday because of delays. Moreover, the applicant might not be able to read English or understand the decision and will therefore want to get advice. It is therefore easy for 14 days to elapse between getting the decision and lodging an appeal, and thus to lose appeal rights. That is redeemed at the moment by the Home Office's practice of sending out an appeal form which states the particulars that the new rule 6 requires — name, address, date of birth, nationality, the decision that is being appealed against, the grounds of appeal, whether an oral hearing is sought and whether the appellant is appealing against the country to which he is being removed.

If people cannot read English, those to whom they go for advice or for a translation can see what must be done and where the form must be sent. The likelihood of mistakes is minimised by the form. As soon as the Home Office departs from that practice of sending out a prescribed appeal form, mistakes will be made. People will leave out details of the decision, their date of birth or their nationality. In other words, the form of appeal will be invalidated, not on the merits of the case but on a technicality. It is in the interests of the Home Office and the Minister for appeals to be made through the prescribed form or a letter, delivered to the Home Office, that gives particulars that are as nearly as possible the same as those given in the prescribed form.

If the Home Office drops the prescribed form, it will result in a sense of injustice and a great deal of delay. It will create the suspicion that the Home Office intends to introduce rules with which it will be difficult to comply. An example is the substantive immigration rules. One cannot change one's status from that of a visitor to a business man unless one is out of the country. It is very difficult to acquire a business when one is out of the country. On this rule alone I implore the Minister to think again for the sake of the immigrant, the Home Office and good race relations in this country.

10.50 pm

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): Already there is a very profound sense of injustice among all immigrant communities concerning the operation of the current immigration procedures that come within the Acts. These new rules do absolutely nothing to change that sense of injustice. Indeed, they make matters worse. Not only is injustice manifestly felt to be done, but further steps are now to be taken to remove existing rights. Speaking, as I know I do, on behalf of a vast number of Asian citizens who feel that the discrimination against them at ports of entry by immigration officers under the current rules is wicked and rampant, I beg the Government to reconsider whether or not they could produce rules——

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Will the hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Janner: No, I will not. Every Opposition Member who is in the House wishes to speak and I do not intend to take up their time.

There is no question but that immigration officers are believed and, in my view, frequently correctly believed to discriminate against people because they are Asians. Under the present rules, there is an automatic method under which a person who wishes to appeal against the refusal of entry clearance is given a blank appeal form with which to instigate his appeal. I join my hon. Friend the Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) in begging the Government not to require people whose knowledge of the system is non-existent; who arrive in this country frightened and often in a state of deep insecurity; who do not speak the language and who often have come here entirely legitimately, to fill in special forms that will not automatically be given to them, or to require them to instigate appeals by writing to the authorities. This change will undoubtedly affect——

Mr. Budgen: The hon. and learned Member speaks of the great sense of injustice that is felt by many of his constituents. I have a very large Asian community in my constituency and I have received no letters or representations about this issue. It is all too easy for hon. Members to express their personal views and to pretend that they are supported by a large body of opinion. Will the hon. Member please give us further and better particulars of this strong sense of injustice that is being put to him?

Mr. Janner: With the greatest of pleasure. Before the Minister leaves the House, as he is apparently doing at this moment, I shall ask him to be kind enough, when he is outside the House, to produce the vast file of letters that I have written to him over past years denouncing precisely these injustices. Day after day, week after week, my Asian constituents bring complaints to me. That the constituents of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) bring no complaints to him should be no surprise to any hon. Member of this House, knowing the way in which the hon. Member would be likely to deal with them.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): Would not the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West accept that in a way the hon. Member for Wolverhampton South-West (Mr. Budgen) has a point? The point that many hon. Members on this side of the House would argue is that people have a great deal of difficulty in writing these letters and that that is why it is so odious that there is to be a change in the rules by removing a form that is so easy to fill in and insisting instead that people should send letters.

Mr. Janner: I fully accept that point. On the other hand, in constituencies such as mine the Asian community knows that their Asian Labour councillors and their Labour Member of Parliament are working for them and with them. With surgeries every week and availability every day, and very often every hour of the day, there is no shortage of complaints, and the Minister knows it.

The question is whether the procedures are fair now—in my view they are not—and whether the revised procedures will make them any fairer. On the contrary, they will do damage. They will harm good race relations and good will. They will not improve procedures. Even now, the Minister should think again and withdraw the procedures, wait for the CRE report and then introduce procedures that are fair, decent and honourable.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): The hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) rightly said that it was a shame that the debate was taking place only a few days before a valuable report is to be produced which will highlight many of the deficiencies in the rules. Not only is it discourteous to have the debate in advance of that report being produced, but it is clearly an attempt to pre-empt some of the criticisms that will probably be contained in it.

The hon. Member for Battersea also said that the present system was fundamentally unjust and that there was a need for more than one adjudicator. He said that there was a need for legal aid—in a sense, a more judicial system than the one that we have. I wholeheartedly endorse that. He said that there was a need for tape recordings of interviews and talked about the admissibility of interviews when deciding on the issues. He talked about the disposal of appeals about hearings. They were valuable points, all of which I would happily endorse.

The hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) talked about the courtesy which Home Office staff in the private office show, and I found that to be the case as well. The hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) talked of the examples that he has experienced in his constituency of people having difficulty understanding the gobbledegook of many of the Home Office rules and regulations. My city has a large immigrant community with considerable illiteracy and frequently people have enormous problems in understanding complicated rules and regulations.

The rules before the House tonight have been dissected by many of the influential immigrant organisations such as the Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants and the United Kingdom immigrants advisory service. I do not intend to detail their criticisms, which will be well known to the Minister and which have widespread support on these Benches, but I shall ask him not to ignore those well-thought-out representations.

Those groups and many others took the trouble to make detailed comments on the discussion document of April 1981. Their comments have never been published by the Minister. The rule changes are the only product of the review announced in 1980 and bear little relation to informed opinion or comment now or then. That cavalier disregard for the view of representative organisations concerns me, but my major concern tonight is how little relationship the rules bear to any form of humanity, opportunity or real justice.

Mr. Derek Spencer (Leicester, South): How can it be an injustice when rule 6(4) says:

> "The grounds of an appeal particularised in a notice of appeal may be varied or amplifed at any time during the course of the appeal"?

Surely that leaves the matter wide open. What is the matter with that? Surely it is much better than having a formal notice?

Mr. Alton: It all rather depends on whether the grounds exist in the first place. As the hon. and learned Gentleman well knows, the grounds may not appear to exist in the eyes of the Minister. It may depend on the information which is sent back. It may be that the adjudicator does not agree with the grounds submitted. All those factors will apply. The changes in the rules tonight will only make matters worse. They must be seen in the context of many other changes which have taken place in the past nearly six years. There have been a frightening number of infringements.

Mr. Waddington: It is important that people should not be misled. The hon. Gentleman is surely not trying to give the impression that no heed was paid to the representations made by the JCWI. He knows perfectly will if he has read the draft rules that the opposite is the case. He knows perfectly well that the most minimal changes have been made in the rules. We stuck more or less to what was the situation when the Labour Government were in power simply because we did heed the representations of bodies such as the JCWI. The hon. Gentleman must not mislead the House and give the impression that we have flown in the face of representations made to us. We have heeded virtually every one.

Mr. Alton: The Minister knows that the JCWI takes a dim view of the regulations, Indeed, it says:

> "The limp product of a review initiated nearly five years ago does nothing to challenge the fundamental injustices of the immigration appeals system."

The council sets out a number of complaints about the way in which the system works.

The rules must be seen against the background of a number of infringements that have occurred against the immigrant community and others over the past six years. There has been the infringement of the right to movement, the infringement of the right to form relationships, the infringement of the right to live together as a family unit and, in particular, the infringement of the right of all women to equal treatment under the law. All those rights are in the United Nations declaration of which the United Kingdom was founder signatory.

It is no surprise to find tonight that other rights are jeopardised. It is a tragedy that the Government should be so dedicated to undermining the personal liberties of our people as well as the aims of institutions such as the United Nations. But that is part of the pattern that we have come to expect over the past five or six years. The Government's poor record on overseas aid and provision for overseas students, and our record on the rights of immigrants and the treatment of foreign visitors on arrival in the United Kingdom all damage the proud reputation that this country once enjoyed around the world.

The new rules are littered with examples of how the state's powers are increased at the expense of the individual. For example, rule 6(1) removes the Home Office's responsibility for providing simple, straightforward forms to give notice of appeal. Appellants will be told in future that they must write a letter to the Minister. I wholeheartedly endorse the view of the United Kingdom Immigrants Advisory Service that the change can lead only to uncertainty among those considering an appeal. It will undoubtedly create further confusion and frustration among those who are already confused and frustrated by a complicated system.

Yet the change will also create more work for civil servants, burdening them with reading letters often written by people who are not well versed in the English language. The change is the exact opposite of the stated aim of the review, which was that it should be a "consideration of ways to reduce delays and create more efficient use of resources".

In an area so afflicted by bureaucracy, it is strange to see the Government creating yet more work for their civil servants. But, of course, the Government's motives are patently obvious — to place as many obstacles as possible in the path of the appellant, to create a tangled web of bureaucratic controls and to impose every possible burden on the shoulders of those seeking refuge, and all in the hope of deterring appeals and making life as difficult as possible for people who are often frightened, vulnerable and greatly at risk.

The Government should not replace the mandatory provision of appeal forms by a requirement on appellants to write a letter. Similarly, it is wrong to specify in advance that if certain particulars are omitted, an appeal will be deemed to be disallowed. Nor should grounds of appeal have to be submitted at the time of giving notice of appeal. What if crucial information is inadvertently missed out? What if the immigrant is not aware of what is relevant and what is not?

Similarly, under rule 14, access to the tribunal against an adjudicator's decision will be possible only by leave. That erodes the right of appeal provided for in the 1971 Act and will make it difficult to challenge an adjudicator's decision before the tribunal. Once again, the Home Office is trying to reduce the rights of the appellant and this time the change in the rules will mean that some people who currently have the right to remain in the United Kingdom will in future be deprived of that right.

Time does not permit me to go through all the examples, but my hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale (Mr. Smith) has told me about someone who was made to wait for about four years before a decision was made. A Nigerian constituent of mine has been ordered home to Nigeria. The Minister wrote to me on 1 February saying that she would be able to exercise her right to appeal to an independent adjudicator against the decision to refuse her entry. That is a terrible way to treat people. They are sent back whence they came and they cannot get advice or make appeals.

I remember the case of a young Bangladeshi boy, Giss Uddin, who had been educated in this country, but who was sent back to Bangladesh and told to prove that that was where he came from. He had to prove, through some sort of certification, that he was born in that country to people who had the right to live in this country — and all because he could not produce a piece of paper. He was unable to appeal from Bangladesh because he was not able to produce the necessary documents. That is a hallmark of this Government. Another example of the inhumanity of our immigration legislation, which these proposals will compound——

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Alton: I have already given way, and I am sure that the House will understand if I press on.

Another example of the inhumanity of our immigration legislation, which these proposals will compound, is the process that a British woman must go through in order to bring her fiancé into this country. She must prove that she met him before his interview for settlement, with the state acting as some sort of voyeur. She must prove that the marriage with the state acting as prosecution, judge, jury and appeal court for the crime of love. She must prove that he will not rely on supplementary benefit or any other public funds. He may then have to undergo a medical examination, and the couple may also be ordered to reveal letters or private correspondence between them. One wonders whether civil servants in the Home Office do not have better things to do. It is a degrading, dehumanising and often disgusting process to have to go through.

"will not be undertaken mainly in order for him to settle in the UK",

These rule changes will place even more aces up the Home Secretary's sleeve. They will increase the odds yet more against an appellant. In some cases a pathetic 14 days is given in which to give notice of appeal. At the same time, the amount of documentation that the appellant must gather appears to increase substantially.

These people will often be abroad, illiterate or not English speakers. The rules may make a difficult task near to impossible. That could, of course, be the Government's intention. It is certainly the view of many people that that is the Government's aim.

My party will oppose the new rules tonight, because we believe that they will substantially erode good race relations in this country and that they will make life much more difficult for immigrants who have already suffered quite enough under this Government's pernicious policies.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Perhaps I should declare an interest as I am the chairman of the United Kingdom Immigrants Advisory Service. Which I hasten to add, is an unpaid position.

I believe that the more strictly immigration is controlled, the more important it is that the appeal system is fair and just, and seen to be so by those appealing. It is important to bear in mind that not only immigration is at issue. Many people who want to come to Britain to visit or study are refused permission to do so and then are given the right to lodge an appeal. When the Wilson committee recommended in the late 1960s that the appeal system be set up, it was stressed that those who were refused either here or abroad should be in a position to put their cases to an adjudicator with the necessary advice and representation.

Some of the changes are disturbing. Earlier, the Minister said that he had more or less agreed with the representations made by the JCWI, but it is important to remember that like the UKAIS, the JCWI has objected to several of the proposed changes. I also re-emphasise the need for forms to be supplied to those refused. I am not suggesting that only the form should be the basis of any appeal. But many of those refused are on the Indian subcontinent and may have great difficulty in composing a letter once refused. It is feared that agents will be used. As the Minister knows, when they are involved in India or Pakistan they often confuse the position, worsen the appellant's situation and make his chances of winning that much less. If an application is turned down, a form should be sent, as has been the position until now.

It is wrong to say, as rule 6.3 does, that an appellant should have to give grounds for an appeal at the time that an appeal is lodged. Often it is impossible to give adequate grounds, because the wording of the refusal is such that it provides little basis on which to lodge an appeal. When the explanatory statement is finally issued giving all the reasons for the application being turned down, there is some substance upon which to submit the grounds. The Minister should, therefore, reconsider that point.

Some people apply to stay here because they fear that if they return they will face possible persecution. If the appeal is turned down by an adjudicator and an application for leave is made to the tribunal it can succeed only if the tribunal is satisfied that the fears of persecution are genuine. This is not a technical matter. It is important. The application for leave for the case to be heard by the tribunal will be determined before the appeal is heard, if permission is granted.

Rule 14(2)*(b)*provides that the tribunal has to be satisfied on the basis of the written submission that there are genuine fears for the person to return to his own country. The person has to make the point in writing on the basis that if the application for leave to appeal succeeds he will seek to prove his case at a full hearing of the tribunal. That will cause anxiety to people who believe that they have genuine difficulties and genuine reasons to fear persecution, and worse, if they are forced to leave the country.

It is unfortunate that this debate is limited to one hour. This is a matter of great concern to many of our constituents and their relatives. I see no reason why it should be confined to such a short time. It shows, I think the lack of respect by the Government for issues of justice.

If we are to have such a rigid system of immigration control we must ensure that those who are refused, whether they want to live here, study or visit, must genuinely believe that if they lodge an appeal it will be heard in the proper spirit and that they have the right to put their case to an independent adjudicator or tribunal. It is up to the Minister to satisfy those people that they will have that right. Most people do not believe that they stand much chance of having their case heard in this way.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): I pay tribute to my hon. and learned Friend the Minister responsible for immigration and to the caring way in which he looks after the ethnic community. Despite what Opposition Members said, his Private Office has performend well when I have contacted it.

There is a much larger ethnic community in my constituency than there is in the constituency of the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner). Out of my 19,500 ethnic constituents, not one has made a representation to me about being unhappy with the new immigration appeals procedure.

The procedure as detailed in the new rules, especially 6 and 16, makes it easier for members of the ethnic community to accept the rules as they are. The rules are fairer. The grounds for refusal, for applying and appealing are made very clear and they provide an easier way of handling all types of appeals.

The people involved need care to be shown to them. I believe that they are shown care in the way that I would show care, unlike some Opposition Members. The rights that they seek are being dealt with in a much more humane manner. I cannot understand why the Opposition parties find it necessary to complain about the appeals. I deal regularly with immigration appeal procedures—between five and 10 times a day — so I know more about immigration procedures than most other hon. Members.

Let us remember that those who come here and then appeal, having been told it is time for them to go, cannot yet be called "our people." Indeed, having been allowed to come on a visit, they are being unfair to those who wish to come here permanently and who are patiently waiting under a quota arrangement to be allowed to come. We should aim to ensure the continuation of the humane way in which my hon. and learned Friend has dealt with these matters in the past. The sort of criticism that we have heard tonight from Opposition Members does nothing to make for the harmonious conditions that now exist in Leicester in particular and in Britain in general. I commend the appeals procedure.

The Minister of State, Home Department (Mr. David Waddington): The hon Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) complained about the limited time available for this debate. The Opposition tabled the prayer —they had every right to do so—and many will have been surprised at their having done so.

I say that because anybody who had read the instrument with care — which the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley (Mr. Alton) had not—would have recognised that, far from us ignoring all the points made by the JCWI in its comments on the consultation document, we have heeded what it had said, and therefore the rules include only the minimum number of changes.

The hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) was less than fair. He was wrong to say that the Wilson committee had recommended that adjudicators should be appointed by the Lord Chancellor. In fact, the Wilson committee recommended precisely the reverse — that they should not be appointed by the Lord Chancellor — and the Labour Government of the day followed the recommendations of that committee.

Nor did the hon. Member for Battersea tell the whole story about the tape recording of interviews. The chief adjudicator had the opportunity recently of assessing how helpful the tape recording of interviews might be by investigating results of experiments conducted in the Indian sub-continent, and he unhesitatingly concluded that it would not be helpful to have tape recordings. That does not mean that I have closed my mind entirely to the possibility in the future. The hon. Gentleman must recognise that the Government are not being obdurate in this matter. The chief adjudicator's view was that it would not help.

Ms. Clare Short: He is appointed by the Minister.

Mr. Waddington: That is a ridiculous observation, and the hon. Lady may wish that I had not heard her remark, for she is saying, in effect, that because adjudicators are appointed by the Home Office — in accordance with the recommendations of the Wilson committee — nobody should have respect for the work being done by the adjudicators. That is a wicked thing to say. I hope that, on reflection, the hon. Lady will withdraw her remark, because those who are appointed adjudicators are people of great probity and who carry out an extremely difficult task with great skill.

Ms. Short rose——

Mr. Waddington: I hope that the hon. Lady will reflect on what she said, and I give way to her in the hope that she will withdraw her remark.

Ms. Short: The Minister distorted what I said. I said that the chief adjudicator, who is appointed by the Minister, took the same view on the tape recording of evidence as did the Minister and that that might not have been a total coincidence. I did not make any comment about the general performance of adjudicators—which I consider to be patchy; some are good and some are extremely bad. The whole system would be better if adjudicators were appointed by a body independent of the Home Office.

Mr. Waddington: The House now has the opportunity to judge what the hon. Lady was getting at. I do not think that I was entirely unfair in concluding that she was making a gross attack. She now says in mitigation that the attack was not on all adjudicators but only on the chief adjudicator. I should have called that a plea in aggravation rather than a plea in mitigation.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Waddington: No, I have a great deal of material to cover.

The hon. Member for Mossley Hill advanced a most extraordinary proposition. Like most of the propositions that he advanced it had absolutely nothing to do with the rules before us. Nevertheless, as he mentioned this ridiculous proposition I suppose that I had better take it up. He took the view—presumably it is also the view of the Liberal party—that anyone who arrives at a port of entry in this country and is refused entry should be able to stay here until such time as his appeal is heard. I ask the hon. Gentleman to address his mind to the practicalities of the matter. In those circumstances either one has to fill the gaols and detention centres with people whose appeals are being prepared or one gives the person what he wanted in the first place — access to this country, to which the immigration officer has found that he is not entitled.

Mr. Alton: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Waddington: No, I really must get on——

Mr. Alton rose——

Mr. Waddington: Oh, all right.

Mr. Alton: As the Minister seems to have adopted a new strategy today of attacking the person rather than the argument, I am grateful to him for giving way. I cited the example of a Nigerian widow who arrived in this country with her daughter, having lived here for many years. She was returning to stay with a doctor with whom she had worked. The Minister wrote to me about this on 1 February so I am sure that he has read the details of the case. Surely he is not saying that a person in that situation should simply be shipped back without any chance of staying to lodge an appeal and that four years should elapse before the appeal is heard.

Mr. Waddington: The hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well what I am saying. If a person is refused entry at the port of entry we operate a most generous system of entry as a result of the intervention of a Member of Parliament. There is not one Member here today who has not benefited from the more liberal regime now operated by the Home Office. We are far more willing to grant temporary admission than the Labour Government were. It it is one thing to allow temporary admission while the Minister looks into the case, but I ask the hon. Gentleman to reconsider his proposition that the person should have not just temporary admission but permission to remain here until his or her appeal is heard before an adjudicator, presumably for however long it may take for the legal machinery to be put into action. I repeat that that is the most arrant rubbish.

The Opposition have tabled this prayer, but there is virtually nothing to complain about in the rules. That is why they have so often talked about entirely different matters. In fact, we are leaving things much as they were before and therefore much as they were when the appeals system was set up in 1970 under the Immigration Appeals Act passed by the Labour Government in 1969.

Mr. Budgen: Will my hon. and learned Friend confirm that the Asian community, in particular, is very well organised and has many representative bodies? How many representations of complaint has he received from those bodies? There is a very large Asian community in my constituency, but I have received no complaints at all about this procedure.

Mr. Waddington: I can tell my hon. Friend that we listened with great attention to the representations that were made to us by a number of bodies. As a result, we have not carried out any of the radical changes canvassed in the consultation document. That is why it is so extraordinary that the Opposition are making such a fuss today. I remind them of the propositions canvassed in the consultation document. It suggested combining the right of appeal against a refusal to vary leave with the right to appeal against a decision to deport. We have not done that. The document suggested removing the right of a short-term visitor to appeal against the refusal of his application to have his stay extended or, alternatively, making that right of appeal exercisable only from abroad—we have not done that. The document suggested removing the right of entry clearance and work permit holders to be given leave to appeal from an adjudicator to the immigration appeal tribunal, and abolishing the right of appeal against a refusal to revoke a deportation order. At the same time, the possibility of the introduction of two additional rights of appeal was mentioned: a right of appeal from the tribunal to the High Court on a point of law, and a right of appeal before removal for illegal entrants.

As to the procedure rules, several changes, including an extension of the powers of adjudicators to determine appeals without a hearing, were suggested in the document. Comments on the discussion document were received from the appellate authorities, the Council on Tribunals and from many individuals and organisations interested, including UKIAS and JCWI. Those commenting were generally opposed to suggestions aimed at removing or reducing rights of appeal or an appellant's right to an oral hearing of his case, and most of those commenting were in favour of introducing a right of appeal before removal for illegal entrants.

The comments on the discussion document and suggestions made by interested parties for other reforms of the appeals system have been very carefully considered, and the Government's proposals formulated in the light of the changing situation within the appeals system. The proposals in the discussion document were aimed at reducing delays in the system, but since the review was carried out, a concerted attempt by both the Home Office and the appellate authorities to reduce delays has been successful to the extent that at the end of November last year, the number of appeals awaiting a hearing was approximately 9,500 compared with 16,350 at the end of 1979, while the average delay at the appeal hearing centres has been reduced over the same period from 14 months to three to four months. One might have expected Opposition Members to congratulate the Government on having produced a much more satisfactory situation than that which existed when they were in power, instead of cavilling during the past hour.

In the light of that improvement in the overall position, it has been decided that amendments of the 1971 Act limiting rights of appeal are not necessary at this time. At the same time, we do not propose at present to extend the appeal rights of illegal immigrants.

I know that concern has been expressed about illegal immigrants not having a right of appeal before removal, but it must by remembered that their position at present is exactly the same as that of persons not holding entry clearances or work permits who are refused entry at the ports, and we see no justification for treating more favourably someone who has deliberately managed to enter clandestinely or has obtained leave to enter by deceiving an immigration officer, than someone who has been honest about his intentions and has been refused entry as a result. That would be to reward dishonesty over honesty.

The hon. Member for Battersea mentioned only one of the rules — rule 6. I was surprised that Opposition Members made a fuss about that. Rule 6 now embodies the particulars that must be contained in a notice of appeal. This will enable notice of appeal to be given by letter, for instance — that is, far less formally than at present. However, there will also be a gain in administrative convenience. The intention is to continue to issue appeal forms, but the fact that they do not have to be statutorily prescribed means that changes to the forms that might subsequently become desirable can be achieved without having to amend the statutory instrument. That seems to me to be wholly desirable.

As I have said, I am extremely surprised at the Opposition's attitude. I can only assume that, like the hon. Member for Mossley Hill, they have not taken the trouble to compare the representations made by JCWI with the new regulations. They will find that a number of representations were made to us, and we were asked to drop all the radical proposals in our consultation document.

I took the view that as a result of the magnificent efforts of our staff and the fact that we have got rid of so many of the delays in the appeals system which existed under Labour, it was not necessary to carry out these radical changes that were canvassed in the discussion document. If Opposition Members——

It being half-past Eleven o'clock, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question, pursuant to Standing Order No. 4 (Prayers against statutory instruments, &c. (negative procedure)).

BBC External Services

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Boscawen.]

11.41 pm

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend (Bexleyheath):

"Let me begin on a note upon which there will be no disagreement in any quarter of the House: that is, the support and admiration of all of us—and of course I include Her Majesty's Government—for the work of the External Services of the BBC. There is nobody who does not recognise the excellence of what they do. Certainly so far as I am concerned, I believe them to be an important arm of Government foreign policy. Indeed, I think we have got to look at the whole of our defence and foreign policy as one, and external broadcasting has a most important part to play in the influence that Britain can exert throughout the world."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 30 July 1981; Vol. 423, c. 811.]

Those are not my words, but the words of Lord Carrington, when he was Foreign Secretary, in opening his speech on this subject in another place in July 1981. But, of course, I agree with him completely.

Three years later in a television interview Lord Carrington said:

"When I was Foreign Secretary, I was told I had to save money on the overseas service of the BBC. I think that was really totally counter-productive and the money saved was trivial compared to the amount of damage done. I think the time has now come, really, when the Treasury and the Government ought to look at cutting out a function in Government rather than cheeseparing on the things that are essential and have to be done."

I am grateful for the opportunity to discuss in the House the future of the BBC external services and to draw attention to the appalling way in which those services have been treated by Governments of both parties in recent years. Those two quotes that I read admirably outline my case, and I hope that the second will at least prevent my hon. Friend the Minister from suggesting in his reply that no damage has been done.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Sir A. Kershaw), the Chairman of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs, rightly pointed out during a debate in the House in July 1981;

"We have two assets in the BBC—the English language and its high reputation, based on its activities during the Second World War, which it has managed to maintain. We are to be asked to approve reductions in expenditure on the overseas services at a time when our country has reduced political power and when there is an increase beyond imagination of the power of the spoken word that reaches out beyond frontiers and speaks to each man in his own tongue."—[Official Report, 23 July 1981; Vol. 9, c. 579.]

Exactly so, and the position has become worse since 1981.

The Government have put a thick smokescreen over the figures. I could devote my speech to debating with my hon. Friend, whose difficult task it is tonight to defend a bad record and a worse case, the detailed statistics, but the heart of the matter is that the reduction of £1·2 million envisaged for 1985-86 will be the ninth cut in the working revenue of the external services in 10 years. I have the size of the reduction in the working revenue for each of those 10 years in front of me. Incidentally, £1·2 million is roughly what the National Coal Board pays out by lunch time.

The cuts of 1982 ended Spanish for Europe, the Italian and the Maltese services. French for Europe and the Brazilian service were halved. In the Falklands war, the two nations in Europe least sympathetic to us because of their historical ties were Spain and Italy, with France not far behind. In the BBC handbook for 1984, I find these words:

"The role played by the External Services in coverage of last year's events in the South Atlantic is generally accepted to have been a vital one. The Argentine invasion of the Falklands came at a time when the External Services had just suffered the most wide-spread operational cut for many years. Morale amongst highly-motivated staff had been considerably shaken and many talented broadcasters had been lost."

I am told that morale is still shaky, and talented broadcasters are still being lost.

The grant to the vital transcription service, which supplies recorded programmes for re-broadcasting to over 100 countries, has been reduced by £300,000 and the number of programme hours reduced from 500 per annum to 350. I am well aware of the admirable capital expenditure programme that the Government are funding over nine years, to replace transmitters—some of which were installed during the second world war—at home and abroad. However, our praise for that costly programme must not prevent us from appreciating the crisis that is approaching. On present projections, and if the Foreign Office is not able to make up the loss resulting from a falling pound, which has already added well over £1 million per annum to costs, in the next three years services could be faced with cuts of about 10 per cent.

On the Order Paper is an early-day motion put down by six of my hon. Friends and signed by some 70 hon. Friends, calling for an increase in resources for the services. The recently published Public Expenditure White Paper suggests that an increase in resources is unlikely. Without an increase, half a dozen language services could be faced with the axe. What I find so depressing and deplorable is that above the Whitehall table there are golden words of praise for these services, while below the table the knife is cutting deeper into the bones, the flesh having been removed years ago.

The Select Committee on Foreign Affairs has strongly reiterated its view that funds should be found to enable the BBC to resume the Caribbean service, which was cut in 1974. This would cost approximately £250,000 per annum. Post the invasion of Grenada, this would appear to be an obvious move, but I learn that the service is not to be resumed. There is an overwhelming case to broadcast to Afghanistan for more than a miserable half an hour a day.

I must warn my hon. Friend that unless there is a change of heart by the Government, the row that has been going on between Front and Back Benches since 1979 over the future of these services will reach a crescendo. I do not believe that the Conservative parliamentary party will sit idly by between now and the general election, and watch the life blood of a fine organisation dribble away.

Over many years, I have found the whole system of funding to be wholly unsatisfactory. The Foreign Office has been responsible for accounting for grants in aid only since 1977-78. For the three years before that, the responsibility rested with the Home Office, and before that with the Ministry of Posts and Telecommunications. Since 1979 there has been equal misery all round within the Foreign Office Vote. It is essential, as any of the great commercial organisations could explain to the Government, that Bush house should be funded for at least three years at a time. I note that the review, which I praise for its detailed scrutiny, is at least moving in that direction. There is bound to be inefficient use of capital at present. In theory the head of the external services should be responsible to the BBC board of governors but, like the review, I accept that close links with the Foreign Office are desirable. The present position would be laughable if it did not damage our reputation abroad, as I am sure our ambassadors, high commissioners and representatives are confirming in their dispatches.

The House will know that international broadcasting is a growth business. I am told that in 1955 there were thought to be 237 million radio sets in the world; today there are 1,600 million. The Voice of America has been given $1·2 billion dollars for its expansion plan. The intention is to increase the number of languages in which it broadcasts from 42 to 60. It is worth noting what has happened recently in France. As part of an austerity budget its foreign relations expenditure was reduced all round except for one item, which was external broadcasting. This has increased by the equivalent of about £3 million. The Japanese are expanding their overseas radio as well. The Soviet Union has expanded its output and dominates the airwaves in terms of hours broadcast. It broadcasts for 2,200 hours per week compared with the BBC's 727. There are 98 other international broadcasters, many of whom are anxious to obtain unused frequencies.

In 1987 the World Administrative Radio Conference meets in Geneva to discuss the allocation of frequencies and hard bargaining is expected. If the Government are to force Bush house to cut further language services, skilled operators and audiences will be lost. There is a real possibility also that frequencies will be lost as well.

In 1979 it was proposed that Turkey should be cut out, but Parliament prevented that. The following year the Foreign Office came back with a request that broadcasts to Turkey should be increased. It is a schoolboy howler to put it about that Britain does not need to speak to her friends. Our relationships with our European Community partners have been damaged by both ignorance and misunderstanding of our position on a range of sensitive issues.

The Government sometimes behave like a small boy who is given a gold watch and is quite unaware of its worth. Britain has the largest overseas audience—100 million—and the best overseas broadcasting services, and we treat them shamefully.

Like most of my hon. Friends, I want our past successes in overseas broadcasting to be built on and not pulled down. I want them expanded and I should like to see the Government supporting the BBC's plans for an international television service with an investment of about £5 million over two years. Without such a service I fear that Britain might be beaten by other countries or commercial operators in world television broadcasting.

Finally, I draw to the attention of my colleagues a remark by, of all people, Colonel Gaddafi. He said:

"All the Arab radios rave from dawn 'till noon but nobody listens to them because everyone switches on London."

Are there those in high places in the Government who can see not only what the BBC external services have achieved in 53 years but what they could achieve for our country and for our dangerously divided and turbulent world in the 21st century? Without vision the people perish.

11.53 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Tim Renton): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for

[Mr. Tim Renton]

Bexleyheath (Mr. Townsend) for raising the future of the BBC's external services on the Adjournment. I welcome the debate and my hon. Friend's comments about the high regard in which the House holds the BBC's external services. I do not agree with his remark that we have treated these services shamefully. I hope to show him why I disagree.

The future of so valuable an asset as the BBC external services is naturally a matter of interest and concern to us all. It was precisely with this in mind that, following discussions between the Foreign Office and the external services' management, the BBC board of governors invited a review of the external services in July last year —the first of its kind for 10 years. The team appointed to carry out the review submitted its report simultaneously to my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary and to the chairman of the board of governors.

We have now heard from the board that it, like us, welcomes this thorough and thoughtful examination of the activities of the external services and has agreed to publish the main report. I have therefore arranged for copies to be placed in the Library.

Hon. Members will not yet have had a chance to study the report in full detail, but it is lengthy and contains numerous recommendations. We are still considering our response to it, but I should like to take this opportunity to underline some of the main points in it.

I am happy to say that the review team confirmed the external services' reputation for the quality, accuracy and impartiality of its output, which serves to enhance Britain's image abroad. It was impressed by the dedication, professional skills and motivation of the external services' staff.

There were some criticisms, though. The review team emphasised, for example, that, for the external services to maintain their position in the world, the resources available must be used in the most efficient and sensible ways. It recommended some changes to Foreign Office procedures, and an increased flow of information between the BBC external services and the Foreign Office, to enable the Foreign Office to carry out more effectively its responsibilities for the prescription of the services and for the control of the grant-in-aid to the external services.

The team recommended improved systems and organisation within the external services to achieve more effective use of resources. In addition, following a detailed study of some activities, some changes were recommended, which are estimated to result in annual savings of up to £1.6 million during the next few years.

The team recommended that consideration should be given to fixing the grant-in-aid at the same time as the BBC licence fee—and for the same period—to improve the management and efficiency of the external services. This is a crucial recommendation, which we are naturally studying with special care.

On the future of high frequency transmission and the possible impact of new technology on external broadcasting, the team concluded that the situation should be kept under regular and systematic review. Clearly, new technology in communications is developing quickly and we must examine the opportunities carefully. Detailed discussions will now begin between the Foreign Office and the external services on the follow-up to these recommendations.

We welcome this report and the contribution it will make to improving the effectiveness and economy with which the external services are run. The relationship between the Government and the BBC in respect of the external services, including the Government's responsibilities for prescription and funding and the management responsibilities of the BBC board of governors, are clearly laid down in the royal charter and the licence and agreement. Nothing in the report implies any change in that relationship and those responsibilities, or in the traditional editorial independence of the external services.

We hope that the report will provide a firm foundation for the future development of the external services and that it will lead to improvements in the efficiency, effectiveness and economy with which they are run.

My hon. Friend referred to the capital programme. It is clear that many people have been misled by unfounded speculation about cuts. They have perhaps lost sight of the first objective — the improvement of the external services' worldwide audibility.

As my hon. Friend said, the Government are devoting over £100 million in 1981 prices to a 10-year development programme which is now almost half-way through. As a result of new medium wave transmitters at Ofordness and short wave transmitters at Rampisham, audibility has already been improved in many parts of Europe, including Eastern Europe, and new aerials in Cyprus have improved the quality of broadcasts to the Soviet Union and the Middle East. We had hoped to be well advanced at this stage in the construction of a short wave transmitting station in the United Kingdom at Bearley in order to make further essential improvements in audibility in Eastern Europe. However, after a lengthy public inquiry it was found, as my hon. Friend will know, that the site was unsuitable on environmental and technical grounds. We accepted this decision, of course, but it means a considerable setback to this very important part of the audibility programme. We are giving consideration to finding a solution to this problem and I am hopeful we shall overcome it.

On the other hand, work on the construction of a relay station in Hong Kong has been accelerated so that a start was made last year and, with an extra £2 million which we are pumping in in 1985-86, the project will now be completed in 1987-88, a year ahead of schedule, bringing significant improvements in audibility in the Far East, particularly in China and Japan. Plans are also far advanced to build another relay station to improve audibility in East Afica and I hope it may be possible to accelerate the present schedule so as to build that station over the next three years.

On cuts, my hon. Friend referred in astringent terms to the damage that, in his judgment, has been done, I appreciate that his main concern is about the alleged cuts in the currents expenditure of the external services, but in fact the grant-in-aid to the external services over the past five years has shown a real increase above inflation of some 18 per cent. At the same time the BBC has maintained broadcasting levels of between 716 and 725 hours a week in English and some 36 other languages.

My hon. Friend referred specifically to the cuts in services in 1982, but I should like to point out to him that in 1982 only the half-hour Maltese service was cut completely. The Spanish to Europe service, to which he referred, and the Italian direct services were replaced by recorded services for rebroadcasting locally, and the French to Europe, Portuguese to Brazil and transciption services were each reduced by rather less than one-half. In return, these reductions were offset by increases in other services. For example, the Latin-American Spanish service was increased by 8 hours 45 minutes a week, following the Falklands invasion, and the Pushtu service to Afghanistan was doubled to 3½ hours a week. Therefore in 1985-86, contrary to popular belief, the grant-in-aid will not be cut but will be maintained at its 1984 level, uplifted by the factors applicable to all public expenditure.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: The BBC external services are very sensitive to the falling pound and the increased costs and are hoping that the Foreign and Commonwealth Office will have some happy news. Would my hon. Friend like to be in the happy position of being able to give them happy news tonight?

Mr. Renton: No, I am not in the position of being able to give new happy news to the external services, but I should like to repeat to my hon. Friend something that my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary has said before: that, in addition to the factors applicable to all public expenditure that I have just mentioned, the external services will receive an extra £700,000 towards BBC pay increases above the civil service norm.

My hon. Friend talked of the £1·2 million that the external services will not receive. I appreciate that they requested that sum for disbursement mainly on increased pay-related allowances in 1985-86. As a result of the severe pressure on all Government spending, it was not possible to exempt the external services completely from the economies that have affected the whole range of our representation overseas. We therefore asked them to find this sum from their own resources. My hon. Friend talked of life blood being drained away, but I must point out to him, and I am pleased to say this, that the external services have informed us that, despite difficulties, they will indeed be able to make the necessary savings without cutting any of their broadcasting services.

In the few months during which I have been a Minister at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office I have been struck that so many people that I have met, from Norway to the sub-continent, have paid great compliments to the external services of the BBC. Those remarks were echoed in the opening sentences of my hon. Friend's speech tonight.

I recently visited Pakistan and Bangladesh, two important countries, where I found a large number of people who told me of the pleasure with which they listened to the BBC. At any given time many millions of people throughout the world are listening to the external services of the BBC. The House will appreciate that it is that fact that makes it so important that their transmission of British news should be accurate and impartial. A major responsibility lies on their shoulders to convey a fair picture free from bias at all times and I have no doubt that they are well aware of that.

Question put and agreed to.

HIGHLAND REGION (KINLOCHBERVIE) ORDER CONFIRMATION BILL

Considered; to be read the Third time upon Thursday.

Oral Answers to Questions

EMPLOYMENT

Closed Shop

1. Mr. Walden asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many employees are now estimated to be covered by lawful closed shop agreements.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Peter Bottomley): Only a few thousand out of the 4 million or so employees covered by closed shops have so far been given the chance of voting in a secret ballot. This means that the vast majority of apparent closed shops, including all the large ones, have now lost any protection the law previously gave them and that it is automatically unfair to dismiss any of the employees covered by them on the grounds that they are not union members.

Mr. Walden: Does my hon. Friend share my disappointment at this state of affairs? Is the Department considering what else might be done to encourage people to move in the right direction?

Mr. Bottomley: My hon. Friend and the House will appreciate that if a ballot is not held the effect is the same as if a ballot is held and the right number of people do not vote for the continuation of the closed shop. In effect, the closed shop is lost whether it is not balloted for or whether a ballot is held and an insufficient number vote for it.

Mr. Fatchett: Is not the reality that most employers are happy to disregard the Employment Act 1980? Does the Minister agree that they want sensible industrial relations and the maintenance of closed shops without the interference of the Government and/or legislation? Does he accept that that is the best way to preserve good industrial relations?

Mr. Bottomley: Everyone wants sensible industrial relations. Trade unions have shown that, by opposing the holding of ballots, they are happy not to have closed shops.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Will my hon. Friend persuade his ministerial colleagues that the time has come to embark upon a policy of bringing to people's attention the fact that they cannot be dismissed if they choose not to belong to a closed shop?

Mr. Bottomley: Yes, Sir. I have written to hon. Members on both sides of the House giving this information, and I hope that everyone will pass it on to his or her constituents.

Mr. Skinner: Is it not bordering on hypocrisy for the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) to talk about closed shops for trade unionists when he has a moonlighting job as a lawyer at the Temple which supplements his parliamentary salary? The lawyers have the biggest closed shop in Britain. The hon. Gentleman would not be able to make a penny piece in the law courts if he were not a member of a closed shop. Is it not worth noting also that the Government had to tell the coal board when the NACODS agreement was drawn up——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that the hon. Member has made his point.

Mr. Bottomley: My hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) and the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) have both demonstrated that they can speak well for themselves. The closed shop legislation gives the same chance to all union members.

Gainsborough (MSC Funds)

2. Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement about the Manpower Services Commission's funds devoted to the Gainsborough employment area.

The Minister of State, Department of Employment (Mr. Peter Morrison): I regret that precise figures are not available, but the commission estimates that over £500,000 will be spent in 1984-85 on employment programmes in the area served by the Gainsborough jobcentre and about £9 million on training programmes in Lincolnshire as a whole.

Mr. Leigh: As we come to the end of the second year of the youth training scheme, does my hon. Friend agree that the scheme's outstanding success — both locally where a TVEI project is on the rail and nationally where 420,000 young people are covered—gives the lie to the Opposition's claim that we do not care about youth unemployment? We do care, and we act.

Mr. Morrison: I could not agree more with my hon. Friend. I agree that some Opposition Members fail to appreciate the fact that the youth training scheme is extremely popular among the trainees involved and their parents.

Employment Prospects

3. Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on employment prospects for 1985.

The Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Tom King): The number of people in work has been rising for over a year. The latest reports from both jobcentres and major private agencies indicate a significant improvement over recent years.

Mr. Soames: We are obviously concerned about unemployment. Does my right hon. Friend agree that Britain still has a higher proportion of its working population in employment than either France or Germany?

Mr. King: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for bringing out that point. Obviously, unemployment concerns every hon. Member. We should recognise the truth about employment. According to the latest figures, in Britain 66 per cent. of the population of working age is in employment compared with only 61 per cent. in France and in Germany.

Mr. Wigley: Will the Secretary of State confirm reports in the Sunday newspapers that the Government have set up a new interdepartmental committee, under his chairmanship, to consider the serious impact of unemployment? If so, what are the committee's terms of reference?

Mr. King: If the hon. Gentleman is not supposed to believe what he reads in the newspapers, at least he might do me the courtesy—if he was not able to be here—of refreshing his mind from Hansard about the recent debate on employment, when I made clear the close interest that the Government were taking and will continue to take in measures that will help to alleviate this difficult problem.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Does my right hon. Friend agree that employment prospects for 1985 would be much improved if, for example, the Civil Service unions did not ask for a 15 per cent. pay rise and the teachers' unions did not ask for a £25 a week increase and realised that such increases must be paid for from productive industry, which is already under enough pressure?

Mr. King: As I said in connection with last week's unemployment figures, the greatest single contribution that all of us in work can make is to show good sense and moderation in pay bargaining. It is beyond question that good sense in pay bargaining will be the largest single contribution towards alleviating the problems of the unemployed. I certainly endorse my hon. Friend's statement.

Mr. Leighton: As the Government have set out to increase, not to diminish, unemployment, especially long-term unemployment, when will the Department respond by developing programmes that will pay the unemployed rather more than they are receiving in benefit and will encourage them to do something useful for themselves and the country instead of allowing them to rot on the dole?

Mr. King: I believe that the hon. Gentleman, who is Chairman of the Select Committee, has recognised the improvements that we have made, for example, to the community programme. Those improvements are specifically designed to help to alleviate the problems of long-term unemployment. I believe that the hon. Gentleman will welcome the increase in the enterprise allowance scheme, a third of whose members have come from long-term unemployment. The scheme is designed specifically to help those people to start businesses of their own. We are conscious of the fact that this is a worrying matter during the present difficulties.

Mr. Stokes: Is my right hon. Friend aware that employment prospects will become much better in the next few years, when the numbers coming on to the employment register, due to the fall in the birth rate, will be much lower?

Mr. King: It is true that, although we are creating more jobs, we have, as yet, failed to achieve a reduction in unemployment because of the increased numbers coming into the working population. As my hon. Friend said, those numbers should be a declining feature because of the change in the demographic base. By the end of this decade it may work in the opposite direction.

Mr. Bell: Does the Secretary of State accept that his words will give cold comfort to those who live in Corringham Walk, Netherfields, Middlesbrough, where 91 per cent. of the heads of households are out of work? That means that of 500 heads of households who are fit and available for work, only 45 are working. What message does the Secretary of State have for those brave, valiant and unfortunate people who are suffering from the consequences of the Government's economic actions?

Mr. King: With the interest that he shows, I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman would know that I have made it abundantly clear that the Government recognise the difficulties of which the north-east and the extreme south-west are the worst examples. In answer to the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) I referred to the work that we have done, the consideration that we have given, the improvements that we have already made and the work which is continuing to see how the Government, with the general improvement in the economy, can ensure that we get more jobs. Anything that the hon. Gentleman can do to encourage moderation will help the plight of those people.

Mr. Penhaligon: Will the Secretary of State tell the House what he believes to be the greatest threat to employment prospects in 1985—a small increase in inflation, or a substantial increase in interest rates?

Mr. King: I do not want to make that choice. In view of the problems that we face at present, the Government have given a clear signal of the importance that they attach to keeping on top of inflation. The benefits are shown clearly by the improvement in job prospects. That gain must not be thrown away—it must be built upon. By controlling inflation, I hope that we can achieve a sensible reduction in interest rates.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Is my right hon. Friend not worried that a high proportion of the new jobs being created go to married women, often working part-time? Does he agree that some features of our tax and national insurance system encourage that? Will he undertake to consider reforms which aim at having one breadwinner in every family rather than two in some families?

Mr. King: Serving, as I do, in the Government, I do not want to enter into that argument, but I recognise that there are some anomalies and problems in the present structure which tilt the balance unsatisfactorily. I confirm that there are matters that we are considering in that respect.

Mr. Prescott: The Secretary of State often lectures others about what they can do to reduce unemployment. As a member of a Government who have thrown many thousands out of work in the Civil Service, particularly in his own Department, is he aware that the proposal that he has before him about the Manpower Services Commission's skillcentres, which involves 1,000 redundancies in 1985, has led to pressure in a letter from the MSC to those employees threatening that if, using their constitutional rights, they protest to Parliament about redundancies in 1985, it will use the Industrial Relations Act 1971 to intimidate them?

Mr. King: I hope that the whole House will support proposals which are directed towards the maximisation of training and the most efficient use of resources. The Government are committed to using resources as effectively as possible to ensure that training is brought to people. If in the process there must be some reorganisation —the hon. Gentleman knows the decision that is before me for consideration at present—I have made clear to the Select Committee the criteria by which I shall judge it.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is another question on that matter.

Basildon

4. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people are employed in high technology industries in Basildon, by industry; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Alan Clark): It is not possible to give a precise figure for the number of people currently employed in this type of industry. The latest available figures from the 1981 census of employment showed that nearly 5,000 people were employed in Basildon in industries associated with technical innovation.

Mr. Amess: Is my hon. Friend aware that there are many high-tech industries in Basildon, including Rayridge, which is one of the few British robotic companies? Does he agree that Basildon is an excellent place for such job opportunities because of its fine housing and excellent air, sea, road and rail communications?

Mr. Clark: Yes, Sir. My hon. Friend's claims for his constituency are borne out by the news of industrial development in the area. I am aware that £9 million is being invested in a new data processing centre and that GEC Avionics is moving into the old Rothman's factory, about whose closure so many hon. Members agitated last year.

Voluntary Projects Programme

5. Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the operation to date of the voluntary projects programme.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I have been very encouraged by the achievements of the voluntary projects programme, which, in the course of this year, will be providing some 55,000 unemployed people with the opportunity of constructive activity. The Government announced in November that the programme was to be extended for a further three years.

Mr. Freeman: Is my hon. Friend aware that this popular and important programme helps two projects in my constituency, one of which, Furniture Turnaround, certainly helps the poor and the unemployed? Will my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State argue with the Treasury for funding all such future programmes on a longer term albeit declining, basis, so that the voluntary societies can make plans with greater certainty?

Mr. Bottomley: My hon. Friend's encouragement and support are most welcome. However, if initial funding is given, with the possibility of extension, it is possible to see whether the projects are worth supporting in the future. Many projects are in their second or third year of funding.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Is the Minister aware that his hon. Friend the Minister of State was generous enough to visit my constituency to view the CATS project in Bramley? Is the hon. Gentleman prepared to step outside the narrow limitations on the number of VPP places available in any one city, in order to assist an especially large project, such as that one, which is in need of help?

Mr. Bottomley: We are always interested in views that are put forward. The extension of the programme for three years gives greater support than there would have otherwise have been. The hon. Gentleman's comments will be noted.

Young Persons

6. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many young people under 21 years of age have been unemployed for more than one year.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 10 January 1985 the number of claimants in the United Kingdom under 20 years of age who had been unemployed for over one year was 121,000. The available analysis by age does not separate those under 21.

Mr. Yeo: As it is the lower paid jobs that offer that particularly tragic group of youngsters their best hope of employment, will my hon. Friend use his considerable influence within the Government to try to achieve an increase in the lower earnings limit for national insurance contributions from £34 to £100 per week?

Mr. Clark: My hon. Friend's central point is right. Young people must not be priced out of jobs. That is why we have a young workers' scheme, and we regret it when the wages councils frustrate that objective. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services is at present engaged in a review of social services costs and charges. I shall draw my hon. Friend's views to his attention.

Mr. Boyes: In Tyne and Wear, 500 people under the age of 18 have been unemployed for over a year. Has the Minister had time to read page 106 of the latest issue of "Social Trends", according to which there is a direct relationship between high unemployment and long-term illness? Are not the Government, who are guilty of creating long-term unemployment, also guilty of creating long-term illness?

Mr. Clark: The hon. Gentleman is right to draw attention to those young people who have been unemployed for over a year. That category causes us great concern. We have spent £2 billion on special employment and training measures. The level of resources and the way in which they are applied are subject to continuous review and discussion. The group to which he refers is at present under consideration.

Mr. Rowe: In view of the considerable success of the enterprise allowance scheme, will my hon. Friend look again at the extreme partition between those who receive benefit of some kind and those who receive a wage? There should be room for overlap.

Mr. Clark: That is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services. There have already been changes affecting the community programme, and I welcome them.

Mr. Flannery: Is it not a fact that scores of thousands of young people who have left school have never known what it is to work? When will the Government realise that that terrible crisis is an act not of God but of their monetarist policies, which it is time they brought to a close because they are uneconomic and loss-making?

Mr. Clark: The hon. Gentleman is not entirely right. Certainly there was a category of young person, as his hon. Friend the Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) mentioned, prior to the introduction of the youth training scheme, who could not get a job and had been unemployed for more than a year. Since the introduction of the YTS, there is no reason why any youngster should leave school without the possibility of obtaining a place on the youth training scheme.

Job Creation and Protection

7. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many persons are now being employed on the various job creation and protection measures covered by the Manpower Services Commission.

Mr. Peter Morrison: At the end of December, 662,000 people were being helped by our employment and training measures. Of these, 478,000 were on schemes administered by the Manpower Services Commission.

Mr. Taylor: Are not those dramatic figures an answer to those who say that the Government are doing nothing about unemployment? Nevertheless, has my hon. Friend found an answer to the problem of JEGS Electrical of Southend, which would like to add to those figures, but has been told by the Department that it cannot get a grant if it pays young workers more than £40 a week, and by the wages council that it will be sent to prison if it does not pay them £40·05? Can he find a solution to the problem and make those figures even more dramatic?

Mr. Morrison: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for what he said about the schemes run by the Manpower Services Commission. Contrary to what the Opposition say, those schemes are extremely popular. My hon. Friend will have heard the reply of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary about wages councils in that regard.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is the Minister aware that many of the young people in west Cumberland who are in trouble with the police, on whatever charge, whether poaching or vandalism, are in trouble only because they do not have, but want, work? In so far as the community programme gives them the opportunity to work, particularly that age group, will the Minister ensure that when the Budget is announced every representation will have been made to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to ensure an expansion of that programme because we desperately need those places in west Cumberland?

Mr. Morrison: I am aware that in Cumbria all 16-year-olds and, in effect, all 17-year-olds, have the opportunity of a place on a youth training scheme. I am also aware that the hon. Gentleman has worked hard on and been of great support to the community programme. I listened carefully to what he had to say about it.

Labour Statistics

8. Mr. Dormand asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the total number of unemployed and the number of long-term unemployed, respectively.

9. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the latest unemployment figures.

14. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people are currently unemployed in Great Britain; and what percentage that is of the work force.

Mr. Tom King: On 10 January the number of unemployed claimants in Great Britain was 3,218,000, and in the United Kingdom it was 3,341,000, representing a rate of 13·7 per cent.

Of those, 1,316,000 had been unemployed for more than 12 months.

Mr. Dormand: Is the Minister aware that those figures, particularly those for the long-term unemployed, demonstrate more clearly than anything the sheer incompetence and insensitivity of the Government? Is he further aware that within those figures is the fact that in the northern region 243,492 people are out of work, which is 19·1 per cent., and the highest figure for any region outside Northern Ireland? Is he also aware that those figures have increased every month in the five years since the Government came to power? Did the Minister see the letter in The Times yesterday from the chairman of the northern region Confederation of British Industry, the chairmen of the chambers of trade and other employers' associations about the need for a radical change of policy? If his cronies are suggesting that, what on earth is the Minister going to do about it?

Mr. King: I am disappointed in the hon. Gentleman's contribution. He knows perfectly well that slogans on such a serious subject do not help. I do not stand here and criticise the Socialist Governments in France, Spain or Italy of insensitivity because in those countries unemployment during the past year rose significantly faster than it did here. I hope the hon. Gentleman will recognise that the best hope for this country is to create more jobs. I hope also that he will welcome the fact that during the past year, after the great loss of jobs that we suffered from the lack of competitiveness in British industry, we have started again to create more jobs.

Mr. Parry: The Secretary of State should hang his head in shame at such abysmal figures. In addition to almost 3·5 million people unemployed, 679,000 people are on Government-funded schemes, and a further 500,000 people do not register, making the true figure 4·5 million unemployed. That is the highest figure of any major industrialised nation. Why does not the Secretary of State, who is pathetic, do us all a favour by offering his resignation and packing up?

Mr. King: I address exactly the same comment to the hon. Gentleman as I did to the hon. Member for Easington (Mr. Dormand). It is no good making such political comments about this serious problem. He chose to advance the size of our programme as a criticism of the Government. I take pride in the fact that, for the first time, a Government have provided a proper training and work preparation scheme for our young people. I take pride in the fact that we have increased to more than £2 billion our investment in training and special measures. I do not take that as a criticism.

Mr. Pike: Does the Secretary of State accept that, to millions of people, the present level of unemployment is unacceptable, as was the Prime Minister's comment last week that the figure was "disappointing". That was an extremely poor word to use, even in parliamentary terms, for a figure that is completely unacceptable. When will the right hon. Gentleman persuade his colleagues in the Government to stop playing around with the problem of unemployment and to start spending money in the public sector and on infrastructure to create jobs, because that is the only way to reduce the present unacceptable total?

Mr. King: The present level is not unacceptable to some people in the House—it is unacceptable to every hon. Member of the House. The House owes it to the country to address responsibly the question of what is the most effective way to reduce unemployment. The hon. Gentleman peddles again the belief that a wand can be waved to reduce unemployment. He should ask the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) why he did not wave that wand when he was Secretary of State for Employment and when unemployment doubled.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Does my right hon. Friend accept that people made redundant in traditional industries have special problems in finding new work? In this respect, will he recognise the work done by the information technology centres in training for new technologies, and extend that training to older people made redundant from traditional industries?

Mr. King: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He will have noticed that the central thrust of the new proposals in "Training for Jobs" is that more public expenditure will go towards training the unemployed, including the long-term unemployed, to helping the information technology centres, and to putting training into the community programmes to help the unemployed back into work. That is a key element in our programme.

Mr. Madel: As it is important to get many more youngsters off the dole queues and into training courses, why do not the Government abolish the 21 and 15-hour rules as they affect benefits, which would not only give youngsters a better opportunity but would help industry to overcome some skill shortages?

Mr. King: I note what my hon. Friend says. He will be aware, as several hon. Members have said, that there are undoubtedly problems in helping the maximum number of youngsters into work. Not the least of those problems is the fact that, in many industries, the starting rate for a 16-year-old is 50 per cent. of the adult rate, whereas in many industries in Germany it is 25 per cent. of the adult rate. It is interesting to compare the relative levels of youth unemployment in Germany and in Britain.

Mr. Hickmet: Bearing in mind that, as a direct consequence of the miners' strike, the British Steel Corporation is paying £3·5 million a week to move illegally blacked coal and ore and that, consequently, it has had to cut capital investment and its maintenance programme, as has the National Coal Board, may I ask my right hon. Friend to advise the House what effect he believes that had on unemployment during 1984, and what effect he expects a solution of the strike to have for the unemployed in 1985?

Mr. King: It is extremely difficult to get a precise figure as to what the impact will be. It is something that I would like to see, because there is no doubt that the miners' strike and the length of time that it has lasted has been very damaging to employment prospects in the country. In 1983 we had the highest growth rate of any country in Europe. The miners' strike has been a setback to that growth rate. Even so, we achieved an average rate of growth in 1984, and the forecast of the OECD is that we should look forward again to the highest rate of growth of any country in Europe. That will provide the best possible prospect of jobs if this unnecessary and costly strike is settled.

Mr. McGuire: Is not the greatest indictment of the Government that the figure we have been given, whether the real figure of 4·5 million or the massaged figure of approximately 3·5 million, is being added to at the rate of a net loss of 20,000 jobs every month? On the Government's own estimates the figure will rise to over 250,000 to be added to the total already given. Is that not the greatest indictment of the Government? When the Government came to power they promised that they would release an entrepreneurial flair which would reduce the 1·25 million unemployed, a matter they boasted about in a huge slogan "Labour isn't working". If it was not working with 1·25 million, it is not working now.

Mr. King: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman did not listen to the earlier answer. He is quite wrong. There is not a net loss of jobs, there is now, at last, an increase in the number of jobs. There is also an increase in the working population and that is why we have to see that increase in jobs further enhanced.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Do not the figures which the Secretary of State announced today prove that the Government's policies over the past five years have utterly failed to help make British industry more competitive? Does not the fact that the public expenditure figures, which have recently been produced, show that there will be unemployment for 3 million-plus for the next few years demonstrate what a scandal it is that the Government still claim that they have the right policies to reduce the unemployment figures?

Mr. King: I do not agree with the assertion of the hon. Gentleman. I would expect the hon. Gentleman to have recognised, after a period of undoubtedly serious shake-out in industry in which the overmanning which should have been tackled many years ago but which was allowed to fester was tackled—the inevitable consequence of which was some increase in unemployment—that at last we have moved into a situation in which we are creating more jobs. The result of the policy of reducing inflation has been to make Britain more competitive and to make that possible. What we now want to do is to reinforce that advance.

Mrs. Jill Knight: Will my right hon. Friend consider, as he rightly and regularly publishes unemployment figures, publishing the figures for job vacancies also? To some people it is strange that, in many areas where unemployment is worryingly high, the local papers each night carry 15, 16 or 17 pages of small ads placed by employers wanting people to fill jobs.

Mr. King: It is certainly true, if one looks at the flow of vacancies through jobcentres and at the forecasts of Manpower and other private employment agencies, that they forecast the best prospects for new jobs for five years. With the high flow of vacancies through jobcentres, there is clear evidence of a significant improvement, not only in the south-east, to which obviously much of the improvement is directed, but in other parts of the country.

Mr. Foot: When the right hon. Gentleman dares to compare the record of his Government with that of their predecessors, will he recall that in the last months of that Labour Government the unemployment figures were coming down each month? If his Government could achieve any comparable figures, he would say that it was the biggest miracle since the loaves and the fishes. Will he also apply his mind to the fact that he should stop the closure of skillcentres, as the whole country is crying out for more skills?

Mr. King: What I do recall is the part played by the right hon. Gentleman and some of his right hon. Friends in deliberately obstructing the restructuring of major parts of British industry and the nationalised industries at a time when they faced a serious loss of competitiveness, condemning many people to much more serious unemployment. The steel industry is the most obvious illustration of that. I recall the contribution which the right hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends made to Britain's ill-prepared state when the recession struck. I think the history books will recognise that a precious opportunity was lost through the incompetence of the Labour Government at that time.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Will my right hon. Friend bear in mind that there are now more potential sponsors under the community programme than approved projects in the Edinburgh area? Will he keep that thought in mind as there seems to be substantial scope for expanding that programme in future?

Mr. King: I note what my hon. Friend says. Contrary to the unhelpful comments by some Opposition Members, the success of the youth training scheme and of the community programme has been achieved through the willingness of employers, other organisations and the trainees themselves to work together to make a success of those programmes. There has been a real national effort to make a success of both programmes, and I pay tribute to that.

Mr. Evans: Will the Secretary of State acknowledge that if the 660,000 people on the Government's special employment schemes are added to the number of unemployed claimants that the right hon. Gentleman has just announced, as well as the 400,000 people who were fiddled out of the unemployment statistics in 1982 and 1983, that makes a total of nearly 4·5 million people who are without real jobs and that that figure is more than three times the figure when Labour left office? Will the right hon. Gentleman also acknowledge that there are now more long-term unemployed people than the total number of unemployed in Great Britain when Labour left office? Is not that the real picture of the inhuman misery that the Government have unleashed upon this country?

Mr. King: That is the most disgraceful supplementary question that we have had during this Question Time. The Labour party tried to launch a scheme on the same principle as the youth training scheme, but could not get the support of the Labour Government. The youth training scheme has been launched and carried through with the support of employers, trade unions and the trainees themselves. The hon. Gentleman's supplementary question is an insult to many trade unionists who have worked hard to make a success of the YTS. I take pride in the increased resources. I do not think that it is disgraceful that we have increased resources to help make a success of the scheme.

Race Relations Act 1976

10. Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he is now in a position to announce the date when he will introduce legislation to amend the Race Relations Act 1976 in respect of the code of practice for the elimination of racial discrimination and the promotion of equality of opportunity in employment, published by the Commission for Racial Equality; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: It is our firm intention, as soon as the parliamentary timetable permits, to amend section 47 of the Race Relations Act 1976 to enable my right hon. Friend to amend codes of practice before their presentation to Parliament for approval.

Mr. Proctor: Is my hon. Friend aware that when our right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry was Secretary of State for Employment he pledged, shortly before the general election, that amending legislation would be introduced? When will the pledge be redeemed?

Mr. Clark: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is well aware of that pledge and the importance that many of his hon. Friends attach to it. He is particularly aware of the concern that has been expressed by the Select Committee on Employment. As my hon. Friend knows, the CRE will put forward revisions to the code, following a review, within three years, and plainly it is desirable that amending powers should be available by then.

Ms. Clare Short: Will the Minister comment on the leak from his Department, which suggests that the Government are considering exempting businesses in general, and small businesses in particular, from the operation of the Race Relations Act? How does requiring businesses not to treat black people unjustly impose financial obligations on them? Does the real explanation lie in a further leak that has come from his Department, which suggests that in a departmental meeting he referred to the black citizens of Britain as people from Bongo-Bongo land? Does not that remark make him unfit to hold the responsible office that he does?

Mr. Clark: I am delighted to congratulate the hon. Lady on her elevation to the Front Bench, and I look forward to many adversarial confrontations with her. As to her allegation of what is being planned in my Department, I have no knowledge of this.

Skillcentres

12. Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Employment what consultations he has had with the Manpower Services Commission about the future of skillcentres.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The chairman wrote to my right hon. Friend on 24 January with a full report of the commission's views.

Dr. McDonald: In view of the grave disquiet over the plans to close 29 skillcentres and over growing skill shortages, and as fears have been expressed that this will lead to a decline in the skillcentre training agency, will the Minister urgently arrange for a debate on the matter in the House? Will he further arrange for a stop to be put to the disgraceful plans of the Manpower Services Commission?

Mr. Morrison: I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House has heard what the hon. Lady has said about a debate. She will no doubt agree that money voted by the House should go on training rather than on bricks and mortar and on supervisors who do not have anybody to train.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Roger King asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 5 February.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. King: As, so far today, another 600 mineworkers have gone back to work, and as the overwhelming view of the House last night was that a negotiated settlement on the basis of uneconomic pit closures had to be reached, can my right hon. Friend confirm that the NACODS agreement is still there for the National Union of Mineworkers to pick up? If the NUM has trouble arriving at an agenda agreeable to it in which the closure of uneconomic pits is item No. 1, can my right hon. Friend use her good offices to make it item No. 2, with "apologies" as item No. 1?

The Prime Minister: I confirm what was said last night. As I have frequently said to the Leader of the Opposition, the strike would be over if the NUM accepted the NACODS agreement and the NACODS approach. I believe that the National Coal Board was right to make the fundamental issue of this strike—the closure of pits on uneconomic grounds—item No. 1 in the agenda. If the NUM would agree to the wording for item No. 1 sent to it by the NCB, negotiations could start.

Mr. Steel: Will the Prime Minister find time today to send a message of congratulations, on behalf of the whole House, to the Archbishop of Canterbury on the success of his envoy through the patient diplomacy in Libya?

The Prime Minister: I gladly join the right hon. Gentleman, the Leader of the Liberal party. The Libyan decision to release the four hostages into Mr. Waite's custody is a welcome development. We are deeply grateful to His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury and to Mr. Waite for the patience and skill that they have shown in the past few months. We now look to the Libyan authorities to complete quickly the formalities for the early return of the four people to their families in Britain.

Mr. Chris Smith: Does the Prime Minister recall that last Thursday she told me on the Floor of the House that she had never predicted that unemployment would start to fall? Does she also recall that in November 1983 she said on the Floor of the House that she hoped to see a "reduction" in unemployment in the coming months? Does she also recall that in December 1983, she said: "Unemployment . . . appears to have peaked"? —[Official Report, 8 December 1983; Vol. 50, c. 461.] Will she now be more honest with the House and tell us that unemployment is remorselessly rising? Will she show any remorse for the part that her Government's policies have played in that?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman has struggled to find quotations and has been wholly unable to find one that predicted the state of unemployment and gave figures either for the end of a year or for the future. The hon. Gentleman astonishes me. Yes, I do hope that unemployment will fall. I hope that the hon. Gentleman hopes so too.

Q2. Mr. Neale asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 5 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Neale: Has my right hon. Friend noted that retail spending in December was the highest on record in terms of both value and volume? Does she agree that one of the best ways to create more home-based jobs would be to meet that increased demand with home-produced products and services which are both enterprising and competitive, rather than to surrender a substantial part of that demand to our overseas competitors?

The Prime Minister: Yes, retail sales were very high indeed. It shows that there is no shortage of overall demand. I hope that more and more people will buy British goods because they are the best and I hope that more and more manufacturers will realise that the components that they buy can be manufactured just as well in Britain and upon as competitive a basis.

Mr. Kinnock: After another year in which industrial production was down, the pound was down and the trade balance was down, while manufactured imports were up by 10 per cent., interest rates were up by 15 per cent. and the unemployment rate was up by 150,000, was the Chancellor of the Exchequer correctly conveying the Prime Minister's view when he said last night that the Government's strategy "has achieved what it set out to achieve"?

The Prime Minister: The Government's strategy has achieved the lowest inflation for 15 or 16 years, which is absolutely vital, the highest output, which is absolutely vital, and record investment. On top of all that we have honoured our pledges to the pensioners and have achieved a 20 per cent. real increase in the National Health Service. That is far better than the record of the right hon. Gentleman's party.

Mr. Kinnock: We are used to hearing the Prime Minister's tales of recovery.

"To be told that we are in the fourth year of recovery with unemployment at 3½ million is a definition of an economic boom unknown to me."

Those are the words of the Conservative Member of Parliament for Bury, North (Mr. Burt) in the current edition of Reformer, the journal of the Tory Reform Group. Its president is the right hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Walker). Does the Prime Minister not realise that businesses and managers all over the country take the same view of affairs as her hon. Friend and that her policies and strategies are not an achievement but an act of economic sabotage on a grand scale?

The Prime Minister: If the right hon. Gentleman thinks that, he must apply exactly the same strictures to the German economy, which announced today record unemployment of something like 10·4 per cent. Germany also has conscription. It has also sent home a number of its gastarbeiter. What the right hon. Gentleman is refusing to do is to recognise that we are in a technological age and can turn out manufactured goods with far fewer people, and that therefore we have to aim for more employment in the service industries, which are labour-intensive. But that the right hon. Gentleman refuses to do.

Mr. Kinnock: I am most concerned about the real Britain. The three chairmen of chambers of commerce, the Northumbrian branch of the British Institute of Management, the northern region of the Confederation of British Industry and the north-east branch of the Institute of Directors yesterday asked the Prime Minister in The Times to engage in a programme of public works. They dismissed the idea of income tax cuts as a way to promote recovery and asked the Prime Minister to do something now to bring down unemployment. The hon. Friends of the Prime Minister are telling her that, business men and managers are telling her that, we are telling her that. Why does not the Prime Minister listen and learn and change her policies?

The Prime Minister: If the right hon. Gentleman were to look at the CBI forecast he would find that it is optimistic and confident and that both industry and trade, as my hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, North (Mr. Neale) said—with record sales, record output, record investment and rising profits—are well pleased.

Q3. Mr. Tim Smith asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 5 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Smith: What reassurance can my right hon. Friend give to my constituents on airports policy following last week's debate? Can she confirm that it remains Government policy not to build a fifth terminal at Heathrow and to introduce the 275,000 air traffic movements limit when the fourth terminal is opened later this year?

The Prime Minister: I realise that my hon. Friend has a constituency interest in this, but I am sure he will understand that it would be best for me to make no further comment whatever until the Government have considered everything that has been said and decided what policy to bring before the House for its approval.

Q4. Mr. Frank Cook asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 5 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Cook: Will the Prime Minister afford the Chamber some time this afternoon to explain how it is that Sarah Tisdall could be subjected to Government-inspired charges for circulating a somewhat unclassified document, while much more senior officials are to be allowed to give evidence to the Australian Royal Commission on nuclear testing and yet be exempted from perjury? Will she explain how one person can be imprisoned for telling the truth while others can be let off scot-free for telling lies under oath? Will she explain whether, when she refers to law and order, she is referring to her law and order or Parliament's?

The Prime Minister: I do not accept the premise in the hon. Gentleman's question. Prosecutions are not a matter for Her Majesty's Government, as the hon. Gentleman knows full well. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will think it right that we should give every assistance possible to the Australian commission of inquiry. That is what we are doing.

Q5. Mr. Fox asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 5 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Fox: Will my right hon. Friend accept that, following the opening of the border between Gibraltar and Spain, a cloud hung over the ceremony—the issue of sovereignty? Will she take the opportunity today to reassure our friends in Gibraltar that their views on that issue will be paramount?

The Prime Minister: I believe that the opening of the border between Gibraltar and Spain today was generally welcomed, but I understand the purpose of my hon. Friend's question. Let me make it clear that the statement of 27 November 1984 underlined Her Majesty's Government's intention fully to maintain their commitment to honour the freely and democratically expressed wishes of the people of Gibraltar, as set out in the preamble to the Gibraltar constitution of 1969. As my hon. Friend says, Her Majesty's Government have given assurances to the people of Gibraltar that Gibraltar will remain part of Her Majesty's dominions unless and until an Act of Parliament provides otherwise, and, furthermore, that Her Majesty's Government will never enter into arrangements under which the people of Gibraltar would pass under the sovereignty of another state against their freely and democratically expressed wishes. [Interruption.] The Opposition may not take much notice of that; we cherish the freedom of the people of Gibraltar to decide their future.

Q6. Mr. Hardy asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 5 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hardy: Will the right hon. Lady agree that since she took office as Prime Minister her Government have received £50,000 million in revenue from offshore activity? What has the country to show for it?

The Prime Minister: If the hon. Gentleman had listened to the economic debate that we had the other day he would have heard the point made — I thought effectively—that when we no longer have the North sea oil assets it will be vital to have replaced them by other income-producing assets. When we came to power we had £15 billion worth of assets overseas. We now have £70 billion worth, sufficient to give us a goodly income now and in future years.

Q7. Mr. Heddle asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 5 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Heddle: Will my right hon. Friend take time today to consider the position of local councils which have lent on mortgage £4,000 million over 15, 20 or 25 years? Would it not be better if those local councils made that money available to building societies and other financial institutions and so re-invested the money in rehabilitation, modernisation and improvement of the 23,500 houses which they have left empty for more than 12 months?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I believe that my hon. Friend is right. I notice that he has tabled a question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer about some of the complexities of what would emerge from such a policy, and I shall leave my right hon. Friend to answer that in fuller detail.

Sub Judice Rule

3.31 pm

Mr. David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. On 28 January the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) raised with you a point of order concerning the remarks of a Member of another place about the pending case of Osprey v. British Shipbuilders. He quoted the following remarks of Admiral Hill-Norton:

"'One cannot help feeling that, like the Clive Ponting case, they are doing it to suppress something which may be damaging to the reputation of Government Ministers and officials. The whole thing stinks'." — [Official Report, 28 January 1985; Vol. 72, c. 36.]

He sought your ruling on the matter and you replied that you would certainly do that. I understand that you have written to the hon. Member, but you have not ruled in the House.

First, it is presumably not a matter for you what a Member of another place says, but what is a matter for you, I submit with respect, is whether the fact that this case is not yet set down for trial enables us in this House to ask questions about the background to the case. Perhaps you would also comment on the leader in The Times this morning and say whether it has got the sub judice rule right, as I believe it has.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) did raise that point of order on Monday of last week. He asked me to reflect upon the issues raised in the comments made publicly by a Member of another place on matters at present before the courts of law. I went into the matter in great detail and I wrote to the hon. Member giving my conclusions. There was nothing secret about what I wrote. Nevertheless, when I write letters to hon. Members I do not expect copies to be given to the press, at any rate not without my authority. I must say in fairness to the hon. Member for Linlithgow that he has apologised for doing that.

So that there should be no ambiguity about the matter, I will arrange for the publication of my letter in Hansard, in accordance with the statement made by my predecessor on 5 November 1981 about the publication of private rulings from the Chair.

Mr. Steel: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. The point on which I am asking you to rule is whether it is correct that it is open to hon. Members to ask questions relating to this case until such time as it is set down for trial.

Mr. Speaker: I think it would be wise for the right hon. Member, and indeed for the House, to see my letter in detail. I will say this in clarification. Matters awaiting or under adjudication in a civil court may not be referred to from the time that the case has been set down for trial or otherwise brought before the court. The Select Committee of 1971-72 drew this point to the attention of the House when it said that the House should not expect to see documents in the possession of the court and that the House should be aware of the power of the court over the disclosure of documents submitted to it.

I remind the House that it remains open to any Member to pursue general points about the discovery of documents or in camera heatings in any parliamentary way open to him. Indeed, several hon. Members have already used these procedures.

Mr. John Ryman (Blyth Valley): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. While I do not want to prolong matters, may I ask how a Member can know when a case has been set down for trial, it being a matter between the solicitors on both sides?

Mr. Speaker: There are means of finding that out.

Mr. Ryman: There are?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member is a lawyer. He should know.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You said that you did not expect private letters written to hon. Members to find their way to the press. May I have an assurance that once you have retired from your present job the details of any private conversations that you have had with hon. Members will not, certainly until 30 years are up, find their way into various publications? Although I had no objection to two private conversations of mine finding their way into a book, I raise the matter because the principle involved should be of concern to the House.

Mr. Speaker: I know to what the hon. Member is referring, but it is not a matter for me. It may be of comfort to the House to know that I have no intention of writing anything.

Prime Minister's Question Time

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): On a different point of order, Mr. Speaker. At Question Time today a question was asked of the Prime Minister about Gibraltar. It may or may not have been what is commonly known as a plant. Whether or not it was, it had all the appearance of one. More important is the fact that a carefully prepared lengthy statement was read by the Prime Minister in reply to that question. We recognise that inevitably the right hon. Lady must carry voluminous notes with her. On this occasion, however, she read that statement from beginning to end in what was precious Back Benchers' time. Was that not an abuse of the House?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must say, in fairness to the hon. Member for Shipley (Mr. Fox), whose question it was, that, although I have heard of the planted question theory, I know nothing about it.

Members of Parliament (Lobbying by Constituents)

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I seek your advice on the important matter of the right of individuals to approach their Members of Parliament in the House. You will be aware that at Question Time I attempted to ask the Secretary of State for Employment about the rights of employees of his Department to approach this House next week to protest about redundancies and closures. I have been told that, even if they come here to lobby their Members of Parliament in their own time, they will be threatened with the Industrial Relations Act. How can we seek to defend the rights of people who wish to see their Members of Parliament about the Government's actions?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think that that is a matter for me.

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): Further to the point of order raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott). Although I recognise the force of your view, Mr. Speaker, that the approach by citizens to this place to see their Members of Parliament may not directly be a matter for you, the right of citizens to come here to see their Members of Parliament has been a jealously guarded privilege of simply being a citizen of this democracy. If, by virtue of the employment of people, the Government are able to threaten them with action as a consequence of their coming here in their own leave time to lobby Members of Parliament, to whom should those people go for protection in respect of what is perceived to be a basic right to come here to lobby Members of Parliament? Your guidance on this issue would be appreciated, Mr. Speaker, otherwise we shall be in the extraordinary position of having a Government as an employer seriously impeding by threats the right of people to see their Members of Parliament at Parliament.

Mr. Speaker: I fully accept that there is a right on the part of citizens to lobby their Members of Parliament, but whether they are given leave to do so cannot be a matter on which I can be held responsible. I do not think that the right hon. Gentleman suggests otherwise. If he is suggesting that privilege is involved, he should write to me in the usual way and I shall certainly consider the matter.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): Before you give a ruling on this matter, Mr. Speaker, may I ask you to read the report of the Committee of Privileges of 1940, which sets out that a serving officer approached Captain Duncan Sandys, who was then a Member, with information about deficiencies in the nation's defences, as a result of which the War Office took action to prosecute the officer concerned. The Committee of Privileges took up the matter, interrogated the then Prime Minister, and reported that any matter brought by a citizen to a Member of Parliament with a view to action in the House was itself privileged. That was an important judgment 45 years ago and is directly relevant to the issue which my right hon. Friend has brought to the attention of the House. It would be a terrible thing, Mr. Speaker, if in an aside you were to cast off the privilege——

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is intolerable that the right hon. Gentleman should seek to prejudice any consideration that I may give to this matter. I shall look into it in the greatest detail. I resent it that the right hon. Gentleman should take the view that I propose to cast privilege aside.

Mr. Benn: With the greatest respect, I was making no such implication, Mr. Speaker. You said, Mr. Speaker, that a question of of privilege might be raised. I took up that point and observed quite correctly, because I remember the case very well, that the House ruled that it was a privilege of a Member to receive information from his constituents with a view to action being taken. I said that it would be a bad thing if that precedent were cast aside. I was casting no implication or reflection upon your ruling. I made my remarks in defence of those who come to Parliament for justice, a right which it should be the duty of the House to uphold.

Mr. Speaker: If the right hon. Gentleman reads the report of these exchanges in Hansard tomorrow, he will find that that is exactly what I said. I said that there is a right of citizens to come to this place. I said also that I would look into the matter. As I understand it, the right hon. Gentleman may raise the issue as a matter of privilege. In that event I shall look into it most carefully.

BILL PRESENTED

Insurance Fees

Mr. Secretary Tebbit, supported by Mr. Ian Stewart, Mr. Paul Channon and Mr. Alex Fletcher, presented a Bill to provide for the payment of certain fees by insurance companies and the Council of Lloyd's : And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 74.]

Freedom of Probate

3.43 pm

Mr. Ken Weetch (Ipswich): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Solicitors Act 1974, as it applies to England and Wales, to enable approved trust corporations to apply for grants of representation to the estates of deceased persons in certain non-contentious cases without the intervention of a solicitor.

The Bill is a simple and limited measure, but it has important and beneficial implications. It seeks to bring about a simplification of, and improvement in, the procedures for obtaining grants of representation, the most important of which relates to applications for probate. Essentially, the main purpose of the Bill is to amend section 23 of the Solicitors Act 1974 in a way that will eliminate a restrictive practice which at present has statutory authority.

Every year thousands of people wish their wills to be executed by trust corporations. Usually, these are departments of banks and insurance companies which specialise in executor and trustee work. Many of these institutions are household names in the business and commercial world. When they act on instructions as executors or administrators, it can be said that they have generations of experience, expertise and specialist knowledge, and financial probity which is beyond doubt.

Unfortunately, when acting as executors or administrators under a will, trust corporations are obstructed by two restrictive practices which have statutory authority —the Non-Contentious Probate Rules 1954 and section 23 of that haven of restrictive practices, the Solicitors Act 1974.

In simple terms, trust corporations in thousands of cases do all the time-consuming and complex work involved in executing a will. For example, they can construct a balance of assets and liabilities, undertake all correspondence, make allocations to beneficiaries and settle most complex tax matters. In a sentence, they can do all the real work. The only thing that they are not allowed to do is to prepare the application form, which is a simple exercise. They are prevented from posting the application to the probate registry to be dealt with, which is an exercise even more simple than the first. Although this is one of the simplest tasks of all, and is straightforward clerical work once the details have been supplied, according to section 23 of the Solicitors Act the work must be completed, and the application made, by a solicitor. The solicitor's task is confined to copying information provided and posting the application.

All that is totally needless and indefensible. It is also expensive. If officials of the trust departments could make simple applications themselves, in an average case the consumer would be saved between £100 and £150. This would happen time and time again. The unnecessary framework of correspondence could be avoided, time could be saved and beneficiaries could receive more quickly what was due to them.

The Bill recommends nothing that is new in principle. The ground has already been well researched and explored from consumer and legal angles. The whole matter was investigated by the Royal Commission on legal services. Recommendation 19.3 reads:

"Trust corporations should be permitted, in non-contentious cases, to apply for grants of probate without retaining a solicitor for the purpose."

Substantially the same recommendation was made by the National Consumer Council in its report on banking services and the consumer. I refer the House to section 11 of the report on executor and trustee services.

In recent years professional services have been brought under critical scrutiny by many people, including the present Government, and not before time. Some of the worst restrictive practices are within the framework of professional organisations in one form or another. The Bill continues this process of scrutiny. If the measure becomes operative, it will make dealing with probate matters in the circumstances that I have described cheaper, more cost-effective and quicker. The Bill promotes legitimate competition for the consumer.

Although the Bill represents a limited reform, it breaks an undesirable monopoly and a restrictive practice. It is the first step along the way to reform and improvement in a complex part of consumer affairs. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Ken Weetch, Mr. Austin Mitchell, Mr. Robin Corbett, Mr. Robert McCrindle and Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth.

FREEDOM OF PROBATE

Mr. Ken Weetch accordingly presented a Bill to amend the Solicitors Act 1974, as it applies to England and Wales, to enable approved trust corporations to apply for grants of representation to the estates of deceased persons in certain non-contentious cases without the intervention of a solicitor: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 17 May and to be printed. [Bill 75.]

Orders of the Day

Films Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

New Clause 1

FINAL PAYMENTS BY BRITISH FILM FUND AGENCY

'(1) Where the British Film Fund Agency receive any amount from the Secretary of State in accordance with section 3(2A), that amount shall be added to the moneys available for distribution by the Agency under the distribution regulations in respect of the final distribution period.

(2) With the consent of the Secretary of State payments under the distribution regulations in respect of the final distribution period may be made by the Agency after the date by which they would otherwise have been required to be made by virtue of the regulations.

(3) Where—

(a) any claim made under the distribution regulations or any corresponding earlier regulations has been accepted by the Agency and they have allocated an amount for the payment of that claim; but

(b) owing to any lack of information relating to the claimant, or owing to any other circumstances outside their control, they have been unable to secure the payment to the claimant of that amount, they shall take such steps as they consider appropriate for the purpose of facilitating the securing of that result.

(4) Where the Agency take such steps as are mentioned in subsection (3) with respect to any claim but are nevertheless unable to secure the payment to the claimant of the amount in question before the relevant date, the Agency shall on that date discount the claim for the purposes of the distribution regulations, and the amount in question shall—

(a) in the case of a claim in respect of a period other than the final distribution period, be added to the moneys available for distribution by the Agency under the distribution regulations in respect of the final distribution period;

(b) in the case of a claim in respect of the final distribution period, be paid to the Secretary of State to be dealt with by him as if it were an amount received by him as mentioned in section 3(2)(b).

(5) In subsection (4) "the relevant date", in relation to a claim falling within paragraphs (a) or (b) of that subsection means such date as may be fixed by the Secretary of State for the purposes of that paragraph; and that date may—

(a) in the case of paragraph (a), be earlier than the date by which payments in respect of the period immediately preceding the final distribution period are required to be made by virtue of the distribution regulations;

(b) in the case of paragraph (b), be earlier than the date by which payments in respect of the final distribution period are so required to be made.

(6) In this section "the distribution regulations" and "the final distribution period" have the meaning given by section 2(1) (but subject to section 24(4)(b).)'—[Mr. Norman Lamont.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

3.50 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry (Mr. Norman Lamont): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 3, 4 and 8.

Mr. John Gorst (Hendon, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether I could raise now, so that you can consider it rather than at the last moment, when we reach it, your ruling, as shown on the selection list, that amendment No. 7, to which I have put my name, and amendment No. 32, which appears two amendments later, should be taken separately. It may not be apparent, but many of the points that I wish to make on amendment No. 7 are relevant to and overlap those in amendment No. 32. I wonder whether, for discussion purposes, you would rather consider taking the two together.

Mr. Bryan Gould (Dagenham): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am pleased to support the suggestion made by the hon. Member for Hendon, North (Mr. Gorst). It may well be for the convenience of the House if the debates were taken together in that way.

Mr. Speaker: Is the Minister happy about that?

Mr. Norman Lamont: I hope that this will not be the only time this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, that there will be a degree of consensus on something. What has been suggested would be the logical thing to do.

Mr. Speaker: If the House agrees, that is admirable. We shall take the debate on amendment No. 7 and link it with the debate on amendment No. 32.

Mr. Lamont: Essentially two purposes are served by the new clause. The first purpose is achieved by subsection (1), which deals with the distribution by the British Film Fund Agency of the surplus funds of the National Film Finance Corporation. When the NFFC is dissolved, its forward commitments—that is, its contractual obligations to provide finance for particular films together with enough of its cash to meet them—will be transferred to the "son of the NFFC" or, as the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) may have noticed from the newspapers, the British Screen Finance Consortium as it is now called. It is likely that that will still leave a significant surplus of assets. As the hon. Gentleman will recall from Committee, it is the Government's intention that that surplus should be transferred to the BFFA and distributed by the agency to the makers of eligible films in the same proportion as that paid in the final distribution period to the makers of eligible films out of moneys deriving from the levy.

The amount payable in respect of any one film, when aggregrated with the sums due from the levy, will not exceed the normal amount specified in regulation 6(3) of the distribution regulations—£500 million for films of over 33 minutes and £50,000 in all other cases. We believe that the new clause represents the fairest and most sensible way of disposing of those assets by ensuring that they return to the industry in accordance with the Eady pattern.

The second purpose, which is achieved by subsections (3) and (4), is to absolve the BFFA from any potential liability in respect of moneys held by the agency which have not been paid to potential recipients for a variety of reasons. The current duty of the BFFA is set out in regulation 4 of the Film (Distribution of Levy) Regulations 1982, which reads:

"The British Film Fund Agency . . . shall make payments in accordance with the provisions of these Regulations, out of moneys available for distribution, to the makers of eligible films in respect of those films."

The procedure for making claims on the fund is set out in regulation 11. By regulation 11(4) the agency can require supporting certificates or further information to be provided. However surprising it may seem, there are cases each year when potential recipients of Eady money fail to comply with the regulations of fail to cash cheques sent to them by the BFFA, and in the legislation we need to make provision for such cases. Subsections (3) and (4) of the new clause provide that any claimant who has failed to notify the agency of a change of name or registered address, or who has failed to accept any moneys paid to him by the agency, shall, after a period to be fixed by the Secretary of State, be debarred from claiming his money.

Subsection (5) of the new clause is concerned with the time limits to be placed on payments to be made by the agency. Our intention is that the payment allocated by the BFFA should be taken up within two months of the penultimate distribution payment. If it was not, it would be forfeited and the money would be added to the sum to be distributed by the BFFA in the final distribution period.

With regard to claims relating to the final distribution period, the intention is that the potential recipients will have two months from the termination of the levy in which to make their claims and to comply with any requirements set by the BFFA. If the BFFA accepts a claim and allocates a payment in the final distribution, that payment will have to be taken up within two months of the final distribution being made.

If, as is possible, there is still some money left at the end of the final period which the BFFA has been unable to dispose of in that way, we intend that it should be vested in the Secretary of State, who shall deal with it as he thinks fit for any purpose connected with the British film industry. Such sums are likely to be very small.

I hope that hon. Members will agree that this sensible and technical new clause is desirable and will support it.

Mr. Gould: I thank the Minister for that explanation of what he correctly described as a technical new clause and body of amendments. We do not intend to detain the House on this matter. We accept that, for good and practical reasons, the Eady levy has gone, and that inevitably there will be transitional problems to be cleared away because of the statutory duties at present imposed upon the NFFC and the BFFA.

As I understand it, the Minister is trying to make room for more discretion and flexibility on the part of the BFFA, both in respect of what it might do with any surplus and what the Minister might do with assets from the NFFC which might not be passed over to the consortium under clause 2. We accept that these are technical matters, and we are content to accept the new clause.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I might have done well to give the explanation in my own words in the first place. We are simply allowing the BFFA to distribute the surplus within the NFFC to the makers of films in accordance with the formula of the BFFA. The son of NFFC has its own separate arrangements. The Committee heard about them. It will be given its money. However, surplus assets within the NFFC are to be distributed to film makers, when it is dissolved, according to the formula which has applied in the past via the BFFA. We need to amend the legislation rather than the regulations relating to the BFFA, so that money given to it by the Secretary of State can be distributed in that way.

On reflection, my own explanation is the better of the two.

Clause 2

PROVISIONS RELATING TO TERMINATION OF LEVY ON FILM EXHIBITORS

Mr. Norman Lamont: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 2, line 5, at end insert—

'(1A) In relation to the final levy period section 2(3) of the 1981 Act (minimum and maximum amounts to be yielded by way of levy in respect of each levy period) shall have effect as if for "neither less than £2 million nor more than £12 million" there were substituted "not more than £12 million".'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 2.

Mr. Lamont: The amendment removes the requirement in section 2(3) of the Film Levy Finance Act 1981 that the Eady levy must not be less than £2 million annually. The purpose of the amendment is to enable us to fulfil the commitment that we gave in Committee that the Eady levy would cease at the earliest possible opportunity, consistent with commitments made to Eady beneficiaries. I remind hon. Members that current recipients of Eady levy funds include the National Film and Television School and the British Film Institute Production Board. There is also a statutory obligation for a pro-rata payment to be made to the National Film Finance Corporation.

As I said on Second Reading and in Committee, we consider that the Eady levy is an increasing burden on cinemas, and it is our intention to end it as soon as possible. However, the commitments that I have outlined must be met. While on the basis of past experience we cannot forecast with precision the rate of build-up of levy receipts, nor therefore the date when sufficient sums will be available to meet those commitments, we see no advantage in requiring the yield in the final levy period to be higher than absolutely necessary.

There is widespread sympathy for the plight of the cinema sector and general agreement that the Eady levy should be ended quickly. The amendment will facilitate that process. It will enable us to end the levy more quickly while honouring our commitments. Therefore, I commend it to the House.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his statement. When I tabled amendments to persuade the Secretary of State to scrap the Eady levy as early as possible, he promised that that would be achieved and that the amendments were unnecessary. We have now a happy compromise, as long as the commitment to scrap the Eady levy remains. The period set down in the Bill is still too long. I would have preferred a shorter period. I hope that the Secretary of State will exercise his option at the earliest convenience.

We should not leave this part of the Bill without saying that the Eady levy has been destructive to the cinema industry in taking away much needed finance for the improvement of cinemas. Great tribute should be paid to cinema owners for trying greatly to improve the facilities, to make the public feel that the cinema is more attractive than it has been for 30 years, and to bring them back to the places where films should be seen. No one who has seen films on television can say other than that when a film is shown in a cinema, its scope, sound, vision and colour is improved, as is the experience of seeing it.

I should be grateful if the Secretary of State will exercise his option as soon as possible to ensure that more people are encouraged back to the cinema to see films as they should be shown.

Mr. Gould: I cannot fully endorse the strictures of the hon. Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) on the effects of the Eady levy on the cinema industry. I would have more sympathy for his point if there were genuine evidence that the money that the cinema exhibitors were going to save through not having to pay the levy would be channelled back into the refurbishment of cinemas. He may be able to assure me that he believes that to be the case. Unfortunately, I see little evidence that we can be as sanguine as that.

On the other hand, I entirely accept his point that the attraction back of cinema audiences is by no means a lost cause, as the experience of French cinema proprietors has shown recently. Therefore, I hope that, whether or not they are exempt from the levy, cinema exhibitors will try their utmost through the refurbishing of cinemas and perhaps lower prices to attract audiences back to cinemas.

I accept the Minister's statement that these are essentially technical amendments to overcome some of the transitional problems. Given that we see no issue of principle in the abolition of the Eady levy at present, at least in terms of the simple disappearance of the levy, we are content to accept the amendment.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) for what he said. I agree with what he said. It is our intention that the levy should be ended as soon as possible, because it has been a great burden on cinemas. During our proceedings we have sometimes concentrated too much on the problems of the film industry, without considering how they relate to the cinema industry. Without a flourishing theatrical exhibition industry, there is a great problem for the film industry. The rate at which cinemas are closing is truly alarming. That is a problem not just in itself, but in maintaining a British film industry, which is extremely important.

I understand the reservations of the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould). However, when he says that he hopes that seat prices will be reduced as a result of the removal of the Eady levy, I hope that he is not under any illusion about the state of the finances of the cinema industry. That is the problem. We hear a lot about the domination of Thorn-EMI and Rank, but even Rank cinemas are hardly a gold mine. To be honest with the House, I must say that it will be a struggle to maintain the cinema industry in the United Kingdom. We want to maintain it. The Government are doing everything that they can, but we should not be other than hard-headed and realistic about the problems that it faces.

Mr. Gould: I do not doubt for a moment the financial precariousness of cinema exhibition. I hoped to show that the way forward did not necessarily lie in constantly increasing prices while failing to invest in cinemas. I hope that cinema proprietors may take to heart the lessons learnt in France, the United States and elsewhere—that better cinemas and lower admission prices can substantially increase audiences.

Mr. Lamont: I agree with that; but to reinvest in cinemas one must be either earning or have a good prospect of earning profits. The hon. Gentleman referred to what has happened in France. However, cinema attendances are different in different countries. It is not easy to explain why the pattern of decline is different in the United States or in France from the United Kingdom. Given the precariousness of the finances of the cinema industry in the United Kingdom, we should be extremely careful before we are too critical of it.

Mr. Tom Pendry (Stalybridge and Hyde): First, congratulations are in order. The Government have been forthcoming. We urged them to adopt the report of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission on the barring question. It is a good thing that independent cinemas, such as those in Glasgow and Manchester, will now have the opportunity to have films earlier than they would normally have them. I should have thought that the Government might say to cinemas in those areas that, because they are to have pictures earlier than normal and because the Eady levy is being removed, they should adopt a policy of reducing admission prices and do more than they are doing at present. They could refurbish their cinemas and attract more people to them, and see, during the experimental perod of 12 months, whether that works. If they do that during the experimental period, we may be able to judge whether it is a good thing for the industry. It would be worth while if the Minister applied his mind to that aspect, given the Government's response to the pressure from both sides of the House to adopt the MMC's report.

Mr. Hanley: I wonder whether the House is aware that throughout British Film Year the ABC, Odeon and Cannon Classic chains are spending £1 million a month on refurbishing British cinemas, irrespective of falling attendances and even before the Eady levy is finally dead and buried. Therefore, the commitment to the cinema industry by organisations which must satisfy shareholders is great. That commitment can only increase if the Eady levy is scrapped as soon as possible.

Mr. Lamont: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) for drawing attention to that fact. In recognition of British Film Year, companies such as Thorn-EMI are investing in their cinemas. As everyone has agreed, a circular problem with the cinema industry is that declining attendances have been accompanied by poor facilities, and poor facilities have led to a further decline in attendances. It is welcome news that Thorn-EMI believes that the present position of that section of the industry is not irreversible.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) for what he said about our response to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission's report and the experiment that will be carried out in two cities. We are going rather wide of the amendment—I imagine that this matter will be discussed on Third Reading—but I agree with what Opposition Members said about competition in the exhibition sector. The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) is right. Had there been more competition in the exhibition sector during the past 20 or 30 years, the state of the cinema industry might be different today. If it had been easier in the past for entrepreneurs and independent cinema operators to enter that sector, the present position of the industry may have been very different.

[Mr. Lamont]

However, as the Minister responsible for such matters, I must deal with the present position. If any hon. Member were tempted to ask, "Why only an experiment?", I would have to reply, "Because even with Thorn-EMI and Rank I must consider the finances of their cinemas, and an experiment is the most sensible way of proceeding in the present state of finances." On the basis of what has happened in those two areas, we shall see the effect on independent cinemas and make decisions of value to the exhibition sector as a whole. However, the MMC report and our experiment are important points.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 2 in page 2, line 6, leave out 'the final levy period section 4 of the 1981' and insert
'that period section 4 of that'.

No. 3, in page 2, line 16, leave out subsection (3).

No. 4, in page 2, line 32, leave out 'this section' and insert
'section (Final Payments by British Film Fund Agency)'.— [Mr. Norman Lamont.]

Mr. Norman Lamont: I beg to move amendment No. 5, in page 2, line 39, leave out from 'order' to end of line 44.

Hon. Members will not be surprised to learn that the Government consider it necessary to remove the provision, which was inserted in Committee, that the ITV companies and the BBC should be levied on the basis of audience figures for the films that they broadcast. The Government's position on this important matter was made clear in the lengthy debate in Committee, but I wish to go over some of the points again and to explain why we believe it right to remove this provision.

I shall deal later with the practical arguments against imposing a levy on television, but first I shall deal with the principle. When the provision was inserted by the Committee, against the Government's advice, it was one of several amendments embodying in one form or another the principle of a levy. Some were directed at a levy on video tapes, whether blank or pre-recorded, some were based on the principle of compensating the copyright owner, and others were concerned with replacing the Eady levy as a mechanism for filling a production fund to finance new films or even to support the National Film and Television School. The amendment that attracted most support, or least opposition, was the provision now incorporated in clause 2(5). It proposes that a levy should be imposed on the BBC and ITV companies to recompense film makers whose films are shown on television on a basis that is related to the number of viewers who watch those films.

Underlying the proposition is an assumption, or perhaps an assertion, that the BBC and ITV pay too little for the films that they show. The argument is that if millions of people watch a film on television the price paid by the broadcaster should reflect the size of that audience, at a level closer to the film industry's assessment of what the film is worth—in other words, the seller's valuation should prevail. The advocates of the proposition argue that the prices paid for films are too low because of the so-called duopoly of the BBC and ITV.

The recent publicity about the purchase of "Dallas" by Thames Television has, it is claimed, revealed the existence of a gentleman's agreement between the BBC and ITV, and that is said to support the view that the broadcasters, through their duopoly, can depress the cost of the programmes that they buy. Whatever may be the case with a television series, whether a new one or one that has already been shown in Britain, I do not believe that the "Dallas" episode is relevant to our discussion, which is concerned with the purchase of feature films.

The BBC and ITV have represented a duopoly, in that, until recently, they were the only television channels available. But that is changing, with Channel 4 and its impact on film making, and the introduction of DBS and cable television. I have yet to be convinced that those negotiating with the BBC and ITV companies cannot fight their own corners effectively without the state lumbering to the rescue, brandishing a cumbersome and unwieldy levy as a blunt instrument. We must accept that some films will, in their nature, be more attractive to one channel than to the other, and in such cases there will be only one effective buyer. Some films will be regarded as unacceptable for showing on television, but the majority are films that both channels would be happy to broadcast and, therefore, there is competition for them. With the advent of cable television and satellite broadcasting, the duopoly argument, flimsy though it was, begins to diminish. I am not persuaded that we need an artificial statutory recycling mechanism in a market which, whatever its limitations, is capable of operating without the distortion that would be introduced by a levy.

Leaving aside the question of principle, this provision raises several practical problems. One of the first questions is, how should we fix the amount of the levy? Presumably we must start at the other end and ask, "How much do we want to raise," and then spread it over the number of viewings. But viewings of what? The clause refers to feature films, but should we include films whose producers have retired from the industry or who are no longer alive? If so, it is difficult to see what benefit the provision would produce in terms of film production. Indeed, we must face the fact that the vast majority of films shown on television are foreign films, mainly American.

Mr. Gorst: Is my hon. Friend aware that if the considerations that he is now enumerating had been discussed when the Eady levy was introduced any competent civil servant would have disposed of them almost as quickly as the Minister is enumerating them now?

Mr. Lamont: I am not sure that the Eady levy was such an outstanding success. Indeed, the Bill is removing the Eady levy because of its effect on the cinema. I have not yet deployed the important argument that a levy would have a significant impact on the amount of money that the BBC and ITV companies could devote to film production.

Mr. Gorst: May I help my hon. Friend on his point about the success or failure of the Eady levy? It is extraordinary that the levy has lasted through one Government after another for decades, if what I infer from my hon. Friend's comments about its failure is true. It is going now because cinema attendances have fallen and it has outlived its purpose.

Mr. Lamont: Many would think that it would have been better to have removed the Eady levy some time ago. I cannot see that it has done anything but harm to the cinema in recent years.

My hon. Friend, in his two interventions, has slightly shifted his ground because he started our interchange by discussing the practical problems rather than the principle. I was about to say that, in addition to the principle, I think that there are these practical problems. One of them—and this is again a parallel with the Eady provisions—is that many, if not most, film makers, if by that is meant the producers, have often signed away their television rights to distributors. My hon. Friend, who is expert in these matters, will know that that is what happened in many cases with the Eady levy. Film producers signed away their rights and the Eady levy proceeds in some cases did not go to the people for whom they were intended by legislation. Thus the proceeds of the levy might not be payable in most cases if the producers have not retained their television rights.

Should we assume that we are meant to consider only films originally intended for theatrical release? If so, that would exempt made-for-television films, notwithstanding that their mode of manufacture is not easily distinguished from cinema film making. How would we treat films such as those financed by Channel 4 with cinema and television exhibition in mind? A film like "The Draughtsman's Contract" comes to mind immediately.

Even if it is possible to devise some definition of film that suits everybody, that still leaves the problem of assessing how much should be levied on the films in question. The provision proposes that the levy should be based on the numbers of viewers watching the film, but this is by no means as simple as it sounds. For one thing, there is no reason that a film shown in the afternoon should be given the same value per audience number as something shown at peak time. If we are to take account of this, not only must we introduce a system requiring extensive calculations relating to the levy on each film to the audience that watched it, having further identified which films are levyable, but we must weight the audience numbers according to the time of day when the film was shown, and this is surely not sensible.

Mr. Tim Brinton (Gravesham): On the narrow point in which my hon. Friend asserted that there was no reason that a film shown in the afternoon should have the same levy put on it as one shown in the evening at peak time, surely this is right because the afternoon audience is smaller than the evening audience. It is therefore perfectly equitable.

Mr. Lamont: I merely said that this is a point that can be argued. There are people who agree with my hon. Friend, and obviously this is the basis on which advertising fees are negotiated. If it is to be weighted in this way, some people think that it raises considerable complications. That is my only point. I do not wish to come down on either side of the argument because I am not in favour of the levy anyway. This question has to be resolved and, if it is resolved in a particular way, it raises considerable complications.

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): My hon. Friend deploys the argument beautifully, but he must be aware that the muliplicity of calculations is no argument at all. It is a calculation that is made every time a television commercial is shown for repeat fee purposes. There are infinitely more commercials shown on television than even the number of feature films.

Mr. Lamont: My objection, as I have made crystal clear, is based upon principle as well as on what might be thought of as practical difficulties.

Mr. Hanley: My hon. Friend said that another difficulty is the definition of a film—what exactly is a film in this context? I submit that it is surely anything that must receive a British Board of Film Censors certificate.

Mr. Lamont: My hon. Friend is obviously able to solve this problem just like that. If there were to be a levy, my hon. Friend would be an admirable person to implement it. These questions have to be addressed. As I have said, my main objection concerns not the practicality but the principle of the matter. I wish to outline some of the questions that have to be addressed.

Would it not be simpler then, if some of my hon. Friends' arguments are to be followed, to charge the BBC and the independent television companies a sum related to the number of films shown, or should we not cut through all the complication, make it simpler still and ask them all for a compulsory contribution to a film production fund, perhaps £5 million each? After all, it seems to me that it does not matter how crude or sophisticated we make the basis of the levy if the end in sight is the same—to squeeze money out of television to finance a film production fund. That is what it is all about. At least it would have the twin merits of administrative simplicity to collect and of concentrating the proceeds on the British film industry. But there remains the interesting question of how and by whom the spoils should be divided.

The results of any levy scheme—and I think that this is an important and central point—must be to reduce the funds available from the BBC and ITV. The BBC's income is finite, limited for the most part to the income from the licence fee. A surcharge on the cost of films must therefore mean reductions elsewhere. This would probably be true also of the ITV companies. The most likely result is a reduction of what the channels would be prepared to pay to buy levyable films; otherwise the cuts would probably fall upon the most expensive television programmes — drama programmes. Thus, helping the film producers might be at the expense of those — directors, technicians and actors—working in television.

Any cuts would also be likely to fall on work commissioned from independent producers, which none of us would want. Instead of promoting an outward-looking approach to film and cinema by television, a levy seems likely to have the opposite effect.

Alan Howden, who is the BBC's general manager for programme acquisition, offered some interesting and relevant observations in a recent article in the journal Broadcast. He accepted that, as has been alleged, many films are purchased cheaply, but pointed out that they are often old material for use during the day and late at night. He said:

> "They are there because they are cheap; if they were subject to levy we would have to replace them with other cheap imported material".

On the other hand, even routine feature films are bought at high prices when compared with other purchased material such as American series, despite the fact that films rarely command the huge audiences that they once did, and are nearly always beaten in the audience ratings figures by programmes like "Coronation Street".

Mr. Howden gives a gloomy but I think realistic forecast of what would happen if a levy were introduced. He said that films

"would be swept away in favour of old American television and other imports; purchases of new films would be cut back; prices would be pushed down to offset the levy wherever possible and the net return to the film industry would almost certainly be reduced".

I cannot believe that that is what hon. Members want. In my view, it is necessary for those who are in favour of the levy to demonstrate that imposing this extra impost on the companies or on BBC television will not result in a reduction in the resources devoted to film making by the companies or by the BBC or merely an increase in imported material. We hear constantly about the cheapness of American imported material. I recall that Sir Ian Trethowan and others who appeared before a Select Committee of the House referred to the cheapness of American material that they could use. If we are to have this levy, it is up to hon. Members who wish to support it to demonstrate the need for it. I have not heard any argument that has demonstrated to me that that would not be the inevitable consequence of imposing such a levy.

Mr. Gorst: I remind my hon. Friend that many films —the Bond films are an example—are shown time and again on television. I cannot think of the number of times that my children have watched "Towering Inferno", for example. I invite my hon. Friend to agree with me that the fact that they are shown so often is not necessarily because they are cheap but because there is a demand to see them time and again. I invite my hon. Friend to contrast that with the present situation in which the BBC and ITV are pouring money into certain programmes. These programmes are not repeated anything like a similar number of times. That must have something to do with popularity and with the fact that the BBC and ITV purchasers are unwilling to pay a fair price for something which is attractive to the audience.

4.30 pm

Mr. Lamont: That is true. My hon. Friend refers to the popularity of films, particularly the Bond films. However, unfortunately, the popularity of those films and the proportion of television time that they take is falling. We have been told again and again by the BBC and ITV companies that the proportion of television time for films is falling. I am a great watcher of the Bond films, which my hon. Friend mentioned, but sometimes I feel that I am rather old fashioned. However, I am told that the viewing figures that those films command today are less than they were some years ago, not just because they have been seen many times on television, but because they are taking up a smaller proportion of screen time than before. It is about 11 per cent. of screen time on Channel 4 and 8 per cent. for the ITV companies. We have been warned that that figure is likely to diminish further and that the imposition of the levy might mean that films would take up even less time.

Mr. Gould: I am always extremely suspicious about an argument that rests on a proportion. I am sure that the Minister will concede in this case that any such argument, would have to take account of the fact that the hours of television broadcasting have been very much extended by, for example, breakfast television when one does not normally watch feature films. Although I do not wish to contest in detail the statistics that the hon. Gentleman may wish to use, he should take account of the fact, as we do, that an argument of the sort that he has just addressed to us is not necessarily convincing.

Mr. Lamont: I would not rest the argument on the figures or proportions. I say this on the basis of what I am advised and told by people who know much more about these matters than I do. We are talking about the trends and viewing figures that feature films command on television. It has been clearly stated to us and the Select Committee that the feature film is not commanding the viewing figures that it did a few years ago. Therefore, if the levy were imposed, the temptation would be for the budgets on such films to be reduced.

Notwithstanding the arguments about a duopoly, this is the central point. I do not see why it is not open to the makers of films in this widening market, where there will be a voracious demand for film in future years, to set their price and argue with those who want and need to have more films. It seems that that is a better system and a more sensible way to do it than to introduce an artificial mechanism taxing the companies and recycling the money back to the industry.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): If the Minister is arguing that the makers of film should effectively bid up the price of their product, will he comment on the argument advanced in an article in The Sunday Times in December, reporting a conversation with Mr. Halliwell, the man in charge of buying foreign films and series for ITV? The article states:

"The high-gloss peaktime series cost an average of $1m per hour to produce, but because of an unspoken agreement not to bid up the price, ITV and the BBC are able to buy them for around £25,000 an hour."

That is an incredible difference in price. Perhaps the Minister will comment on that unspoken agreement, which depresses the price available to the fiim makers.

Mr. Lamont: I know of no such arrangements, though I am certainly prepared to look into that. However, the hon. Gentleman is talking about series rather than film features. In the newspapers, we have seen what has happened with the bidding over "Dallas". If there is some such arrangement, it seems to be creaking at the seams, but I entirely agree that the matter deserves some examination.

Nevertheless, we are talking about feature films for which the total cost and the cost per time is somewhat less. It may not be a perfect market, but there is an element of competition. There will be an expanding market and a voracious appetite by the media for more feature films. I cannot see how the imposition of the levy will other than put the squeeze further on a sector that is already under considerable pressure. Therefore, that is not the appropriate way to deal with the problem. I commend the Government amendment to the House.

Mr. Gould: I think it is fair to say that the Opposition gave a far from hostile welcome to the first two groups of Government amendments, but I am afraid that it is at this point that hostilities commence. The Minister opined that we would not be surprised that he had felt obliged to table the amendment. It is true that we are not surprised. Unfortunately, the decision has been trailed in several press reports, but we are disappointed because we believe that the Committee reached the right view and, by a majority, and after extensive discussions, hit upon a means whereby the future of the film industry could be made much brighter than it would be without any such source of revenue.

We are also a little perturbed that the campaign of the television companies seems to have succeeded, at least with the Government. We feel that that may be a worrying portent of things to come; a sign of the way in which some of the major battalions in the industry can organise and structure the industry to suit their own interests. In Committee the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry conceded that the television companies had specified, when they offered to help the National Film and Television School, that that offer was conditional upon there being no levy upon the television companies. We are left with the grave suspicion that the further efforts which the television companies are said to be prepared to make to help the film industry have equally been made conditional upon receiving an undertaking from the Government that there will be no levy. It would be most unfortunate if an issue which had been fully debated and decided upon by a Committee of the House were, in a sense, to be taken away from us and made the subject of more or less secret negotiations between the Government and those who were to be subjected to the levy.

Mr. Gorst: Since there has been discussion about unspoken agreements and understandings, it is fairly remarkable that as one casts one eye around the Chamber today one sees, except for the tip of an iceberg on Conservative Benches, no spokesman who is identified with commercial or BBC television, and one has the suspicion that a back-door market arrangement has been made, so that discussion and argument about it in this forum are almost unnecessary. However, perhaps we shall see.

Mr. Gould: As so often, the hon. Gentleman is on the point. I have heard other descriptions of his hon. Friend the Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) than the tip of an iceberg.

It appears that the independent companies feel that they have accomplished their objective and reached an agreement with the Government which satisfies their needs. However, it is important to remind the House of the arguments that carried the day in Committee. As the Minister will recall, they were deployed over four or five hours in Committee, at great length. All the matters to which the Minister referred in his speech were also raised in Committee. After long deliberation, the Committee, by a substantial majority, decided that the levy was an appropriate mechanism to put into the Bill.

Our arguments began where the Government began their arguments, with the impracticability of the Eady levy. Everybody concedes that, whatever its merits, and whatever can be said for its principle, it has outlived its practical life. Therefore, we are left with the problem whether to replace it—in which case we have to look for some other redistributive mechanism—or simply to say that the film industry can manage without a levy. The Committee decided that we should try to replace it and that the British film industry was not so healthy and thriving as to be able to dispense with what is now an admittedly small sum of money, but which has historically been of considerable importance.

Both sides of the Committee set themselves to work out how to apply the principle of the Eady levy in modern circumstances. The cinema audiences which have melted away, largely because of television, are still watching feature films, but no longer go to the cinemas in large numbers. Instead, they are to be found sitting in front of their television screens. This is not the case of an industry whose product has become outmoded for technological or social reasons. There is still a substantial demand for films. In other words, the principle is still valid. What has gone wrong is that the mechanism whereby consumers of film contribute in a certain way by the payment of a levy on admission to a cinema is no longer practicable.

The problem is simple. If we are concerned about the future of the industry and wish to maintain its financial support, we have to find a way to levy all those who watch the products of the film industry, but this time seated in front of their television screen.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): Has not another method been found, and one that is working most successfully? That is the agency of Channel 4, which has committed £96 million to feature production. It is true, as the hon. Gentleman and many of my hon. Friends have said, that some of those productions are not films of the sort that would have the same impact on the wide screen as some of the more traditionally made films. Nevertheless, Channel 4 is catering for the needs of the film industry and the products are seen and enjoyed by those who watch films on television. Therefore, it is fulfilling an important obligation to the industry as a whole.

Mr. Gould: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point, and I shall come to that when I examine the case that has been deployed by the independent television companies.

I am surprised that the Minister and Conservative Members, to whom presumably the market mechanism is a matter of some importance and value, do not recognise that with this levy we are seeking to ensure that the market mechanism overcomes the artificial obstacle that has recently arisen. That market mechanism should operate to do what a market should do, which is to reward, through the desires and appetites of the consumer, those who produce the product. That is the simple principle that we are seeking to achieve.

The market mechanism does not work at present because television has intervened, but also because, as the Minister implied by referring to it often in his remarks, the market is not a free market. The purchase of feature films for television is in no sense a free market. The term "duopoly" has often been applied to it, and we are all familiar with the recent example of "Dallas". Most of us would see that episode as demonstrating that the unspoken gentleman's agreement had on this occasion, and perhaps on this occasion uniquely, broken down. This is truly a case of an exception proving the rule. The purchase by Thames Television of "Dallas" caused such a stir and commotion precisely because that unspoken agreement had not been complied with and was, presumably, threatened for the future. That is why Mr.

[Mr. Gould]

Brian Walcroft was summoned to the IBA to account for his actions, and that is why various assurances have been given that this will not happen again.

4.45 pm

The consequence of this—and this has been accepted on both sides of the House, as it was in Committee—is that the price paid for films is abysmally low, as my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) has been instrumental in bringing to light. I understand that the average price is about £7,000 or £8,000 a film. I know that the hon. Member for Wealden will say that there are major exceptions, and I accept that. However, I am talking about a well-authenticated figure of the average price for films.

The independent television companies offer a rather engaging explanation as to why that should be, but such a pitiful price is of little value to those who make the films in the first place, and of still less value to those who will have to continue making films for an almost insatiable market.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: Will the hon. Gentleman clarify what he has just said, for the benefit of the House? Is he suggesting that the person who made a British movie last year, or not long ago, is, on average, to be paid only about £6,000 or £7,000? I do not understand that to be the situation. If one is making a new, big and important film, there is a great deal of competition to acquire it. The price of $2 million for "Chariots of Fire" has been quoted, as well as $4 million for another movie and $500,000 for "Champions". These are substantial sums.

I suggest that the average that the hon. Gentleman is quoting is for old films, many of which are foreign imports. If he can substantiate his claim that modern British films are fetching only this derisory rate he has made his case, although it does not follow that the levy is the correct way to deal with the matter.

Mr. Gould: The hon. Gentleman should bear in mind that the important factor is the replacement cost—the cost of making films now. The antiquity or otherwise of the films constantly being shown on television is hardly relevant to that simple, economic point.

The fact of the low prices is admitted, in a somewhat engaging way, by the independent television companies. The Minister referred to the remarks of the spokesman for the BBC, who made a similar point. The independent television companies say that the average prices are low because of old material, much of it American, at the bottom end of the market. Many television viewers will say, "Hear, hear" in response to that. Television companies may hope to disarm criticism by the frankness of that admission. However, even old feature films, as the hon. Member for Hendon, North (Mr. Gorst) pointed out, are shown time and again on television, particularly at peak viewing times.

Last Christmas, for the umpteenth time, I saw a film of which I have fond memories from my childhood, and which I thought had passed from public memory for ever until about 10 years ago. I enjoyed the "Wizard of Oz" all over again, but it must have been shown over a dozen times on television over the past few years, and the same can be said of films such as "Chitty Chitty Bang Bang". These films are shown at peak times to large audiences, and at virtually no cost to the television company. They are popular films, otherwise they would not be scheduled. Some 65 were shown on the four channels over the Christmas period, and in total about 1,500 feature films were shown on television throughout the year.

The argument that these are low-grade films which attract small audiences is very difficult to sustain. Television companies know when they are on to a good thing. Those who made these films, and to whom television and the country generally are now turning for the new generation of feature films, are not, through a distortion of the market mechanism, being paid the normal price for their product. It is to correct that distortion that we supported the amendment in Committee and now oppose the Government's attempt to remove it.

It is also worth making the point that the Committee was not alone in believing that a levy on the television companies was a useful device in this context. We had occasion in Committee to refer to a document which had been produced by six of the industry's leading organisations. They came from all sides of the industry and included the trade unions, the producers and the National Film and Television School. Those organisations do not normally find it easy to reach agreement on a common platform. Their document enabled the Committee to illuminate some of these difficult points. It has now been elaborated, and I am certain that all members of the Committee and many other hon. Members who are interested in the film industry will have seen a copy of it.

Those elements of the industry make it quite clear in their document that they support a levy on the television companies. They looked at some of the practical problems and believe that if they could be overcome a fund of major importance would be provided for revitalising the film industry. In the presence of the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Brinton) it is also worth making the point, which he will no doubt wish to emphasise, that the Select Committee of which he was a member in 1982 also looked at this problem and reached the same conclusion. Therefore, we are not conjuring up some oddball remedy out of thin air. This matter has been looked at by many people with knowledge of the industry. They believe that this would provide a workable remedy for some of its problems.

The industry needs money. It is virtually bereft of any tax incentives as a result of last year's Budget. It receives very little public money. No doubt this matter will be debated when we reach a further group of amendments. The industry has now lost the Eady levy. Although it is now relatively small in value, at the time that the Eady levy was introduced it produced a very substantial sum. Rather than let the industry languish without any form of financial support from any of these sources, we believe that it is important to introduce a levy which we calculate should produce about £10 million per annum.

Practical problems are involved in introducing a levy and the amendment does not seek to resolve them, although it was very instructive that during the course of a few minutes the Minister found how easy it was for his hon. Friends to resolve some of the practical problems that he raised. It was also instructive that the Minister quickly moved off that ground and came back to the point of principle upon which he had taken a stand.

The fact is that the amendment suggests one possible basis upon which this money could be raised—the levy of a very small sum of money per estimated viewer of feature films on television. I could have understood it if the Minister had come to the House and said, "We have looked at the practical problems and we should prefer to achieve this objective in some other way." I am very disappointed that the Minister did not do so. He said that he wants to strike out the amendment altogether. But there are other possibilities. In an excellent, recently published monograph Robert Hutchinson looked at the problem and made the interesting recommendation that, to achieve a levy of £10 million per annum, a purchase price should be paid by the television companies for feature films. Perhaps that is a simpler calculation.

It may be that the Minister is right. I was tempted to get up and say that we accepted his suggestion of a simple contribution to a public film finance fund of some kind, but my guess is that the Minister did not pursue that idea and that he is unwilling to pursue any other idea for a levy because it would lead to some kind of public film finance body deciding how the money should be distributed. I suspect that ultimately it is an ideological objection: that if this money were raised in such a fashion he would have to provide a public sector mechanism to decide how the money should be distributed. What underlies and animates the Bill is what we believe to be the mistaken view that all these matters can be settled in the market place.

In conclusion, I deal with the defences that have been advanced by the independent television companies, which I assume have written to all those who are interested in these matters. The television companies rightly say—the hon. Member for Wealden has already made this point —that they are already supporting the film industry in a very substantial way, primarily through the mechanism of Channel 4. We agree with that, but it will come as no surprise to the hon. Member for Wealden to learn that in Committee I made a distinction which became very familiar to its members. There is a substantial difference between films made for television and films made for the cinema. I shall not weary the House by rehearsing all the arguments and distinctions that were widely accepted by the Committee. Although the Minister has not done so today, he and some of his hon. Friends were prone to boast of the success of "Gandhi" and "Chariots of Fire" as evidence of the strength and health of the British film industry.

Mr. Norman Lamont rose——

Mr. Gould: Let me make this point and then the Minister can intervene. I say that he cannot make that boast without at least accepting that there is a distinction to be drawn between films of that character and films which are generally produced by the television companies and shown on Channel 4.

Mr. Lamont: This is a trivial point, but, as the hon. Gentleman has made it repeatedly, perhaps he will give me the opportunity to say that if he can find that I have ever made any reference to "Gandhi" I shall buy him a very good lunch.

Mr. Gould: I am tempted, in the longueurs that lie ahead, to peruse the proceedings of the Committee to find just such a reference. However, it is certainly true that frequent reference was made to it. I see that the Minister's Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, the hon. Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Mr. Trippier), is immediately confessing to it, in case he is challenged to a similar wager.

The notion that money spent through Channel 4 can in some senses be attributed to film production reached its apotheosis in the remarks of the hon. Member for Rossendale and Darwen at the end of the Second Reading debate. In an attempt to boost artificially the amount of money which the Government and other sources were funnelling into the film industry, the hon. Gentleman cited the £45 million which the independent film companies were paying towards the cost of Channel 4. Even the hon. Gentleman will recognise that this was an overestimate. However, it warns us against not making a distinction between film and television.

The next point which the television companies made was that they already contribute to the National Film and Television School. Of course they do, and they have undertaken to continue to do so, although one is bound to record, as the Minister conceded, that their offer was conditional upon there being no levy. It is also true that in supporting the school the television companies are in many respects pursuing their own interests, since it is a television as well as a film school.

The television companies then argued — somewhat pathetically, I thought—that this would be very hard on them, since their profits are down. Although the days may have gone when the famous remark of Lord Thomson would be apposite, nevertheless the television companies remain one of the few really profitable aspects of our economy. While there is some evidence that advertising revenue has fallen recently, I believe that if one looks at the trend over a period of years it is very difficult to argue that the independent companies are still not flush with money. Indeed, as the Government themselves recognise, there is an excess profits levy to recognise that fact.

The hon. Member for Wealden and I had an exchange in Committee as to the relationship between the levy that we are discussing and the excess profits levy. I am not competent to go into detail, but the profits of the independent companies would be calculated after that levy had been subtracted. Therefore, their profits would not be in double jeopardy but, rather, one element of their excess profits would be directed not in the general levy to the Treasury but to a special fund to help the film industry on which they so much depend.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The hon. Gentleman is covering many points and posing many questions. I hope that he will answer some of them. The television companies are the master of what they spend on films. How will he ensure that, as they do not want to pay the levy, they will not spend less on films?

5 pm

Mr. Gould: Of course the companies do not want to pay a levy. Who would? But if they were to pause for a moment and think about their longer-term interests, they may see a more powerful case for doing so. They are, as we hve constantly said, one of the major consumers of film and they have a long-term and obvious interest in ensuring that that supply continues. However, I take the Minister's point. In the short term it is difficult for the independent companies to say that they are so strapped for cash that if they are forced to pay this relatively small sum of money they will have to make major economies elsewhere, particularly in the realm of buying films. Otherwise, why are they having to pay an excess profits levy?

One may ask, what about the poor old BBC? Would it not be most unfortunate if it was forced to add 30p to its licence fee? I am relatively unmoved by that sort of argument as well. It could be addressed to almost anything that the BBC proposed. Those are matters which have to be decided by the broadcasting authorities. They are under statutory obligations of various sorts to maintain standards. It is up to the Government and other interested bodies to ensure that that is done. None of those arguments should enable them to get on the cheap the products of an industry that is in danger of dying as a result.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The question is not whether they would make major economies, but what is to stop them offsetting the effects of a levy by adjustments on what they spend on films? They know what they want. They know the number of films that they require. What is to stop them offsetting the effect of a levy by adjustments in their budgets?

Mr. Gould: Surely the Minister is not conceding the case that anything other than a free market operates. Surely competition will ensure that if there is a demand for the product the price will be bid up, irrespective of a levy or anything else, to a proper level.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): Is it not remarkable that the Minister manages to say that the companies would have such control of the market place that they could do that, but that they would not have such control of the market place that they could wind up the price that they would offer for films?

Mr. Gould: The hon. Gentleman is right. The Minister has great difficulty in riding those two horses at once.

Mr. Gorst: There is an extraordinary quirk and a contradiction here. I note from a letter which hon. Members have no doubt received from a man with the fascinating title of "Head of Briefing" that the IBA limits the number of cinema movies that can be included in schedules in the interests of stimulating the maximum amount of original television products. That gentleman with the fascinating title also claims that the levy would be seriously detrimental to the creative development of television. Rather than attempt to force the television industry to subsidise the film industry by law, he says that the future can be seen in terms of—a most extraordinary proposition—increasing creative cross-fertilisation.

Mr. Gould: I am sure that that phrase leaves the hon. Gentleman almost as puzzled as it leaves me.

The Minister has not so far mentioned, as I thought he might have done, that the forthcoming Green Paper on copyright—a well-trailed possibility—might provide a levy on blank tapes of various sorts. I fully understand why the Minister has not raised that point. I think we are all agreed that, for the moment at any rate, that is not relevant to our discussions. However, it is worth making the point that that is a copyright measure and we are talking about a redistributive mechanism. Therefore, as I understand the principle that we are advancing, it is not necessary to find the long-dead maker of a particular film in order to recompense him. Far from it. That would be true if some sort of copyright principle underlay the proposal, but we are suggesting that that redistributive mechanism should cycle money back to a general fund, which would then be made available generally, and not to particular film makers or producers of films shown on television.

That helps us to dispose of the independent companies' suggestion that this would be an unfair tax on them. It is preferable to regard it as simply a redistributive mechanism within the same industry—an industry which begins with the producers and ends with the consumer watching the film in front of his television set.

My hon. Friends, I believe with some support elsewhere, believe that it is immensely important that the British film industry is not left without a buoyant and reliable source of revenue which, in many respects, the industry itself produces. We are asking only that the Minister should recognise that the market operates so imperfectly as not to provide the producers with that revenue, and we are simply asking him to remedy that deficiency.

Mr. Gale: The amendment tabled in Committee was founded upon two fundamental Conservative principles, although it had the support of Opposition Members. One is that people should be prepared to pay a fair price for what they get—the television companies in this case—and the other is a move towards the ending of restrictive practices.

I have to declare an interest in a company called Shaw Cable, which hopes to take the lead in the cable television industry and the boon that we hope will come in that direction. Therefore, I might be expected to have an interest in the purchase of cheap television. Historically, films on television have been cheap. If I pursue my interest, I should be on the other side of the argument. I am not, because I believe that the future of the British broadcast television industry and the future of the British cable industry depends, at least in part, desirably, on the provision of an adequate supply of British material.

If we allow the British independent film production industry to go under, a major purveyor of British material —films—will have been lost to us. Therefore, it is in the interests of the broadcast television industry and the embryo cable industry to see that Britain's film industry is supported and survives.

Earlier I mentioned restrictive practices. There are two in this industry. There is the restrictive practice of the buying cartel, about which we have heard a certain amount. My hon. Friend the Minister has said that, were the levy to be introduced, the television companies would replace the material that we are discussing with cheap imported material. But, of course, many of the films that we are talking about are exactly that, and they are very cheap television indeed. The availability of such material enables British television companies—both the BBC and the independent companies — not to use home production.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) said that we are not talking about modern British television films, because they are not cheap. That is absolutely right. They are not cheap, and, in part at least, they are the films that people wish to see. When there is genuine competition for the material, on occasion a fair price is paid for it, but only when there is genuine competition. It is the joint buying cartel of the Independent Television Companies Association and of the BBC that is stifling that freedom of competition.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: I quoted the figures incorrectly. It is $500,000 for "Champions" and $2 million for "Chariots of Fire." I should be interested to know what good new British-made movies have been victimised by this so-called cartel, with the consequence that a derisory sum has been paid for them. Where is the evidence?

Mr. Gale: We have heard a great deal about what I would describe as the blockbuster independent, if there is such a thing. "Chariots of Fire" and "Gandhi" are, I think, the only two films in the blockbuster category which have been mentioned throughout this entire discussion.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: Three—"Champions."

Mr. Gale: If any hon. Member can name a fourth I shall happily give way. [AN HON. MEMBER: "Star Wars."] I believe that "Star Wars" falls into the category of the genuine blockbuster, like the James Bond films and others, and those are not the sort of films that we are discussing this afternoon. We are discussing the small, I hope British, independent productions, which will not fall into the award-winning "Gandhi" and "Chariots of Fire" category, but which can be and often are films of considerable merit. It is those films that the buying cartel has damaged.

There is another restrictive practice — craft union agreements within the independent television companies particularly, but also to some extent within the BBC. The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) and I were both employed—before he returned to this place and I came here for the first time—by Thames Television, which has its own subsidiary, Euston Films. Unlike the hon. Member for Dagenham, I do not discriminate between independent films made for television and independent films made for the cinema. I believe that there is a high degree of interchangeability between them and that the essential quality of a film as opposed to a television production is inherent in both. I therefore support both.

Thames Television has its own film production company. If every independent company and the BBC had their own film production companies, the argument that we are deploying this afternoon would be much weaker, but they have not. It is a fact that in many independent television companies there are closed shop agreements between the union and the management which prevent the commissioning of outside independent productions. If an independent producer or director wishes to make a film for an independent television company, he or she, or they, may be employed individually by that company, but the product will be made by the company, not by an independent producer. That, of course, does not stimulate the British independent film production industry that many hon. Members on both sides of the House seek to stimulate.

My hon. Friend the Minister referred to the element of competition. I suggest that the element of competition is sadly lacking. In seeking to remove, at least in part, the restrictive practices of the buying cartel and of the union closed shop agreements, we are seeking to stimulate the Conservative element of competition.

5.15 pm

The hon. Member for Dagenham said that he was suspicious of any argument which rests on proportion. I am suspicious of any argument which rests in the main on parliamentary drafting—and, with respect, much of the argument of my hon. Friend the Minister did just that. I dealt with the points that he made against the mode of calculation of fees. I must repeat that that mode of calculation is used for every commercial shown on television to calculate performance fees, repeat fees, the payment of the artists, and, in terms of time of viewing, it is applied to the price charged for the commercial itself. If that formula can be applied to a commercial every time it is shown, either locally or on the independent network, it can just as readily be applied to a feature film.

My hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley)—who I know will be rejoining us shortly — dealt with the question of what is a film. His argument is unassailable. A film is a piece of material carrying a certificate from the British Board of Film Censors. It is as simple as that.

This clause was carried in Committee by a sizable majority — indeed, an overwhelming majority, when allowances are made for the normal parliamentary conventions. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister, who spoke of principle in his argument, to accept the principles that the Committee sought to insert into the Bill: first, that the television companies—the independent companies and the BBC, which is just as culpable in this respect—should be required to pay a fair price for what they get and show; and, secondly, that in doing so we and they should support the British film industry upon which, at least in part, the future of broadcast and cable television in this country will depend. I urge my hon. Friend to accept the amendment, with any drafting weaknesses in it that exist, and to use the opportunity in another place to correct them, but not to remove this provision from the Bill.

Mr. Ashdown: As hon. Members who served on the Committee will know, I did not have the privilege of serving on the Committee, but I am happy to be here today and to able to take part on Report.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud), who did serve on the Committee, has provided me with a very good background, and I have some ideas of my own. I should like particularly to comment on what the hon. Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) said, because I think he hit the nail on the head. Certainly I believe that it is a shame that the Government should seek to throw out this amendment made in Committee, where it received a lot of support. I must say that, having read the Committee reports, it seemed to me that the Government not only had the voting against them, but, substantially, the arguments as well. It seems to me that this is the very heart of the Bill. It is the clause which is now being brought in that has countered the opposition to this Bill from a very broad section within the industry.

The removal of the Eady levy without an appropriate replacement is nothing less than the removal of the background stability that the industry has enjoyed. I think we can all accept that the Eady levy was an inappropriate mechanism to provide that background stability, but another method could be found. Without that background stability, without what might be called an infrastructure or something to provide a long-term stabilising force for the industry, it seems likely that we shall move towards a situation in which, as the hon. Member for Thanet, North has said, we shall see the demise of the British independent film maker and a shift away from a broad-based film industry which is capable and successful both in commercial terms and in artistic and rather less commercial terms. The country has a great artistic cinema heritage which has been preserved by the Eady levy and could be preserved in future more effectively by some substitute in a more appropriate form.

Some have suggested that we might have a levy other than the one proposed in the subsection, and the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) commented interestingly on that. For example, it has been suggested that we might have a levy on video tapes. For various reasons, not least those mentioned by the hon. Member for Dagenham, that would be an unwieldy alternative source of finance for the industry.

I also share — it was about the only part of the Minister's speech with which I agreed—the Minister's unhappiness about the unwieldy nature of what is proposed in the subsection. I agree that there are more elegant mechanisms for achieving the aim than to base it entirely on how many bottoms are on seats in front of TV sets. That is an inadequate and perhaps even inaccurate method.

If we are to have a levy, it might be better to impose one based on a percentage of the fee paid to distributors for the distribution of films. The industry would thereby have a real interest in getting the best price for its wares, and a television contribution paid by way of levy based on such a system might be more stable—because the facts would be known in advance—less fluctuating and less dependent on the caprice of the moment, such as the weather or what is showing on other channels.

In the absence of a more preferable system, the advantage of what the subsection proposes to delete—as the hon. Member for Thanet, North said, it could be amended in another place—is that at least it provides a basic structure for future stability. It establishes the idea that to have a good industry we must have a method of financing it. Thus, in the absence of a better system, I shall have to oppose what the Government are aiming to do.

I came to the debate with that view in mind, and my view was enormously reinforced when I heard the Minister's speech. The hon. Gentleman said that he accepted — it is clear from his rhetoric and from the terms of his remarks that he does—the important role that the television companies have to play in providing finance in future.

The Minister may reject the unspoken agreements about which we have heard — although there is enough evidence about them for us to take the matter seriously —but he is a member of a Government who believe in the basic ideology of a free market. He is thrusting the whole of the support mechanism for this important industry right into the hands not of a free market, because he admits that it is not a free market, but of a duopoly. The Government have taken a public monopoly and in the name of free enterprise turned it into a private monopoly. I refer to British Telecom. Here they are thrusting the dependency for a decent system of finance into a market place which is dominated by two parties.

The Minister told the hon. Member for Dagenham that mechanisms would no doubt be found for winding down prices to accommodate the levy which the hon. Member for Dagenham had suggested. Precisely the same, if it is not already happening, could happen in future. Is that the chosen method of the Minister in expressing a free market philosophy?

The Minister went further. He seemed to prefer—perhaps he was using the old debating trick of trying to destroy the argument by becoming ridiculous—a lump sum paid by television companies to the film industry. Would he really prefer that to a system by which the returns on a film are based on its acceptance by the public?

Mr. Gorst: The Minister is not considering much of a lump sum, either.

Mr. Ashdown: I am sure that he is not, but in seeking to destroy the chosen mechanism in the subsection he is, in effect, saying that he prefers the other way, which seems to be totally contrary——

Mr. Norman Lamont: But more logical.

Mr. Ashdown: More logical perhaps, but I thought that the Minister was a believer in the free market. What does he find difficult about having a levy system based on the number of people who want to watch a film—or a system based on the level of public demand?

Like the hon. Member for Dagenham, I suspect that the weaknesses in the Government's argument betray an ideological commitment against the National Film Finance Corporation. The Government know that if we were to set up a system based on the scheme in the subsection, or perhaps on a somewhat amended system, they would have to return to the NFFC.

At the heart of it all is the old ideological closed mind of the Government. They know that the film industry must be supported, and they recognise the important role that the television companies have to play. Yet they thrust it all into the so-called philosophy of the free market, which in this case is nothing of the sort. There are more effective ways of dealing with the matter.

The removal of the Eady levy without an effective replacement is, as many people in the industry say, a significant blow to the future of the British film industry. I do not say—as others, overstating the case, might say —that it is the end. However, it could be the beginning of the end of a sector of the British film industry. It could be the beginning of the end of a British film industry that is renowned not just for its popularity and commercial success, but for the range, the plurality, of its films and for their artistic merit.

For those reasons, and without necessarily agreeing with every detail of the subsection, I shall vote against the Government in this matter.

Mr. Brinton: The old style Eady levy, the passing of which the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) regrets, has received little support during the passage of the Bill. It was astonishing in Committee that the whole of the British film industry was united in saying that the old Eady levy should be updated and that changes were necessary.

Mr. Ashdown: I must have expressed myself more inadequately than I thought. I did not mean to suggest that the Eady levy should be continued. I said that it needed to be updated, but that the system of providing structural support for the industry was important, albeit that we should find other measures for providing that support.

Mr. Brinton: In that case, the hon. Gentleman and I are united in our objective.

I should at the outset mention my potential or actual interests in the subject. I am an adviser to a public relations company called Communications Strategy; I advise the British Videogram Association; I am a director of a company called Airtime (Publicity) News Flash Ltd; and I am a member of the ACTT, the technicians union, and of Actors Equity Association.

A difficulty in discussing the question of how we support the British film industry is that almost everybody speaks subjectively. When I say that the British Videogram Association, which I try to advise, is dead against putting a levy on the showing of films on television, whereas I am for a levy, hon. Members will see that possibly there are problems between us, albeit on a debating scale. One's view on this whole question depends on which side of the fence one sits, and possibly the only place where we can hope to look at the problem with any objectivity is in this House.

The Minister delighted me by admitting, contrary to beliefs in the BBC and ITV, that a great change to the duopoly was on the way. We would be having cable and satellites and so on, he seemed to say. When I was broadcasting with the chairman of the BBC last Sunday week, he told me that cable was a dead duck. If the Minister is right and the duopoly really is falling to bits, there is possibly less of a case for what has been proposed, though many — particularly those who are subjectively interested in retaining the duopoly — say that the duopoly is sticking. Therefore, the unfair competition in buying films will presumably continue in its present form.

5.30 pm

In supporting the idea of a levy for the showing of feature films on television I wish to see a continuing and, I hope, thriving British feature film production industry. The Bill is providing for the bottom end of the industry in creating the son of NFFC, which, given a helpful wind and a fair start, will do much good for smaller budget films. It will be able to contribute £200,000, for example, to stoke them up. That is the scale of the budget of Channel 4 films and that is why Channel 4, to its credit, has become involved, as has the British Videogram Association. That is the proposed scale of operation of the son of NFFC.

My difficulty is that that is only part of the British film industry. I look to some way of keeping a thriving industry that produces feature films with a budget of between £2 million and £7 million. I am not talking about the great blockbusters with considerably larger budgets. I often compare today's medium budget films with those which were produced in the 1950s with budgets of about £200,000 or £300,000. I am old enough to remember those films. There are those who tell me that films such as "The Blue Lamp"——

Mr. Hanley: Hear, hear.

Mr. Brinton: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend's backing.

It is said by some that such films do not portray acceptable techniques these days, but the issue is not one of technique. The same amount of care is lavished on producing that scale of cinema with modern techniques as opposed to film for television, plays for television which are produced on film and minifilms to be shown in arts cinemas. That is what the son of NFFC can and will do successfully, and all credit to it. However, that must be backed with some funding for medium-sized feature films.

There is an alternative to asking the television companies and the BBC to pay a levy, but it is one that the Treasury would dislike intensely. The alternative is to ask the BBC and ITV companies to make feature films, to fund them properly on the scale of which I am talking and to give them suitable fiscal relief for doing so. That would be a way of encouraging the industry. Such a system would let ITV companies off the big levy which is paid on television profits. Advantages of a commensurate nature could be found for the BBC. My conversations with those in the relevant organisations lead me to believe that there would be a keenness to produce the sort of feature films of which I am talking.

If nothing else, I hope that I am reasonably practical in my thoughts. I know that the alternative to the levy system would not be acceptable to the Government. That being so, I must look around to ascertain who best can finance the level of funding for British films that I have in mind.

I am driven to the conclusion that we must channel funds back to those who will produce the feature films from the consumer or customer as directly as we can. The hon. Member for Yeovil said that he did not like the idea of measuring the amount to be paid by the number of bottoms on seats. The virtue of the old Eady system was that the film fan paid for a ticket and, as he could be identified as a film fan, he made a contribution to the future of British films. That was the principle behind the levy. The nearest that we can get to that in terms of electronic transmission is to try to measure the size of the audience and to base the alternative funding system on the results obtained.

The amendment which was made in Committee set down a principle that can be altered easily. As my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) said, mechanisms are available that could make the necessary calculations with great ease, or I am sure that a percentage could be calculated. It must be remembered that the audience for the sort of feature film that I am discussing is currently with television, not with the cinema. Even more threatening is the fact that in a few years television will run out of British films with budgets of between £2 million and £7 million if we do not do something now.

My hon. Friend the Minister of State, who has been constructive and helpful throughout our proceedings since Second Reading, asserted with great vehemence that he wanted to support the British film industry. If we do not get a commitment of the sort of which the amendment is a prime and constructive example, my hon. Friend will not be able to fulfil his commitment. That is why I shall vote against the amendment that seeks to remove the provision which was inserted in the Bill in Committee.

Mr. Chris Smith: I oppose the Government's attempt to remove from the Bill the principle that was inserted in it in Committee. As we are in the business of declaring our interests, I shall tell the House that throughout our discussions I have received considerable research assistance and support from the Association of Cinematograph, Television and Allied Technicians, of which the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Brinton) is a member.

The Minister said that he wanted to base his argument primarily on points of principle rather than on practicality. The thinness of his practical arguments demonstrated the wisdom of that statement. I shall address myself to what seem to be the two major points of principle.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The hon. Gentleman talks of the thinness of my practical arguments. I do not want to sound too stunned by that accusation. I was merely saying that there are many unanswered questions which are not addressed, even remotely, by the amendment. Those questions can be addressed in various ways, but no one has tried even remotely to do so.

Mr. Smith: The Minister has elegantly extracted himself from the specific hole that I dug for him. However, there are unanswered questions on practicality and some of them have been mentioned by my hon. Friends. There should be no real difficulty in answering the remaining questions in practical terms.

I wish to address myself to what seem to be the two fundamental points of principle which led some of us to support the amendment which was agreed to in Committee and which cause me to defend it now.

The first point of principle is that the Government, in abolishing the Eady levy—they were right to do so as it was outdated — have not put in its place sufficient support and funding for the future development of the film industry. They have not created the necessary mechanism and they have not provided the funds to do so.

There were a number of discussions in Committee about the money that would be available under the new mechanism proposed by the Government to provide for the production of the sort of British films that the hon. Member for Gravesham has mentioned. We have read the Government's proposals in the White Paper and the Bill and discussed them on Second Reading and in Committee. The Minister has informed us of the proposed arrangements which have been drawn up for the body that will succeed the NFFC. Unfortunately, the money that will be made available will not be sufficient to do the job properly and ensure that British film making can continue.

We need look only at the contact made early in Committee by the ACTT with a series of financial institutions. The association discussed with financial institutions, film companies and banks what would be needed to encourage private commercial funding to go into new British film making. Each of those institutions replied that the types of funding that the Government outlined in the White Paper were insufficient to enable them to take the risks involved in setting up new film-making enterprises. That clear example shows why I believe the Government have been wrong in terms of the amount of funding they are prepared to put in as seed money for the promotion of commercial private film making.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: Although I expressed in Committee—I shall do so again if I catch Mr. Deputy Speaker's eye — a view not dissimilar to the hon. Gentleman's, I do not believe that his is the final answer. What figure does the hon. Gentleman have in mind? I am sure he has devoted a great deal of time to this aspect.

Mr. Smith: As a bare minimum, I would go for the £10 million mentioned on a number of occasions in Committee. If I were in charge of making the arrangements, however, I would probably wish to double that figure. Given the financial stringency that seems to operate in Government circles these days, I would say that £10 million is a basic minimum. We are nowhere near that figure in terms of what the Government are prepared to accept for any future funding provided by the son of NFFC.

There is another major difference in principle betwen the two sides of the House. I would like a national film authority to be established. That body would be in charge of distributing the money, and ensuring that it goes to the right places and creates the right initiatives. However, we shall have an organisation totally dominated by the people involved in the distributive industries. We have debated that point at great length, and it is not worth pursuing it further at this stage.

The amont of money that will be available is inadequate, and that is the first important point of principle. Establishing the levy—which we attempted to do in Committee and are attempting to preserve now—is one mechanism by which we ensure that money is available for injection into the future growth of British films.

The second important point of principle then comes into play. If one simply says that the amount of money is what is at stake, one could go for crude, rash donations from the television companies or for a levy on blank tapes. Both would be acceptable. The second important point of principle comes into play when we discuss a levy on films shown on television. I believe that there should be a return to the film makers for the artistry, talent and effort that go into making and producing films. At present, there is an insufficient return from films shown on television for the initiative, talent and effort that goes into making them.

Hon. Members have mentioned the low prices which, with some individual exceptions, are paid for the great majority of films shown on television. During 1983 television showed 1,500 films, and there were 4,000 million individual viewings of those films. That compares with 66 million cinema admissions. There is an enormous difference between the number of times a film is viewed by people watching television and the number of times it is viewed by people at the cinema. The price paid for those films when shown on television is, on average, extremely low. The return that goes to the people who put the imagination and talent into making the film in the first place is extremely low when the film is shown on television and far lower when it is shown in the cinema. Some tribute should be paid by television to the film industry for the provision of so much of this material in so many film viewings.

5.45 pm

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): I support my hon. Friend's argument. Does he agree that television and the wider public are responsible for training? Although we welcome the level of skill in the British film industry, there can be no guarantee that that will continue if we are not prepared to reinvest and make training a major priority.

Mr. Smith: As always, my hon. Friend is correct. The money raised by the levy could and should be used in support of the National Film and Television School. I hope that we shall discuss that aspect later.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) pointed out, the replacement of films for viewing is extremely important, and the Government's proposals do not provide sufficiently for that aspect.

Because of the inadequate amount of money that is available and because tributes should be paid to the makers of films by television for using the products of the film industry, it is extremely important that we should reject the Government's attempt to remove this provision from the Bill.

Mr. Hanley: Many said on Second Reading and in Standing Committee that I should declare an interest in the Bill. If having a father, mother, sister and many of my family friends and constituents — perhaps more constituents than most hon. Members—totally absorbed in the film industry is a reason to declare an interest, I declare that interest. It is not a financial interest. If a deep commitment to the film industry throughout one's life is a reason to declare an interest, I declare that interest. I am interested not in helping the survival of the film industry —it will survive whatever the Bill or the future produce because of the gifts and imagination of those within the industry—but in helping to maximise the return that can be made through the talent within the film industry. That is my greatest interest, and it is in the national interest.

I have previously voted for the amendment on which the House will vote later today, because the Bill deals with the making and financing of films. Films can be made only if one has the money necessary to make them. With more money, one makes not necessarily better films but a range of films, and that will mean the production of the best films that the industry can make. If the film industry has just enough funds, it does not risk its money. It does not try out the exciting and the new—rather it tries out the old, tried and true. The "tried and true" did not create the best films in our British film history. Many of the films mentioned in Committee and on Second Reading were not expected to make a lot of money, but they did. Those films gripped the imagination not just of British audiences but of world audiences. They were not made to earn Oscars. They were made as a result of the integrity and skill of those who made them and their confidence in their integrity and skill. They had the financing, but only just.

To be fair, the Bill shows the Government's commitment to the film industry. It shows that the Government give their wholehearted approval to the industry and to the brilliant, cultural contribution that it has made not just to the whole range of entertainment but to the spreading of the name of Britain and the British way of life throughout the world for the past 50 years.

I am pleased with the interest that my hon. Friend the Minister has shown in the film industry. The Bill has been a learning experience for him and he is enriched by it. The trouble is that the Bill gives wholehearted approval to the film industry but it then says, "O.K. lads, it's up to you. We will give you a little start and now off you go." It is a waste of an opportunity and of the excellence of technicians, authors, producers and directors. I do not regard it as anything to be proud of. The trouble with the wholehearted approval that the Government have given by setting up the NFFC is that they have produced a firm foundation, but they have not delivered the plans and financing nor, as far as I can see, do they have any great confidence in the future of the film industry.

The Bill is a modest start to a new era. I should have preferred the Government to have found a more enriching start to that new era. I was not looking for more money from the Government. The Government have the opportunity within the Bill—the amendment created that opportunity — to help to redress some of the unfair balances in the film industry.

I pay tribute to the NFFC's four partners. The name of Rank is synonymous with film and film making over the years. The man with the gong is probably better known than any other symbol within the film industry. Channel 4 is a new type of film maker and with its tremendous vision, imagination—it is exciting and experimental—entrepreneurial skills and proven successes it has made a unique contribution. We should remember that that contribution is also a contribution by all the other ITV companies to which I pay tribute. The £100 million that goes to create Channel 4 comes straight out of the production budgets of the other ITV companies. There is a partnership within ITV to support the new "son of NFFC".

The Bill is about films and film making, but we must also consider viewing habits. That point has been made by many hon. Members today. If we are to provide the finance that I crave, we must provide it in the fairest way. That is the nub of the amendment and the reason why it was tabled. Films are watched in the cinema, on television, and on video by pre-recorded cassettes. Cassettes are used for recording and time-shifting existing television programmes. There will be cable and, no doubt, DBS.

The Bill, however, is not the films-made-for-television Bill; it is the films-made-for-cinema Bill. We must always remember that cinema films make an important contribution to television. There is also a little of the films-made-for-television-that-are-shown-in-the-cinema Bill about it. We must remember how films are priced when they are bought for television. They achieve their price because they are still popular in the cinema, and because there is a demand to see films as soon as possible. Thank goodness, the cinema is the only way to do that.

The Bill provides an opportunity to ensure that those who see the films pay for them. Those who watch and benefit from the films pay nothing like a fair price at the moment. The price paid by the BBC and ITV companies is not fair. As my hon. Friend the Minister said, the duopoly has been against the interests of the film industry. I do not go so far as to say that it has been exploitation, as some of my hon. Friends do.

Even my hon. Friends who are connected with the television industry will admit that they try to pay the lowest possible prices for the films that they put on television and that films shown on television are the cheapest possible television created today. There is no cheaper way of filling out TV schedules than to put on a feature film. There is no more expensive product to make than the feature film.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: There probably are cheaper ways—re-runs of "I Love Lucy", for example.

Mr. Hanley: Re-runs of former television programmes are cheaper, but it was not cheap to make those programmes in the first place. The point I am making is that it is not cheap to make films. There is a bigger difference between the cost of making a film and using it on television than anything I know.

The history of the world's economy over the past 200 years has shown that we have been taking away from those who create, make and dig and giving to those who exploit resources. We must make the world economy fairer.

Mr. Chris Smith: That is Socialism.

Mr. Hanley: That is not Socialism. Even Conservative Members recognise that a fair price must be paid for commodities. There is a level beyond which there is exploitation. I do not believe that one quarter of a penny per viewer per film is too great an expense. If that were the level of the levy, it would raise £10 million. It would still only increase a licence of £46 or £65 by 30p. It is difficult to split a levy as with, for example, lending rights to authors, but the principle is more important than the distribution. If the BBC had to pay 30p of its £65 to the film makers to help create films, it would be worth it.

A levy of £1 on each blank or pre-recorded cassette would raise £20 million. The Government are not trying to provide the money. They are trying to set a scene where a fair return for those who make the films can be constructed. The public would not carp at 30p of the licence fee going to help create a better, bigger and brighter future for the film industry. I am sure that we shall return to the argument about a levy on videotapes, but it is not germane to the Bill.

My hon. Friend the Minister said that we were not addressing ourselves to the point, which was whether the BBC and the ITV companies would buy fewer films. I do not believe that they would. They would merely have to pay for the pleasure that they are giving their audiences, and the business that they are giving to their advertisers. They would be giving a fair return to those who produce the films. They might be more selective about the films that they buy. Many films are, with respect, rubbish. I do not believe that every film made, even by the British film industry, is good. If television companies had to be more selective, the talented people who make films would benefit.

The amendment is the fairest way to create a satisfactory financial framework for the film producer and the industry. The BBC could do a great deal. It could sell its dead time between 2 o'clock and 6 o'clock in the morning to independent film producers. They would leap at the chance of showing their films and having a shop window at that time. That would raise revenue. In return, I believe that the television companies should produce the funding to keep a great industry going.

Four Conservative hon. Members initially supported the amendment. We have worked very hard on the Bill. There was total attendance from the four of us and, indeed, from the vast majority of members of the Standing Committee. We have devoted to the Bill much more time than I believe any hon. Member can afford to give, in these days of difficult modern politics when we are subject to so many disparate pressures. I do not believe that any of the four of us has in any way moved his position. Indeed, after the discussions I believe that we have been entrenched in our positions.

I am not attacking television or the television companies. We are all grateful for their support for the industry. We merely believe that that support must be paid for fairly. We hoped that the Bill would provide a medium through which that could be done.

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): It was a great disappointment to me not to be asked to serve on the Committee on the Bill. I had participated in the Second Reading debate. However, it was one of those things. I was appointed to the Committee that was considering the fluoridation of the water supply. They tell me that fluoridation will improve the teeth and therefore the looks not only of children but of all of us. People will have a good set of choppers when they go before the film cameras.

It is a tragedy that we are debating a Films Bill that is worded in this way and doing what it is supposed to do for the British film industry. Many hon. Members are interested in the film industry. I know that on the Government Benches, in particular, there are a number of hon. Members who have had a fair amount to do with the industry.

On Second Reading I commented on the debonair manner of Ministers. The hon. Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) suggested that the Ministers found the Committee stage of the Bill a real education. If education—at least about film making—is added to the Ministers' debonair manner, we may see some different faces at the Department of Trade and Industry. The present Ministers may go on to better things. One never knows.

I must admit that I have not agreed with the arguments put forward by either side of the House. The Government are wallowing about all over the place. They do not know where they are going—and not only with the Films Bill. The nation, like the British film industry, is going down and down. It is high time that the Government woke up. They were told on Second Reading, they were probably told in Committee and I am telling them now that they are not improving the situation at all. I am suspicious of the easy way out that is being taken by the Government.

I agreed with one of the points made by the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Brinton). If the Government intended to live up to their responsibilities, not only to industry in general but to the film industry in particular, they should have picked up the idea of some sort of relief to be offered by the Treasury. On Second Reading, the Minister wept buckets of tears over the situation of the film industry and said that the Government wanted to help. One way in which they could help would be by arranging some Treasury relief.

On the question of the television companies and the levy, I can assure my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) that he need have no fears about me. He will find me in the right place. However, I do not agree with either of the suggestions that have been made. We have heard that the television companies may buy older films in order to keep costs down. Although I do not agree with the Minister in general, I agreed with one point that he made. If there is a levy on a film made only two or three years ago, it will be much cheaper for the television company to choose an older film. I am afraid that the levy will drive the television companies away. We all know the saying about biting the hand that feeds. I believe that that saying is applicable here. The television companies will be driven away from buying new films.

There are about 10 million pensioners in our nation. I am not one of them.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): Go on.

Mr. Haynes: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman is unaware that there are nearly 10 million pensioners in our country. His comment shows that he is in the dark.

I remember the time when the hon. Member for Gravesham used to read the news. I remember the period when films were made more cheaply than they are now. Today, costs are massive. I must declare my interest. No, I am not a member of Equity. I have not been to Hollywood. I am certainly ugly enough for a horror film —but let that pass. I am a member of the films group in the House, and I am proud to be a member. I try to carry out my responsibilities in that connection. I am sorry that I am not wearing my studio tie today. I have visited a number of British film studios. When one talks to people who work in the industry, one really gets the message about how the industry has gone down and down. Many studios have had to close.

The country's 10 million pensioners look forward to films such as the beautiful film that I saw on television on Sunday night. It was a Warner Brothers film starring Bogart and Cagney. On the previous Sunday there was a real masterpiece — "Show Boat". I listened to Paul Robeson singing "Ol' Man River" in his rich bass voice. That film was made in 1936. I am old enough to remember it but I wanted to see it again. Such films are catching on on television. The hon. Member for Hendon, North (Mr. Gorst) mentioned the Bond films and others like them. There is no doubt that many youngsters are interested in such films, but those who are retired or approaching retirement are more interested in older films.

Television companies will be encouraged to show such films if we do what the Government suggest. Well, they are not suggesting a great deal—they are wallowing about and trying to get someone to dig them out, as per usual. I do not favour either of the suggestions that have been made, but would prefer the Treasury to make a contribution if the Government are genuinely interested in the British film industry.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: I agree with the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) that nostalgia for first-class movies made in the 1930s, 1940s and 1950s is growing. They are quite cheap and the hon. Gentleman might be right in saying that television companies will find them more attractive if a levy is imposed.

I should like to outline why the Government should be supported—they have not enjoyed much support today. No hon. Member has proved by using facts and figures that the proposed levy on television companies is fair to those companies. Nor has anyone shown that the price that television companies pay to show British films is unfair. I have quoted the prices that have been paid for contemporary British productions of quality, and nobody has shouted me down.

Mr. Hanley: When television companies bid for films that they want to show, is there a straightforward auction between the two companies or do they agree in advance which shall make a bid?

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: Hon. Members have suggested that there is not a fair competitive process but that there is a cartel. It is some cartel that fetches up $4 million for "Star Wars", $2 million for "Chariots of Fire" and $500,000 for "Champions". People in the business suggest that competition works, and I have no evidence to show that it does not. My hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) said that the price paid for small budget productions is too low in relation to the talents and costs of such productions. I wonder which films he was referring to. Are they the types of film that some hon. Members suggest are produced for the real cinema, or are they those which are produced for television and which are criticised by my hon. Friends who support the levy? If we are considering films that will be seen by most people on television, the Government have made a case, as has the industry. As a result of the establishment of Channel 4, there has been a massive increase in financial support for the British film industry.

Mr. Gorst: Does my hon. Friend agree that he is arguing that when television companies go shopping at Fortnum and Mason they pay a high price but that they never pay a high price when they go to the real market, which is the high street? Does he agree that most of what they buy is bought at ridiculous prices and that they only occasionally shop at Fortnum and Mason?

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: Such charges are made, but they have not been substantiated. It is argued that television companies pay a high price at Fortnum and Mason, but do not in the high street. What sort of argument is that? That is one reason why television companies go to the market. There is competition there for many low budget movies. There are so many of them around that they do not fetch as high a price as others such as "Gandhi".

Mr. Gale: May I suggest that the difference is not between Fortnum and Mason and the high street but between the high street and the pawn shop? Does my hon. Friend agree that it is the desperation of the pawn shop that forces producers to sell at pawn shop prices to the ITCA and the BBC? My hon. Friend said that he had heard no argument that controverted his. The reason for that is that, until fairly recently, right hon. and hon. Members were in Committee upstairs, where such arguments were spelt out clearly. Perhaps I might put it on the record here that films shown on television costing £60,000 or £120,000 an hour represent cheap television.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: Many television productions are very cheap and many people who want to get into the cable television business will want to show many old television productions which are probably even cheaper than old films. That is how the market works. Hon. Members are trying to work against the market. They are pleading that people who have worked in the movies in Britain or the United States—most of the cheaper movies are American—are somehow being exploited when, 20 years later, their film is seen by millions of people on television. People involved in films cannot expect the high prices that were paid when the film was made to be repeated 20 years later. That does not apply to the products of any other business.

Mr. Gould: As I understand it, the hon. Gentleman's bald point is that we are wrong to say that television companies are paying low prices for films. Does he agree that the examples of high prices that he gave do not relate to the majority of the 1,500 films that are shown on television each year? Does he agree that those low prices militate against the very in-house film production of which he is so proud?

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: I do not agree that the low prices militate against film production. Old movies are bound to command a low price because there are many of them and there is no reason why television companies should pay a high price any more than someone should pay a high price for a pair of second-hand shoes. Films go downmarket and even classic films cannot be expected to command a premium price year in, year out. To do that would be to exploit the consumer. Television companies—the consumers—are not prepared to go along with that. There are plenty of opportunities for the film industry to recoup its investment if it goes about distribution correctly. Sensible distribution involves doing away with the ridiculous restictive practices of the past, such as the barring of movies from second-run cinemas and from television until they are tired out and a lot of interest has been lost. There are certain modifications belatedly being made to improve the system so that the revenue for film producers can be increased. Obviously there are bargains to be had, but they do not arise from cartels. Anyone in the British film industry can get a high price for a new prestigious production, commensurate with the talents that went into such a movie.

The film industry has had to come to terms with the fact that the cinema has been in decline. If we think that the answer to the cinema in decline is to pump more money into the production end, we shall not solve the problem. We shall merely create some jobs for people to make more expensive movies, which will be seen by decreasing numbers of people in the cinema. I do not know of any other countries that are dealing with the problem of a decline in film production, which are seriously contemplating following the road that the Government have been invited to take. On the contrary—I do not wish to be drawn too far into this because it is a point for Third Reading—they realise the growing interconnection between distribution, different forms of production, exhibition and what the film industry is there for. France, for example, recognises that there is no dichotomy between the film industry that makes commercial films and the film industry that makes arts films. It recognises that this is also an art industry. France has a much more mature, more sensible and, in the end, more viable route to restore the strength of the French movie industry.

Mr. Gould: Since the hon. Gentleman cites the French example, he will wish to concede that the French recognise the principle of redistribution. It just so happens that their cinema attendances have held up better than ours.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: French audiences have held up for other reasons. [HON. MEMBERS: "Television."] It is not because of payment by television at all. In so far as television supports French movies, I agree. It is not through financial efforts that it is because it is appallingly bad compared with our own industry.

All hon. Members agree that the film industry needs an injection of investment, not just for production but to cover the whole spectrum that I have mentioned. It is totally unfair to suggest as a short-term measure because we do not think that the Government have it right—they have not got it completely right and I do not know what other proposals they intend to make if the film industry is to be put in a more viable state—that we should impose the burden on the television industry. The distinction between film making and television making is gradually becoming blurred. To boot, the television industry contributes an ever-growing proportion of its revenue to the film industry. It is a generous contribution. Some hon. Members present served on the Committee which helped to create Channel 4. We hoped that it would be a success and that it would not cater purely for minorities but would have a strong sense of commercial responsibility. That is shown by its contribution, talent, inventiveness and cash in support of the British film industry.

It is not worthy of the House to suggest that an industry that is contributing nearly £100 million to the British movie industry should be condemned because about 50 per cent. of the productions are more suitable for television. People want to view films on television. It is no use suggesting that they should not be allowed to because they should see them in the cinema, unless something is done about their exhibition.

On those grounds, the support that the television industry has given to the movie industry should lead us to believe that it would be wrong to impose additional burdens on it, which might have the reverse effect from that which we expect.

Hon. Members must recognise that, whatever the profitability of television companies, they face difficult problems. The audience is to be fragmented through the development of cable and direct broadcasting by satellite. The BBC, public and private sector television are being asked to finance the satellite, which we all hope will be a British satellite, in the latter half of this decade. That is a formidable bill to face. It will give even greater opportunities for distribution of British films, which is what they want.

I could pump £100 million into the British film industry, as has been suggested, but to some extent it would go down the drain commercially. No British film industry has proved viable on its own because the home market is not large enough. It was thought that Alex Korda, the brilliant producer of "The Private Lives of Henry VIII", had found the key to that. We still persist in believing the myth that if we produce a good British movie we can make the British movie industry viable, but we cannot because it depends on American distribution. That is one reason why the British movie industry often comes a cropper or has false dawns because it has momentary success in America and then crumples again. That is why we must consider the matter from a wider point of view.

Apart from the inelegance of the proposed solution, it is not only unfair but counter-productive. I agree with the guidance given by the Independent Broadcasting Authority. It said:

> "The health of Channel 4 and the independence depends largely upon the well-being of Independent Television. We can see no justification therefore for an additional mechanism which will simply rob Peter to pay Paul."

That is a fair and correct approach. If at some future date—and we shall need to reconsider the industry's position—hon. Members would like to suggest to the Government that their responsibilities do not end with this Bill, I would follow them into the Lobby. But I shall not vote with them tonight.

Mr. Gorst: If I had not just listened to my hon. Friend the Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith), I would have said that our debate had been of an all-party nature. Apart from the odd party political fact that emerged, I have not disagreed with anything that has been said from either side of the House, with the exception of the remarks of my hon. Friend the Minister. However, I wish to acquit him of the suggestion which has been made that he has principled objections to this part of the Bill. I also wish to acquit him of any suggestion that he has allowed dogma to masquerade as principle or prejudice. The fact is that he has no practical objections to this part of the Bill. He does not see insurmountable difficulties, and has only been voicing unresolved problems, which could easily be dealt with by his civil servants were there a will to do so.

The debate, therefore, is between the two sides of the House and two tips of a television iceberg. One surfaces intermittently in our proceedings with a sad sigh or a selective statistic, and the other is the Minister. At the end of the debate the Government will undoubtedly use their unspoken weapon—a Whipped vote—to get their way. For the time being we must accept any such verdict, if that is the way in which the Minister concludes our proceedings, but I hope that the other place will note our arguments and exercise its independent judgment on those arguments, without fear of the consequences of which we who must obey a different system must take cognisance.

I do not wish to rehearse all the arguments that have been advanced this afternoon, nor any that I voiced in Committee, because that would be tedious repetition. But one point that calls for more comment is whether the prices paid by ITV and the BBC for showing films on television are fair. My hon. Friend the Minister seemed to be arguing that low prices for old films were fair, but I am not attracted by that argument, and I hope that hon. Members are not attracted by it. If we go along that path, it is difficult to see how we cannot say that old books, gramophone records, plays, ballets and operas should also receive reduced payments. No one would wish to argue along those lines, not even my hon. Friend the Minister. What should influence the price of those films is the demand for them. I am sure my hon. Friend will agree that the television companies should pay a different price for films for which there is a demand than for films for which there is no demand.

I wish to take up the point made by that quaint character, the head of briefing of the IBA, that the levy will harm television. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to remember that if ITV can afford to pay a levy to the Treasury, it can afford to pay a levy to the film industry, especially if the Treasury would be so kind as to remove the obligation to pay its levy. The Treasury takes far more in its levy than would have to be paid willingly by consumers for the opportunity of watching films on television.

I end with a hypothetical suggestion to those two tips of the iceberg to whom I referred. Let us suppose that all films were available to the television audience only through the medium of pay television and that the competition from ITV and the BBC did not contain any cinema films. Do my hon. Friend the Member for Wealden and those who think like him believe that the amount of money collected by a pay television channel, with a similar penetration of the nation, would be less than, the same as, or more than is paid in aggregate by the BBC and ITV? If they maintain that it would be the same, they live in a dream world. If they believe that it would be more, they must concede our case and accept the levy so that fairness can operate.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith rose——

Mr. Gorst: I see that my hon. Friend wishes to challenge me.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: I know better than to do that, because we wish to draw this debate to a conclusion. From what my hon. Friend says, I assume that he is in favour of pay television. I also favour it, and one reason why I object to the proposal of my hon. Friend is that he supports a levy on British television companies and, in addition, he supports pay television, which will fragment the audience of the companies, which rely on advertising. He cannot have it both ways.

Mr. Gorst: My hon. Friend, with his usual charm, wishes to draw me away from the substance of my argument, which is that if the audience could show what it wished to pay for, the answer would be different from that given by him and by the Minister.

Remorselessly, I come to the conclusion that if the Government will not concede the retention of this provision, gently, stealthily and gradually they will ease the cinema side of the film industry into an unsung burial ground. That will be a great tragedy for Britain.

Mr. Key: We have had a long debate, and I suspect that I am at the bottom of the pecking order, but that does not mean that my speech will leave any important stones unturned.

I hope that the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) was not offended by my lighthearted intervention in his speech. I was paying him a double compliment, first, because I know only too well that he has a long time to go before he receives his pension, and, secondly, because I meant it literally when I told him to, "Go on." He was proving the point that I wished to make, because he was one of the first hon. Members to refer to the consumer of the product about whose creation we are talking.

I was nearly persuaded by the eloquent speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) to vote for his argument. However, despite his eloquence and the fact that it is always a pleasure to follow my hon. Friend, he will not succeed. My hon. Friend the Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) said that people wished to watch films on television instead of going to cinemas. I doubt that. When we seal the fate of this clause, and later that of the Bill, we may have convinced ourselves that we are collectively right, but we shall then have to try to convince the consumers of the product that we are right.

I speak with some diffidence, because some hon. Members who have spoken have great experience of the film industry. In Committee and today there has been much lobbying from all sides of the industry, which have been working closely together, but the consumer has had somewhat less say. In the borrowed words of the Minister, we must demonstrate that the consequences of the Bill will be beneficial. Incidentally, I congratulate the Minister on guiding us through the Bill. Popular though it may be to blame the Government for everything, the blame for this point must be placed elsewhere.

We are in danger of too many people having it both ways. It is clear that much of the discussion has been carried on as though there was a free market in films. There is not. The Minister taunted us a little by suggesting that everything will be all right because the cable and satellite television revolution is just round the corner. I must immediately declare an interest as a shareholder in a small company called Salisbury Cablevision, which has been knocked off the bottom rung of the ladder to somewhere below the bottom rung by the Government's actions in respect of the fledgling cable industry.

[Mr. Key]

We cannot say that the proportion of films on television is becoming smaller, so a levy would be counterproductive, but at the same time say that cinema audiences are now sitting in front of their television screens, so Britain, almost alone in the world, will do nothing to encourage cinema-going. Those arguments must be exclusive to each other.

There is no free market in the industry and, furthermore, Britain is not an island. The impact of British experience in the international film industry is well known. Only recently I discovered that British citizens are working in every section of the production of Roman Polanski's new epic "Pirates". There are British actors in main and secondary roles, British technicians are doing all the special effects, there are British costume designers, and the pirates' galleon will sail with British masts, sails and riggings, and the film will be overseen by a British naval architect. Even the jolly roger will be made from British cloth.

Mr. Hanley: May I also suggest that my hon. Friend should declare an interest, as he has a minor part in the film "Amadeus"?

Mr. Key: Modesty had forbidden me from mentioning that fact. However, I must emphasise that it was in a purely amateur capacity, and I had no financial involvement. As I said on Second Reading, it is a marvellous film and I think that every hon. Member should see it forthwith.

May we be specific about what we are discussing in terms of cinemas? The decline in cinemas in the country has been sharp, although not as sharp perhaps as the decline in audiences. Over the 10-year period since 1974 the number of licensed public cinemas has fallen from 1,590 to 1,495, but the total of admissions has fallen from 143 million to 55 million. The number of staff in full-time and part-time employment in cinemas has halved in both categories.

When I was discussing the Bill with constituents, I addressed myself to the question of cinemas. It seemed to me that we had not discussed cinemas in any depth. I wrote to the obvious people, the distributors, to ask them what they thought about cinemas and their significance with respect to the Bill. I was told by the Rank Organisation that the reason that cinemas have declined so fast in the United Kingdom compared with other countries is partly because of language, which has protected the cinema in France and Germany, whereas the United Kingdom has a diet of mainly American films; secondly, that disposable income is much higher in the United States, France and Germany than in the United Kingdom; thirdly, that the quality of television varies widely and is probably best in the United Kingdom; fourthly, that due to legislation, taxation and rates, operating costs are probably higher in the United Kingdom than elsewhere, as is the cost of land, and consequently cinema prices tend to be higher; and, fifthly, that unemployment is higher in the United Kingdom, especially among young people. The next reason given is video penetration and demographic changes. The final point is that the United States on average enjoys much better weather, and that 20 per cent. of American cinemas are drive-in cinemas.

We have had an interesting experience in Salisbury recently. The cinema has been closed. It has been said that the reason for the decline of the cinema is that nobody wants to go and nobody is interested any more. I think that the hon. Member for Ashfield would agree that many pensioners much enjoy going to the cinema, particularly to matinee performances. In Salisbury, when threatened with the closure of the cinema by the Rank Organisation, well over 20,000 people signed a petition to keep open the cinema which, in a town with a population of 40,000, is pretty good going.

Thorn-EMI Screen Entertainment had a somewhat different view from Rank. Rank professed that it did, indeed, have an interest in maintaining its distributor chain. Thorn-EMI was rather more open and honest about its own failings, I suppose, claiming that it did not give a particularly good service to the public in the past, that is, in the provinces, one cannot book seats, one has to stand in queues, often in the rain, there is usually nowhere to sit in comfort and, where cinemas have been twinned or tripled, one can often hear the sound from the adjacent theatre, there is no soap in the loos and one cannot find a towel even when one gets to the loo. All the cinemas are in the wrong areas. They should be near the communities, in shopping centres and so on. The local advertising of films is atrocious. As we know, EMI is remedying that situation as well as it can.

I turned for advice to the British Film Institute also. It pointed out that the remarkable level of penetration of video recorders could not be blamed entirely. Indeed, it was a symptom of the public enthusiasm for entertainment by film in spite of its apparent distaste for cinemas.

Mr. Tom Clarke: I was interested in what the hon. Gentleman said about cinema attendances. Would he care to predict—or, if not, would he encourage his hon. Friend the Minister to predict—the effect on cinema attendances if the Bill is enacted?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not be tempted to go too wide of the amendment.

6.45 pm

Mr. Key: Thank you for saving me, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am sure that the Minister will address himself to that point. My hope, however, is that attendances will rapidly increase, and I should say why I think that that is likely to happen.

I refer here to the view of the British Film Institute, when considering evidence from other countries, as to what it believes to be wrong with the United Kingdom situation. First, there has been low or zero investment in cinema fabric refurbishment over many years. There has been no new cinema building in areas of likely audience concentration such as suburbs and out-of- town shopping centres, and that has occurred particularly in the United States. There has been a lack of effective competition between exhibitors to the benefit of the audience and a lack of strategic booking and promotion policies on the part of United Kingdom distributors. Those factors together have as much bearing on the disastrous decline in cinema attendance as has video penetration.

It has been said that Rank and EMI would prefer to be out of the business altogether. I cannot comment on that; it is merely hearsay. Looking at the profitability of that side of their industries, one can understand why they might wish to draw those conclusions. EMI has committed itself to a major programme. Rank has been less forthcoming.

I end on a note of optimism. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Wealden, I do not believe that people do not wish to go to cinemas. I think that they will go to cinemas if the cinemas are in the right place and offer the right kind of comfort and attraction for family entertainment. Having recently been not visibly involved in "Amadeus" but involved in the soundtrack only—I would not wish to put off any hon. Member from seeing the film; it is not necessary to see me — I have seen that end of the operation and the high quality of technology that is going into films. It is a tragedy that more people do not go to cinemas in which there is a high standard of reproductive facility to attract audiences.

I believe that what happened in the United States could happen here if the Government can convince me that they are right and that the supporters of the amendment are wrong. Cinemas in the United States are becoming more sumptuous. There is a complete reversal of the trend towards spartan facilities such as we tended to see in this country. It is significant that in the past two years alone more than 2,000 new cinemas have opened in the United States. Many have 500 or more seats which we are constantly told it is impossible to achieve in this country. The leading cinema owner of Sumner Redstone, president of the North-East Theatre Corporation of Boston, is reported as having said:

"We have to compete for the public now and the only way is luxury."

There have been enormous strides in sound, and ultra-sophisticated equipment is the order of the day.

I believe that there is a great future for the cinema as opposed to just the film. I hope that the Minister in his reply will convince me that a levy is not the answer to this. I hope too that the distributors will convince the consumers that their policies are right and that they will meet demand with adequate cinema provision.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) for making clear what he meant when he said that he had a part in the film "Amadeus". Indeed, until he made it clear, I wondered whether he played the part of Mozart or Salieri. I congratulate him on being involved in the film, and naturally I hope that he will be able to arrange for me to see it, as I have read so much about it.

A large part of the debate has revolved round the principle of the levy. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, North (Mr. Gorst) said, it is not really the practicalities that we have been discussing in the debate. I agree with my hon. Friends the Members for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) and for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) that no doubt there are answers to some of the questions which I identified in my opening remarks. All that I sought to do was to say that we had not identified the answers to the questions posed in Committee. It is more than just a small point, because the reaction to a levy would vary according to the answers to those questions. Different people would have different opinions upon a levy, depending upon the answers to those questions. However, it is the principle that we have been discussing.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, North said, a large part of the debate has been about the restricted market. Questions such as these have been asked: is a cartel operating? Are the prices that are paid for films by television companies unfair? We have heard much about the duopoly. It is an imperfect market. It is literally more than a duopoly. Channel 4, by coming along and financing its own films, is becoming a third force. In the debate we are talking about only part of the market. We are talking about levying part of the market that is available for films. We are talking about levying only part of the television market.

I would not deny for one moment that that section of the market is imperfect. I disagree with the suggestion that somehow the deficiencies of an imperfect market are corrected or made more perfect by introducing the distortion of a levy on top. I do not consider that the appropriate response.

Again and again we hear in the debate that it is not a free market. I hope I have made it clear that I do not think that it is. It is odd that Labour Members tend to say that in almost every debate. In shipbuilding debates, I am told that it is not a free market. I know that it is not a free market. I know that it is not a free market in the film industry as well. It is an imperfect market, but an imperfect market is better than no market at all, or no element of competition at all.

Mr. Gould: The peculiarity of this market is that there are 4 billion occasions on which the demand for the product is demonstrated, but the market reward for that demand cannot be paid to those who supply it because the market is controlled by a duopoly of television companies. The levy is simply a mechanism whereby that constriction of the market can be at least partly overcome.

Mr. Lamont: That is what the whole debate is about, and that is what I am addressing my remarks to.

To my mind, the fact that it is an imperfect market is not proof for the assertion that inadequate prices are being paid for films made by British film producers. That has been asserted rather than proven in the debate. Some hon. Members—not all—have accepted, perhaps uncritically, the claim by those who, after all, have an interest in the matter that producers' remuneration is not all that it might be.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) put a different gloss on that matter and gave a different set of arguments and examples. It was he who said that what we are often talking about are second-hand goods. We are talking about films which have exhausted their life in the theatrical cinema. If they had not, they would be exhibited. That is why the price for so many of those films is low. My hon. Friend also said that the prices must be compared with those that might be paid for cheaper American material that might be purchased by the BBC or the television companies if they had to face the demands of a levy.

Mr. Gorst: It is clear that it is common ground between my hon. Friend the Minister and everybody else that there is a distortion in the market. What is not clear is whether my hon. Friend concedes that, by whatever means, there is a need to help those who operate to a disadvantage in the market.

Mr. Lamont: What I am saying is that there is an element of competition. Of course, it is not a perfect market. It is not a free market. As has been demonstrated again and again, for example by my hon. Friend the Member for Wealden, there is an element of competition in the market.

The question whether there is rigging of prices in the market between the BBC and ITV, or between different companies, is a serious one. I am sure that the Director General of Fair Trading will read the debate and note that. I am sure that he will consider what has been alleged and asserted. It is for him to investigate the matter and consider whether there is evidence of improper practice. The fact that people assert that inadequate prices are being paid is not, by itself, an argument for a levy. If there is a cartel, operating improperly, it should be investigated. However, that has not been proven beyond doubt and I do not believe that much evidence has been provided in the debate.

Mr. Gorst rose——

Mr. Lamont: I was just about to refer to another point that my hon. Friend made. He put a good question to the House when he asked, if we had a system whereby films were provided through pay television, would the remuneration to film producers be less, the same or greater than at present? It is a brilliant question, but he gave no evidence for the answer, and he seems to think that it is self-evident that they would be paid more. I agree that the question is right, but of its nature it is almost unanswerable. If there is real evidence of price fixing or rigging of the market between the BBC and ITV, the Government or the Director General of Fair Trading should consider that, but it is not enough just to assert that the remuneration of producers is less than it should be simply because they say that that is so.

Mr. Ashdown: The Minister has denied as strenuously as the hon. Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) that a cartel is in operation——

Mr. Lamont: I did not.

Mr. Ashdown: I apologise to the Minister. The hon. Member for Wealden denied that such a cartel was in operation, but the Minister said that perhaps it was and should be looked into. Let us accept that no such cartel is in operation. If the Minister accepts that it is not a free market, however uncorrupted it may be now—taking that point as read—how long does he believe that, with only two buyers in the market place, it will remain a fair market that reflects fair prices? I ask the Minister to recall that he is setting up a permanent system to fund the film industry. Surely, with only two buyers in the market place, in time it must become corrupted. Does the Minister recognise that the system of levy is trying to measure demand in some other way as that demand cannot be measured by the free market system because it is an imperfect market?

Mr. Lamont: The Liberals are always accusing us of being dogmatic and theoretical, and always trotting out phrases about free markets and fair prices. Life consists of imperfect markets. That is the real world.

Mr. Ashdown: Answer the question.

Mr. Lamont: I will answer the question. I always do. The answer to imperfect markets is not to add distortions such as those proposed by the Opposition. I have been asked how long it will be before the situation alters. That depends on other matters.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Brinton) talked about DBS, and my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury talked about cable. I was asked whether there was a reason for believing that this revolution and these changes might be slowing down. I concede that there might be problems. Progress on that front might not have been as fast as many of us had hoped or predicted, but I think most people feel that that is the way for the future. Undoubtedly the market for films will open up. Undoubtedly the restricted market will become wider and the element of monopoly or duopoly will gradually change. If that is the future, it is anachronistic and wrong to impose this levy on television companies.

On top of that, we have to face the fact that there will be a voracious appetite for films on television. The EC Commission has calculated that by the late 1980s there will be a demand for about 125,000 hours of fiction per year. That far surpasses the combined film production at present of France, Germany, Italy and the United Kingdom. A large market is opening up.

Mr. Gorst: My hon. Friend referred to the Director General of Fair Trading. Is he aware that all the information that one is able to glean about prices comes from the ITV companies? As far as I am aware, the IBA does not know at what price its programme contractors buy in their material. The BBC is extremely cagey about prices as well. Therefore, my hon. Friend's suggestion that the Director General of Fair Trading should look at the matter is not only sensible but welcome, and I hope that he will pursue it.

Mr. Lamont: My hon. Friend would not wish to misrepresent me. I said that if there were evidence of abuse the Director General of Fair Trading would obviously wish to consider that, and that I was sure he would read the debate. However, I take my hon. Friend's point seriously. I am anxious to look at some of these points about prices. I have had conversations with people in the industry about this vexatious question, and the answers have been no more enlightening than the debate. There have simply been assertions after assertions. I agree that there is a case for finding out more of the facts about it. However, until we have the facts, the argument for the levy does not stand up.

It must be emphasised, as my hon. Friend the Member for Wealden emphasised, that television companies have a vested interest in film production. He referred to what Channel 4 is doing for film production. The Channel 4 "Film on Four" programme alone has spent £14·5 million on films. The BBC expenditure on films has, in the past five years, increased by about 100 per cent. Would these sums of money be made available if there were a levy? That is open to question.

Mr. David Crouch (Canterbury): My hon. Friend may remember that although I was not on the Committee I took a considerable interest in the Bill on Second Reading. I am a considerable film viewer, but I never go to the cinema. I support the film industry. I think my hon. Friend knows that I have a great interest in the theatrical industry. If I go to the theatre, I pay £15 for a ticket, or else I cannot get a seat. However, I can wait to see "Amadeus" on television, and that is unfair. Whatever my hon. Friend is saying, there is not a glowing future for the film industry. There is not a great expanding market. I can see those films which I like to watch by staying at home and paying £47 or £65 to the BBC. The film industry does not have a great future.

Mr. Lamont: With great respect to my hon. Friend, who is a friend of mine, his intervention or little speech went over much ground. If I reply to all his points, I shall repeat the debate that we had in Committee and a large part of the debate that we have had this afternoon. I am pleased that he has been able to join us at this stage in the proceedings, but he will forgive me if I do not answer all his points.

The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) did not answer the point about what would stop the BBC and independent television companies from cutting back on the amount that they already spend on television film if there were this levy. This is a fundamental and important point.

Mr. Gould: I offered a number of points, but the fundamental one is that, even with the levy, the buying in of feature films by the television companies is so much the cheapest form of television that the companies would be a long way from giving up the practice. It would still be the thing that they would be bound to do.

Mr. Lamont: The hon. Gentleman's point illustrates what I was saying. Any pressure put on the television companies by the levy will intensify pressure to buy the cheapest forms of entertainment, such as some American films. The hon. Gentleman, for all his attempts to answer the question, did not address himself to the point, and nor did the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown). The hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes), who is sitting on the Front Bench now, addressed himself to that question when he was on the Back Benches a few minutes ago. His answer was the right one, and I am not sure whether he should not now retreat to the Back Benches again. He was right in saying that there was a great danger that the levy might lead to less money being spent by the television companies on British films.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham attempted to widen the debate to consider the finances of the British film industry. He said that unless there were a levy there would not be adequate support for the British film industry. We were perhaps moving towards the arguments that we had in Committee about the level of funding for the son of the NFFC and capital allowances, and so on. Again, my answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham was given by my hon. Friend the Member for Wealden. Even if the Government have got it wrong about the finances for the British film industry, that is not an argument for imposing a levy for British films on television.

My hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury was wholly right to emphasise that one cannot base a film industry largely on the prosperity of the television industry. If the film industry is to survive and prosper, we must reverse the trend of decline in our cinemas. A good British film industry must have a strong cinema sector. It cannot survive simply by showing films on television. To impose a levy on the television companies based on films shown on television would be merely to repeat the errors that we had before with the Eady levy. The Eady levy on films shown on cinemas was a mistake, and to extend that principle to the television sector would be an equally grave error.

For those reasons, I urge my hon. and right hon. Friends to vote for the amendment.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Question accordingly agreed to.

Clause 3

Dissolution of National Film Finance Corporation

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. David Trippier): I beg to move amendment No. 6, in page 3, line 18, leave out 'may' and insert 'shall'.

Clause 3 relates to the disposal by the Secretary of State of the assets which will be vested in him on the dissolution of the National Film Finance Corporation. I have on previous occasions outlined the Government's intentions in that respect. Some concern was expressed in Committee that the discretionary nature of the present drafting of the Bill did not impose a sufficient duty on the Secretary of State to ensure that any such property, right or amount would be used for purposes connected with the British film industry.

I accepted the thrust of the argument presented by hon. Members and undertook to table an amendment which would convey the same obligation. Amendment No. 6 is designed to reflect more clearly the Government's intentions in respect of the disposal of the NFFC's assets. I trust that hon. Members will feel that it meets that purpose and that they will support it.

Mr. Gould: The Minister is right to say that he gave the undertaking in Committee. I need say no more than that we are grateful to him for having carried out that undertaking.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Gorst: I beg to move amendment No. 7, in page 3, line 20, at end add—

'provided that he has laid before Parliament the terms and conditions upon which any such arrangements are to be made not less than 28 sitting days before they are to come into effect'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 32, in page 3, line 34, at end insert—

'(3A) The conditions referred to in subsection (3) shall include a condition that the company to which any right may be transferred under that subsection shall transfer to the Secretary of State one special share which entitled the Secretary of State to exercise a right of veto over the transactions of the company if he deems that they fail to satisfy him as to the matters specified in subsection 3*(a)* and (b).'.

Mr. Gorst: The purpose of amendment No. 7 was to ensure that the company known as the son of NFFC was set up on terms that were known in advance to Parliament. The Minister's arrangements were not available to us in Committee in any detail, and many of us felt concerned about that. Indeed, it was only yesterday that those who have taken an active interest received the heads of agreement from the Department.

The amendment was originally intended to ensure that discussion had to take place on Report. It is fair to say that, having seen the heads of agreement, the amendment has a rather more substantial purpose than purely probing. The question that has to be answered is whether the terms are satisfactory from the point of view of protecting the new arrangement for the British film industry from being dissembled, dispersed or in any other way disposed of after a short or medium period.

Our information was sketchy, general and rather unspecific when it should have been precise. It raised, and still raises, a number of unanswered questions. One is still not satisfied that the Secretary of State's powers are as adequate or complete as they should be in order to guarantee the company. Perhaps they are, but not on the evidence so far available. I concede that the Minister has taken a lot of trouble to inform us, but he has not yet succeeded in satisfying us.

I understand from the draft agreement that a new limited partnership will be formed. I understand from my researches that a limited partnership means that the partners will be divided into those who would be called general partners and others who would be called limited partners, the latter contributing to the partnership assets of a specific amount in money or money's worth and enjoying immunity from liability beyond the amount so contributed. However, an essential condition of that immunity is that a limited partner should not take part in the management of the business.

I presume that the purpose of that rather uncommon arrangement is to ensure that the members of the consortium are unable to interfere too much in matters other than the establishment of policy. So far, I would say, so good. But the problem arises that we do not know whether the initial members of the consortium are to be general or limited partners. If they are general partners, they will have an unlimited liability.

It is clear from the heads of agreement that the Government will not in any sense be a general partner, since it is specifically said that only British companies will have that status. Therefore, I understand that if they are general partners, they will have the capacity, first, to have an unlimited liability, but, secondly, to interfere with the activities of the chief executive, about which a great deal of concern was expressed in Committee. When my hon. Friend the Minister enlightens us further on this point, I hope that he will be able to say exactly what will be the status of the various partners.

Another aspect of limited partnership puzzles me. The 1907 Act, which formed that arrangement, stipulated that there could be not more than 20 partners in such an arrangement, unless they were in surveying, auctioneering, valuing, estate agency, land agency and estate management, which clearly none of the partners is or is likely to be. Therefore, one foresees that the arrangement will be curtailed to not more than 20 participants within one consortium. Can my hon. Friend confirm that or tell me that I am wrong? If he confirms that, will he say why it is to be so severely curtailed? Those are the questions that seem immediately to occur to me on the structure that is proposed.

Various options are open to us in deciding whether to press the amendment. We can give the Secretary of State the benefit of the doubt; we can pass the Bill unamended and wait and see how history works itself out; we can write amendment No. 7 into the Bill so that the Secretary of State must tell Parliament more each year or whenever anything is happening and he is coming to an arrangement; or we can insist on amendment No. 32, which has been tabled by the Opposition, about which we had a great deal of discussion in Committee and in which many of my hon. Friends were sympathetically interested. In other words, we can remain sceptical about the Secretary of State's arrangements and demand that he has a fall-back position in the shape of a special share.

My preference would not be for the first of those three options—to give the Secretary of State the benefit of the doubt—not because I do not trust him, but because, in effect, it is unlikely that the arrangement which is being entered into can be judged in fewer than three years or more probably in five.

7.30 pm

We cannot foretell either the market or what any future Government might feel disposed to do about this arrangement. Therefore, I believe that we should have something far more concrete available to the House for monitoring the position.

I prefer a combination of my amendment and amendment No. 32, which the Opposition have tabled. The truth of the matter — and we went into this in considerable detail on the last group of amendments—is that, because the industry still operates in an unfree, fettered market, the duopoly will continue and the menace of the kid glove, the unspoken agreement, will persist. Therefore, I believe that Parliament's job is to act as some form of long-stop referee.

I hope that my hon. Friend will now be in a position to answer some of the questions, many more of which arise, on the document which he has given to us. I am sure the House will want to be satisfied about those, too, but I shall not delay it any further by going into that kind of detail.

Mr. Gould: Like the hon. Member for Hendon, North (Mr. Gorst), I am grateful to the Minister for his sending to each member of the Committee, I believe, a copy of the draft memorandum of understanding with the new consortium. That has been extremely helpful. It gives us some more or less tangible idea as to how the Minister's mind is working. However, it leaves us with some difficulties because it is obviously still a draft memorandum and it fails to satisfy at least the Opposition on what is perhaps our central concern — that there should be something, preferably in the Bill, to enable the House to monitor the activities of the consortium and how they are likely to affect the future of the film industry. The difficulty is that the draft agreement, which may in the fullness of time become a legally binding contract, is likely to operate outside the attention of Members of the House.

The draft agreement goes some way, in intention if not in mechanism, to meet some of the points made in Committee. It suggests, although we have yet to see the draft specification for the chief executive's role, that the Government and the consortium recognise the importance of some independence on its part. We have perhaps less reason to be pleased about the extent to which the memorandum recognises that the cultural significance and future of the industry as a whole should also weigh in the considerations of the consortium. In other words, it should be not just the commercial interests of that particular group of companies which should determine its decisions and actions.

One of the problems here is that, as the statement issued by the six constituent bodies of the industry points out, even as the draft memorandum stands, the consortium may exist solely or at least principally to serve the commercial interests of the constituent parts and have very little to do with the future of the industry. For example, that statement — which I again commend to the attention of the Minister—raises the possibility that the constituent parts of the consortium may see it simply as a means of sharing the risk in projects in which they may have lost faith. They will be able to lay off the risk by handing it over to the consortium. If they entrust a particular project to the consortium and find that it has exceeded their expectations, the danger is that they may poach on the consortium and draw the project back into their own grasp. There is very little in the draft memorandum, as we see it at present, to explain how these various difficulties are to be avoided and reduced.

I believe that we still have not resolved the fundamental problem — that the Government are intent on handing over both the resources and the responsibilities in this area to a private firm, whereas hitherto many people have considered that, if there is to be an injection of public money, such responsibilities should be undertaken by an institution in which the public interest is at least represented in some way or other.

One way of achieving that, as the hon. Member for Hendon, North explained, is to ensure that at some point those matters are brought to the Floor of the House. I believe that his amendment would to some degree achieve that objective. I am entirely in agreement with him that some such mechanism for public and parliamentary accountability ought to be put in place.

There is a whole range of further anxieties. I shall not weary the House by rehearsing them all, because many of them were adequately covered in Committee. However, I single out the very short-term nature of the obligation being entered into by the consortium. I am extremely concerned about what might happen if, after three years, the consortium simply said it had not worked and its members proposed to withdraw. We need further assurances from the Minister as to what the Government would do. Who would own the property at present in the hands of the National Film Finance Corporation? Does he recognise that it is in every sense public property — property that has arisen by virtue of a levy, property that belongs to the industry as a whole? Can he give us an assurance that, even if the consortium for one reason or another fails, the Government's support for and interest in the industry will continue and that that property belonging to the industry will continue to be devoted to the purposes of the industry?

I wish to reinforce the questions asked by the hon. Member for Hendon, North about that interesting creature, the limited partnership. I understand that, for some purposes at any rate, this topic will arise on a later group of amendments, but it might be just as well if the Minister could answer some of these questions now. The point that I am particularly interested in—the answer to which I could perhaps have discovered if I had looked up the 1907 Act but with which I think he may be able to provide me —is to what extent the partners can exchange or change roles. Can someone who has been a limited partner suddenly decide to become a general partner and vice versa? Who is to be what? What is the purpose of this distinction in this case? Why has this particular mechanism been set up?

I turn now to amendment No. 32, which suggests that, before transferring what is in effect public property to this new consortium, the Minister should make it a condition that something in the nature of a golden share be transferred to the Government. I find it hard to believe that the Minister could object to that in principle, since he must know that his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has heartily and strongly endorsed the whole concept of the golden share in defending his actions in selling off shares in British Aerospace. In a letter, which has been published, he has made a powerful defence of this whole mechanism. It is, of course, a device which is now used by the Government in a whole range of privatised enterprises — Cable and Wireless, Amersham International, Jaguar, Britoil, Enterprise Oil, British Telecom and British Aerospace. It is a very long list. I cannot believe that there could be any objection in principle to something which has been sanctified by Government practice. Therefore, I think the Minister will have to explain why, if in all those other cases a golden share was a proper means of protecting the public interest, for some reason in this case, which in its nature and all its central aspects is on all fours with the others, it is not considered appropriate.

The NFCC was important to the future of the film industry, not just because it was the means by which money was made available to the industry. The corporation did an excellent job in deciding how that money should be spent. Many excellent films — more recently, "Another Country" is a good example — depended for their production on money provided through the NFFC.

The real importance of the NFFC was not just as a conduit for money, but as a statement by the Government, and by the community at large through the Government, that they had a stake and interest in the future of the British film industry.

My fear about what is proposed in the Bill is that that statement of support will be lost, and that, unless we can somehow inject into the film industry that element of public interest and accountability, the industry will be left to go its own way, and its own way may be a downward spiral.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, North (Mr. Gorst) and the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) for responding with some modified enthusiasm for the draft heads of agreement which I circulated to members of the Committee. Even if hon. Members do not agree with them entirely—and even if they do not go as far as they would have wished—they at least clarify some of the questions that were raised in Committee. This amendment is a convenient opportunity to enlarge on some of the points that could not be answered then.

My purpose in putting the draft heads of agreement before members of the Committee was to try to reassure them, for I recognised the legitimacy of the point that the hon. Member for Dagenham made about wanting to be assured that this was not just a commercial organisation but a body which would have regard to the cultural aspects of film making and would be a force towards underpinning that important aspect of our cultural life. The provisions of the draft heads of agreement do just that.

I do not wish to weary the House, but in addition to answering the questions that have been put to me I shall comment on the chief executive, the chairman and the role of Government director, points which were raised in Committee.

The principal participants in the "son of NFFC" announced on 25 January the details which we are now discussing. As I pointed out earlier, they have decided to call the new body the British Screen Finance Consortium. It will be structured as a limited partnership, initially comprising the four organisations already identified—Channel 4, Rank, Thorn-EMI and members of the British Videogram Association — together with a general partner. This general partner will be a new limited liability company to be owned jointly by the limited partners and will undertake the management of the business.

The company will have a board on which the major investors, together with the Government, will be represented. The main functions of the board will be limited to the definition of the parameters within which the chief executive will make all major editorial and investment decisions.

I was asked about the limit of 20 in the limited partnership under the 1907 Act. This can be enlarged by order of the Secretary of State, and an application for such an order would be favourably considered.

The partners could, by agreement at some future date, form themselves into a company. The Bill—which will, we hope, be amended in our proceedings later tonight—preserves flexibility for the "son of NFFC" to be a partnership or a company.

Hon. Members also wanted to know about the chief executive. At one point it was even suggested that the chief executive should be independently appointed. That would be difficult to reconcile with the reality that we are discussing a principal employee of a private company, albeit a private company in which there will be strong Government involvement and continuing Government interest and support.

I recognise the sincere concern that was expressed that the chief executive might be biased or simply an extension of the interests of the various partners in the consortium. I have been given assurances by the partners. The chief executive's role will be to plan, direct and co-ordinate the operations of the company within the framework of policies established by the board of directors so as to ensure both that the company's objectives are achieved and that the company fulfils its responsibilities.

In practical terms, the chief executive is likely to be the ultimate decision-maker of whether to support particular films. It would be silly to assert that the chief executive will be independent in the sense of not being accountable or being wholly without restrictions on his authority or judgment.

I know that none of the partners wishes to exercise day-to-day supervision and that, within broad guidelines, the chief executive will be free to make his or her own commercial and artistic judgments. There will, within a few days, be advertisements for the recruitment of the chief executive.

Hon. Members were also interested in the role of the chairman of the management company of the British Screen Finance Consortium. His appointment is to be subject to Government approval. In broad terms, the chairman will be expected to set the policies of the company and support the chief executive and, in particular, he will need to ensure that the company's objectives, policies, plans, organisation and external results satisfy the interests of the shareholders.

He will also want to ensure that the operations of the company are carried out in a manner that respects the interests of the recipients of the loans and the film community at large. In addition, I would expect him to keep in mind the terms of the contractual relationship with the Government and the need for responsible stewardship of the assets contained in the portfolio.

Lest, when I referred to the interests of shareholders, I detected from Opposition Members a frisson, they will recall what I said about dividends not being expected in the first three years. I hope, therefore, that before they get too alarmed over my statement they will bear in mind what I said in Committee.

The question of the director to be nominated by the Government was raised in particular by my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, North. It goes without saying that the Government director, like all directors under common law and the Companies Act, must have general responsibilities to the BSFC management company for the control and management of its business. In common with Government nominee directors on the boards of other private sector companies, he will not be a delegate on the board on which he serves. His duties as a director are owed to the management company, but he will have further responsibilities stemming from the fact that the Government have a special contractual and financial relationship with the consortium and will therefore need to take special interest in the consortium's affairs.

We regard the chairman as the principal point of contact in our discussions on the consortium's performance and strategy, but we shall on occasion seek the opinion of the Government director on these and similar matters. For his part, the Government director will seek to ensure that the Government are informed promptly of any significant developments of interest to us, whether as the providers of finance or more generally in the way of the Government having an interest in the film industry. In short, the director will be the Government's watchdog in the sense of seeking to ensure that the terms on which the Government have agreed to fund the consortium are observed.

The hon. Member for Dagenham referred to monitoring. I have been outlining how we shall be monitoring through the Government director. I take his point about Parliament's role and the need for reporting to the House. I hope that I shall be able to respond constructively and favourably to a later amendment which was tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, North. However, the amendment is rather ambiguous and much depends on what my hon. Friend thinks it means. I accept that there should be some monitoring by Parliament and some reporting to Parliament of what has been happening. I shall try to respond in a helpful manner to my hon. Friend and his amendment.

I turn to the discussions that have been taking place with a view to the contractual arrangements with the consortium. Obviously, until the partnership is formed, it will not be possible for the Government to make a contract with it. However, in our discussions with the prospective partners we have reached agreement on what the contract is likely to contain. Indeed, hon. Members have a copy of the document. The document, of necessity, is no more than a statement of intent at this stage, but it represents the agreed intentions of the four participants and the Government and it has been initialled by both sides. I shall draw attention to its salient points.

First, the Secretary of State agrees to license to the consortium the portfolio of the NFFC's rights and interests in films. The hon. Member for Dagenham asked what would happen to the assets and the answer is that they are licensed. In effect, they are on loan. If anything went wrong with the consortium, or if we felt that it was not doing what was in the interests of the British film industry, the Government would be able to retrieve the assets. As the House knows, we shall also make available £1·5 million for five years. That is a commitment that gives some security for the future. It is a commitment by the Government to continue supporting the organisation for five years.

Mr. Brinton: Will my hon. Friend confirm that the £1·5 million that has been offered by the Government for five years will not become involved in taxation? Will he address some of the money for use in investment?

Mr. Lamont: The money will be made available by loans to the consortium. We envisaged originally that the money would be made available by grant, but it will be made available by loan at the request of the partners. They see that as the most convenient arrangement for them for tax purposes. These amounts, which will take the form of loans, will be drawn down only against need and will be used wholly for investment in British films and the reasonable operating costs of the consortium. For its part the consortium will discharge, from funds set aside by the NFFC and transferred by the Secretary of State to the consortium, forward commitments agreed by the NFFC and outstanding upon its dissolution. The consortium proposes to obtain from its members at least £1·1 million a year for three years. The initial members do not envisage that any dividends will be paid during the first three years.

The structure and organisation of the new body will be subject to the approval of the Secretary of State. Future entrants to the consortium are welcomed on matching terms provided that they are bound by the agreed arrangements. The Secretary of State and each full member of the consortium will be entitled to representation on the board and the Secretary of State will also have the right to approve the chairman. I repeat what I said in Committee, which was that we see this as a dynamic and growing body. We would welcome other participants in it and that could be a means by which more finance will be channelled for the benefit of the industry.

The Government have received representations that the commitment of the NFFC to the support of short films should not be allowed to die when the NFFC is dissolved. In the past the Eady levy has provided a valuable, if somewhat artificial, incentive for the distribution of short films to cinemas. The demise of the levy will therefore remove what remains of that incentive. Yet it is widely, if not universally, recognised that the short film—the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) is interested in this—is the ideal nursery or proving ground for new talent, be it producers, directors or whatever. Moreover, there is still a place in the cinema programme for a well made short. It has been suggested to us that it is a natural extension of some of the project development activities which the development scheme is intended to foster. We have therefore decided to enlarge the scope of the scheme to embrace the financial support of the production of shorts. Amendments for that purpose have been tabled.

Secondly, both the consortium and the Government recognise the concern that is expressed in some quarters that the performance of this activity by the consortium might be thought to work to the disadvantage of the independent film maker. It was in recognition of that concern that we said that we intended to make it a condition of the agency contract that the consortium must use independent consultants with no financial interest in the consortium or its component companies.

The heads of agreement conclude with a number of safeguards. First, the management company of the consortium must be a British company as that is defined in the Bill. The defintion is based on previous legislation. Secondly, the members of the consortium may withdraw but may not dispose of their interests except with the approval of the Secretary of State and all the other members of the consortium. Thirdly, there are conditions on the exploitation of the NFFC portfolio, and any revenues generated from the portfolio must be used for investment in British films. Fourthly, the Secretary of State may withdraw the licence if the consortium is wound up or if he is not satisfied that the funds that he has made available are being invested in British films.

I think that the heads of agreement take account of the various points raised by hon. Members at earlier stages of the debate. However, it has been suggested that the contract should oblige the consortium to repay moneys advanced if the company failed to honour its commitments. At that time it was assumed that the Government's contribution, as I said in response to my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Brinton), would probably take the form of grants. This matter has not been settled but it seems likelier that the consortium would prefer to receive support in the form of loans. My Department will certainly be monitoring the use made of the portfolio and the Government's contribution, and under the contract it would be open to the Government to sue for repayment of grants. Loans could be repaid if they were misapplied in any way.

Although we have debated this matter and I have considered it, I am not persuaded that it would be reasonable to go further by requiring the repayment of previous contributions that have been properly applied. In finalising the contractural details, we shall ensure that any sums made available by way of grant or loan which are not applied for the purposes intended shall be immediately recoverable.

The discussions that we have had with the respective partners have laid a foundation for a contract that should satisfy any fair-minded observer that there are proper and reasonable safeguards for the NFFC's assets and that public money is given to this body so that we can further the interests of the British film industry. I have tried to build into the agreement the points that worried the Committee.

Mr. Gorst: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister for the considerable further explanation that he has given. It would be difficult to probe further on this occasion, even if further probing were necessary. If further probing is necessary after the industry and others have given more thought to my hon. Friend's statement, clearly the other place will be the best place in which to do that. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment made: No. 8, in page 3, leave out line 21 and insert—

'(2A) Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (2), the Secretary of State may, in pursuance of that subsection—

(a) pay any amount received by him as there mentioned to the British Film Fund Agency for distribution in accordance with section (Final payments by British Film Fund Agency)(1);

(b) arrange for the transfer in accordance with subsection (3) of any right to which that subsection applies.

(3)'.—[Mr. Norman Lamont.]

Mr. Norman Lamont: I beg to move amendment No. 9, in page 3, line 24, after 'company', insert 'or partnership'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 10, 11, 13, 16, 17 and 20.

Mr. Lamont: This series of amendments relates to the concern that not enough is known about the structure of the new body. The participants in that body have agreed that the option of a limited partnership would be preferable to that of a company as envisaged in clause 3(3). We see no reason not to accommodate that preference. We believe that that body can meet the needs of the industry perfectly well. These amendments are, therefore, necessary for that purpose.

The intention is that a limited partnership will be established, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, North (Mr. Gorst) identified with his usual perception, under the Limited Partnerships Act 1907, in which each of the participants will be a limited partner and in which there will be a general partner. The general partner will be formed as a new limited liability company with a nominal share capital owned jointly by the limited partners in their profit-sharing ratios and enjoying only nominal profit-sharing rights.

Although it would be undesirable and unnecessarily restrictive to insist that all the limited partners must be British companies, I believe it is important that the general partner should be a British company, and amendment No. 13 makes provision for this.

These amendments provide a degree of flexibility for the structure of the successor to the NFFC, while continuing to ensure that effective control will remain in British hands. I invite hon. Members to support the amendments.

Mr. Gould: In the previous debate the Minister did not answer some of the questions put by myself and the hon. Member for Hendon, North (Mr. Gorst) about the nature of a limited partnership. Why have the members of the consortium chosen this particular form? Which of them is to be a general partner, and which is to be a limited partner? Is it intended that the members of the consortium should enter a partnership with the limited liability company, or is the partnership to own the company?

Mr. Lamont: I thought that I had given a crystal clear answer. The consortium decided for tax reasons that it preferred to be a partnership. That was done after consultation with, I believe, Coopers and Lybrand about the most suitable vehicle for the members of the consortium.

I thought I had made it clear that the general partner would be responsible for the management of the business. The general partner would be a limited liability company which would be owned by the limited partners.

Mr. Gould: How easily could a limited partner become a general partner and, to some degree, vice versa? Does the Minister have any information on that point?

Mr. Lamont: As far as I know, there is no problem about that. There is the global ceiling of the 20 participants within one consortium to which my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, North referred. That arrangement can be altered. I would not have thought that there was any problem — even if one has 20 participants — about including other people in the general partnership. Other people might decide to join the partnership on different terms. I should have thought that the general partnership could be enlarged to accommodate other people within it. Not everyone will want to put up the same amount of money or to have the same obligations. It may be that the founding partner will remain as the general partner for some time. I have made it clear that we envisage the consortium being a dynamic body which should grow. We hope that it will attract more money.

Mr. Gorst: I had not intended to intervene in the debate, but my hon. Friend the Minister has raised one doubt in my mind. If there were initially a general partner, that would indicate to me that there was a degree of confidence in the future of the operation. However, if there were adverse circumstances, I would be worried about whether the general partner could suddenly turn round and say, "From now on, I want to be a limited partner." If the general partner did that, I would say to myself, "He thinks that this body will go into the red. He wants to limit his liability." Will my hon. Friend comment on that? That is not a possibility which any of us would like to entertain.

Mr. Lamont: I cannot bind people in the way that my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, North implies. He will know—it is written into the heads of agreement—that the consortium has said that it intends that the £1·1 million should be available for three years. That is the limit of the consortium's commitment at the moment. The members of the consortium collectively have said that they intend that that money should be available. We envisage that this body will go on, and we have shown our commitment to it by making it clear that our £1·5 million will be available for five years. I hope that my hon. Friend is reassured by knowing that, after two years, we intend to review the finances of the consortium and how it is working to ascertain whether the arrangements are working precisely as we want them to work for the benefit of the British film industry.

Mr. Gorst: I suspect that the fault is entirely on my side and that the incomprehension rests with me. I had understood that a general partner had an unlimited liability, and that anyone who was a general partner could not limit himself in that way.

Mr. Lamont: No; that is not right, because the general partner will be a limited liability company. To clarify this point precisely with the full benefit of legal advice, I shall write to my hon. Friend and make the position crystal clear.

Mr. Gorst: I should be most grateful if my hon. Friend would do that, because it seems to me that, although the general partner has unlimited liability, it has limited its liability by being a limited company as well.

Mr. Gould: As the point raised by the hon. Member for Hendon, North (Mr. Gorst) is, in essense, the one at which I was driving, will the Minister kindly write to me on it as well?

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall be delighted to do so.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 10, in page 3, line 26, after 'company', insert 'or partnership'.

No. 11, in page 3, line 32, after 'company', insert 'or partnership'.—[Mr. Norman Lamont.]

Mr. Trippier: I beg to move amendment No. 12, in page 3, leave out line 40 and insert—

'(4A) Where in consequence of any such order as is mentioned in subsection (2) any liability of the Corporation becomes vested in the Secretary of State, the Secretary of State may arrange for the liability to be transferred, on such terms as may be agreed between him and the company or partnership, to any British company or partnership in whose case he is satisfied as to the matters mentioned in paragraphs (a) and (b) of subsection (3).

(4B) In this section—'.

During our discussions in Committee, the Government explained that they intended to pass to the British Screen Finance Consortium the unfulfilled and forward commitments made by the NFFC together with any other cash from the NFFC's assets to meet those commitments. That will mean that film makers who have obtained an agreement from the NFFC to support a particular film need not fear that when the NFFC is dissolved they will be left stranded.

The amendment is necessary to enable my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to pass such commitments to the consortium. I believe that the amendment is in the interests of film makers and I invite right hon. and hon. Members to support it.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 13, in page 4, line 6, at end insert—

'"British partnerships" means a limited partnership formed in accordance with the Limited Partnerships Act 1907 in which the general partner within the meaning of the Act, or (as the case may be) each of the general partners, is a British Company;'.—[Mr. Norman Lamont.]

Mr. Trippier: I beg to move amendment No. 14, in page 4, line 8, after 'person', insert 'or combination of persons'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): With this it will be convenient to consider Government amendment No. 15.

Mr. Trippier: The purpose of this amendment is to meet the anxieties expressed by some hon. Members that the current drafting of this part of the Bill is not entirely clear. In clause 3, the definition of "British company" is a company over which

"two or more Commonwealth citizens are together in a position to exercise control".

However, the definition of "control" speaks of the power

"of a person to secure,"

by specified means,

"that the affairs of the company are conducted in accordance with the wishes of that person."

As hon. Members will be aware, the Interpretation Act 1978 provides that the singular includes the plural. Nevertheless, to give assurance to some hon. Members, and for the avoidance of doubt, we propose that the Bill should be amended to include the words "combination of persons". The amendment is helpful in removing any possible element of ambiguity. I invite right hon. and hon. Members to support it.

Mr. Gould: I am grateful to the Minister for tabling the amendment. The Opposition are delighted to welcome it, but it might be just as well if we were to record the part played by the Copinger Society in bringing the point to our attention and having played some role in promoting this monumental change to the Bill.

Mr. Trippier: I am happy to acknowledge the part played by the Copinger Society.

Clause 4

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE BY SECRETARY OF STATE IN CONNECTION WITH THE PRODUCTION OF FILMS

Amendments made: No. 16, in page 4, line 33, after first 'company', insert 'or partnership'.

No. 17, in page 4, line 33, after second 'company', insert 'or partnership.—[Mr. Norman Lamont.]

Mr. Norman Lamont: I beg to move amendment No. 18, in page 4, line 37, after 'person' insert—

'(i)'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With which it will be convenient to consider Government amendments Nos. 19 and 21.

Mr. Lamont: The amendments relate to the point that I made earlier on the heads of agreement about the £500,000 which is to be provided for pre-production work. It will enable a proportion of those funds to be used to part finance short films—films lasting less than 35 minutes.

For the reasons that I have given, I concluded that it would be right for part of that £500,000 that has been set aside to be made available for that purpose. The Government envisaged that about £150,000 a year would be used for that purpose. Using those funds for shorts is not thought likely to be to the disadvantage of any pre-production projects.

I understand that in recent years the National Film Development Fund has spent no more than £200,000 on such projects. I hope that that activity will expand in the future, but I do not believe that there will be problems in keeping within the total budget of £500,000. I do not believe that it is necessary for me to give the House any great detail. The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) has a point, but I believe that this decision will be widely welcomed.

8.15 pm

Mr. Chris Smith: I rise simply and briefly to give a warm welcome to the amendment and to the Government's commitment to this sector of film making. The making of short films, in particular those made by the workshop sector, is one of the most important and growing parts of the industry, in which a great deal of innovation and talent is at present constituted. Therefore, I congratulate the Government on picking up that point and welcome the amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 19, in page 4, line 40, at end insert

'or'

(ii) for any purpose connected with the production of short films.'.

No. 20, in page 4, line 41, after 'company"' insert', "British partnership"'.

No. 21, in page 4, line 42, at end insert

'and "short film" means a relevant film with a total playing time of less than 35 minutes'.—[Mr. Norman Lamont.]

Mr. Gould: I beg to move amendment No. 34, in page 4, line 44, after 'otherwise', insert

'and shall, by way of grant, be not less than £10 million annually'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to consider amendment No. 22, in page 5, line 3, at end add

'and he shall lay before Parliament each year a report giving his reasons for providing or withholding financial assistance under this section'.

Mr. Gould: I shall be brief because much of the ground covered by the amendment has been canvassed in other debates this afternoon and in Committee.

I draw the Minister's attention to the statement issued by the six bodies representing the industry in which they make an interesting and valuable comment. They are worried that the money made available to the new consortium will not be adequate. They point out that it will be approximately £3 million per year and that the intention is that that will enable the consortium — as one understands it from its public statements—to finance up to 10 films per year.

I believe that the objective is to provide 25 or 33 per cent. for each project. That means that each project will be able to attract on average about £300,000 a year. If that is to constitute between one quarter and one third of the total production costs, it means that we are talking about low-budget films—films with a budget of perhaps £1 million or less. In other words, they are films which are essentially meant for television.

The industry is anxious that that money may well be directed into an area which is already more than adequately catered for. We no longer have the benefit of the presence of the hon. Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith). As he said earlier, Channel 4 and the television companies have done a great deal in that sector. It suggests that the money made available to the consortium will not go to that part of the film industry where it will be needed. It will not help, for example, films made for the cinema such as "Another Country", "The Dresser", the oft-cited "Chariots of Fire", "Gandhi", "The Killing Fields", and so on.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) has said on many occasions, that sum will be utterly inadequate to attract into that part of the industry the private finance that is desperately needed. ACTT has instituted a number of inquiries in the City and has said that the answers that it invariably receives are to the effect that approximately £20 million would be required to make investment in films for the cinema viable.

In tabling an amendment which specifies the sum of £10 million only, the House can see that the Opposition's suggestions are modest. That modesty is perhaps not entirely appropriate, given that the financial context in which the industry is likely to operate has been severely turned against it. There is the phasing-out of capital allowances. There is the unhappy decision taken earlier today not to replace the Eady levy. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary has repeatedly reminded us of the business expansion scheme, but that, unfortunately, is simply not suited in many respects to the business of producing films. The hon. Gentleman has offered to talk to the industry about ways in which the scheme could be made more appropriate.

However, many of the financial underpinnings of the industry have been removed. The Government's direct subvention is to take the form of a loan rather than a grant, although we understand the reasons why that is so. Even the £3 million a year that is to be made available to the consortium is likely to be short term, since the obligation is to last only for three years. The assistance is certainly conditional, although, unhappily, that condition seems to have been met this evening. It is to some degree irrelevant in that it strikes at the wrong part of the industry. It is in no sense additional, because the partners in the consortium would spend the money for their own purposes anyway.

There is to be virtually no public money, no recycling mechanism, no tax incentive. No real help is to be provided. The position compares most unfavourably with that in almost every other country that has, or hopes to have, a film industry. As we said on Second Reading, in virtually all the countries where there is a film industry the Government provide the full panoply of aids, incentives, grants and loans. We are simply not doing enough. Indeed, we are hardly doing anything.

I do not hope to evoke any response from the Minister. He is very familiar with the arguments and has not made any suggestion that I regard as adequate. I wish only to ensure that the industry is aware that the Opposition understand its continuing need for such financial assistance.

Grouped with amendment No. 34 is amendment No. 22 in the name of the hon. Member for Hendon, North (Mr. Gorst). Judging from some of his earlier remarks, I believe that the Minister may be able to offer slightly more comfort to the hon. Gentleman than to us.

Mr. Gorst: I endorse the sentiments expressed by the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould). At the heart of our discussions on the Bill, both upstairs and downstairs, is a question. Given that the film industry needs money, where is that money to come from? Will the private sector provide enough? Should the public sector also be involved? The hon. Member for Dagenham was right to argue yet again that the Government should invest more in the industry than they have so far offered to do.

The purpose of my amendment is, in a way, to provide a halfway house between what the hon. Member for Dagenham proposes and the current position of the Government. If accepted in the present or in some similar wording, it would enable Parliament to question the Government of the day about the level of the financial support that they were providing for the film industry. I hope that the Government will accept that we should be given that information annually. They have frequently told us that everything looks rosy. They say that they have done enough. They say that private capital can now take over and that the showing of films on cable and satellite television, the BBC and ITV will provide all that the film industry could reasonably expect. I believe that Parliament will need running proof that that optimistic prediction—which we all hope will be fulfilled—was correct. The amendment will give Parliament a chance to check and assess whether the Government's optimism was justified.

Under the Bill there will, I believe, be no official reports from the film industry to Parliament such as the Cinematograph Films Council's annual report. It would not be unreasonable to ask that we should have some means of receiving information about the progress of the industry.

What do the Government have to fear? If their assessment is correct, and if they have nothing to hide, they have nothing to fear. They should welcome the chance to emphasise the correctness of their predictions. If, on the other hand, those predictions were wrong, Parliament would have a timely opportunity to demand that the film industry should be saved before it is scuppered.

Mr. Ashdown: I shall not rehearse all the arguments that the Minister will have heard in Committee and which have been referred to again by the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) and the hon. Member for Hendon, North (Mr. Gorst). In our view, the Government's current proposal of a loan of £1·5 million over three years is wholly inadequate to meet the needs of the industry as they have been clearly expressed not only by the industry but by other outside bodies. By itself, that sum of money might fund perhaps one medium-budget film. A flourishing industry such as exists at present and such as we should be aiming to retain should make perhaps 12 features and six shorts a year. Of course the Government should not provide all the money, or even the substantial part of it. However, they should provide enough money to ensure stability in the industry. It is our view that, unless such a sum is dedicated to providing a stable base, there is a real danger that the industry will collapse or that, in its present form, will vanish.

A sum of the order of £10 million would be, as the hon. Member for Dagenham said, fairly modest in comparison with what are believed to be the real needs of the industry, but it would provide an element of predictability on which success could be built.

The Government have nothing to lose. Their predictions may be proved to be right. If they are proved to be wrong, we shall have the chance to put things right before it is too late. If there is a vote, therefore, we shall vote in favour of the amendment.

Bearing in mind the comments of the hon. Member for Hendon, North, I wonder why the Minister has decided not to go ahead. The weight of evidence shows that all other countries do much more to foster their film industries than the hon. Gentleman proposes that we should do. Why does the hon. Gentleman believe that he is right when the body of experience suggests otherwise? I hope that he will address himself to that question.

Mr. Chris Smith: I do not want to repeat the arguments that have been made by my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) and others, but I fully endorse their views about the inadequacy of the funding arrangements that the Government are making through the new company that is to replace the NFFC. I should like to concentrate on an issue that is marginal to the amendment but which concerns the Government's financial arrangements for the future of the industry—the future funding of the National Film and Television School.

I hope that the Minister can give us some assurances about the funding of the school. He will recall that, in Committee, I asked several questions about the funding arrangements of the school. The matter was followed up by the director of the school in a long and detailed letter to the Minister of 11 January 1985. In that letter, the director concentrated on one crucial issue. In the arrangements that the Minister envisages, there is a gap between the £600,000 from the cinemas and the two television companies and what is presently provided by the television companies.

8.30 pm

The director has asked whether the £200,000 which the BBC and ITV give the school is a replacement for their existing contribution or whether it is additional money. If it is only a replacement, the school will be about £250,000 short on what it needs to run its existing educational work when the Government's proposed financial arrangements come into effect. That is an extremely important issue for the school, which everyone agrees does valuable work. I hope that the Minister will be able to give us some comfort on that count. If he cannot, we must take a dim view of the Government's financial proposals.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I do not believe that the House wants me to go over all of the arguments that we have had at great length about the funding of the film industry. The money that we are making available for the new consortium will be twice that which was available to the NFFC. It is all very well for the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) to say that that is not enough, but it is twice what was previously available.

I remind the hon. Member for Yeovil, as he was not a member of the Committee, that the Government are providing £1·5 million for five years and an additional £500,000 for five years for project development work. Another £600,000 will come through the portfolio of rights and interests in about 800 films, and the private sector is putting up about £1·1 million annually for three years. The hon. Member for Yeovil says that the money will partly finance only a limited number of films, but the consortium will have twice the resources of the NFFC and it will operate as the NFFC did.

Mr. Ashdown: Is it not temporary, though?

Mr. Lamont: The hon. Gentleman has asked one question and been given an answer. It is no use his altering the question just because he does not like the answer to the first question.

Mr. Ashdown: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Lamont: I am very good at giving way, but the hon. Gentleman ought to listen. The Government are supporting the film industry in other ways, such as by giving £7·5 million annually to the British Film Institute and other money to the British Film Year.

The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) mentioned the National Film and Television School. I agree with him about the excellence of that school and its reputation for producing highly skilled film and television programme makers. He will know that it is supported principally by my noble Friend Lord Gowrie, through the Office of Arts and Libraries. The school's budget of about £1·5 million a year is funded only partly by the Eady levy. In the levy year 1983-84, Eady provided only £500,000 and it will provide £600,000 in the current levy year. I hope that the hon. Member for Yeovil is noting this. The balance came from the Office of Arts and Libraries, which provided £850,000 in 1983-84 and £990,000 in 1984-85—a rise of 13 per cent. this year. The grant will be £1·12 million in 1985-86. That is evidence of the Government's commitment to provide as much support to the school as is possible within the constraints of public expenditure.

The arrangements with the BBC, the independent television association and the Cinematograph Exhibitors Association of Great Britain are only in respect of a replacement for the funding that will be lost on the abolition of the Eady levy. However, the arrangements that have been worked out are more than adequate, as they provide sure funding of £600,000 a year for five years. That gives the school greater advance information about its income than was ever possible when it had to go cap in hand seeking funds from the rapidly declining Eady levy. The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury asked whether the ICTA and BBC contribution would be additional to their existing one of £100,000 a year. The answer is "Yes". I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be assured by that.

The British Screen Finance Consortium, as the successor body to the NFFC, is not the whole story of what is happening in the British film industry. There is also the private market. The hon. Member for Dagenham professes to have grown weary of my reminding him of the £36 million that Goldcrest raised for film making. I need not bore him with that information this time, because I noticed in the newspapers recently that Thorn-EMI is talking of a financial vehicle of some £100 million for film making. It is possible within the tax regime to raise money for film making. I believe that the markets are becoming more responsive and interested in film making. There is also greater awareness in the City. Companies that have a spread of risk and a portfolio of films are finding it possible to raise money.

Mr. Ashdown: The Minister mentioned Goldcrest. We all know that one third of the money that it raised to make "Chariots of Fire" came from tax allowances, which the Government have now abolished. In 1983, the Government also abolished the exhibitors' quota. We are not considering the £10 million in isolation. What the Government are proposing is in line with their abolition of tax allowances and the exhibitors' quota. As to the question that the Minister pretended that he answered earlier, he is now substituting a temporary system for a permanent one.

Mr. Lamont: I have met the managing director of Goldcrest. It would be improper for me to say what happened in our discussions, but I do not believe that the change in the capital allowances regime will make life very difficult for companies such as Goldcrest and Thorn-EMI which are raising larger amounts of money and spreading their risk over a series of films. The evidence shows that they will still be able to raise the money. In privacy many people have said to me that the changes in capital allowances will not have the much-vaunted damage that some people believe. I accept that there is a legitimate concern by independent producers who may have benefited from other people's capital allowances, but these large companies will still be able to thrive and the extra money that we are making available to the son of NFFC will do a lot to encourage British film makers.

Mr. Ashdown: Will the Minister answer "Yes" or "No" to the question whether a third of the money that Goldcrest put into "Chariots of Fire" came from tax allowances which are now abolished?

Mr. Lamont: It is not for me to answer for the internal financial arrangements of Goldcrest. I have told the hon. Gentleman what I believe to be its view about the current regime in which it will operate.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, North tabled amendment No. 22, and I appreciate and understand what led him to do so. However, I cannot accept it in its present form because I am advised that it would require the Secretary of State to lay annual reports before Parliament, which listed all payments made to the British Screen Finance Consortium and also every application received for assistance towards the development of film projects. Because I recognise that there is a case for a statement to Parliament—it would probably be the general wish of the House that information should be made available about the sums advanced by the Government to the consortium, and the operation of the project development scheme—I am prepared to agree that there should be a brief report of these each year. I would certainly arrange for that.

For the reasons that I have given, I should not like to accept the wording of my hon. Friend's amendment.

Mr. Gorst: Will my hon. Friend explain whether he means by that that he will insert some suitable wording into the Bill when it goes to another place, or is it merely a gentleman's undertaking that year by year or at suitable intervals he and his successors will spill the beans to Parliament?

Mr. Lamont: It is just my undertaking to the House that we would give a report each year on the operation of the consortium and the development fund.

Mr. Gould: I am disappointed, though not surprised, that the Minister has not moved on this point. He has heard the arguments on many previous occasions, and has been equally difficult. Since I see little chance of persuading either the Minister or his absent colleagues to accept what I believe is an overwhelming case, I have little option but to accept the small crumbs of comfort offered regarding amendment No. 22 and, to a limited degree, to my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) in respect of the National Film and Television School. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

REPEALS, ETC.

Mr. Trippier: I beg to move amendment No. 23, in page 6, line 1, before 'is' insert 'a film which'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 24.

8.45 pm

Mr. Trippier: The purpose of these amendments is technical. It is to meet the concern expressed by some hon. Members that this part of the Bill is ambiguous and may not achieve the desired result. The use of the past tense might be interpreted as meaning that all new films made after the Bill came into force would not have a 50-year copyright. The effect of the amendments is that all films which are published after the Bill will fall under section 13(3)(b) of the Copyright Act 1956 which provides that in the case of films not registered under part II of the Films Act 1960 copyright shall run for 50 years from the end of the calendar year in which the film was first published.

That brings United Kingdom legislation into line with the Berne convention, which by article 7(2) provides a minimum term of copyright of 50 years from first public showing. The change complies with the recommendation made by the Whitford report on the law of copyright and design 1977 at paragraph 50*(iii)(a)*. These amendments improve and clarify the current drafting in the Bill, and I invite hon. Members to support them.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 24, in page 6, line 2, leave out 'was not so registered' and insert 'any other film'.

Mr. Trippier: I beg to move amendment No. 25, in page 6, line 23, leave out from 'would,' to end of line 24 and insert

'but for the repeal by this Act of the Films Act 1960 and the Films Act 1970, be—'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 26.

Mr. Trippier: The purpose of these amendments is to meet an assurance given during the discussion of the Bill in Committee. I explained that the Government were concerned that film makers who were already making films should not be disadvantaged by the changes to the law proposed by the Bill. One problem which we identified, and which the amendments seek to resolve, concerns films completed after enactment of the Bill but exhibited in a cinema before the Eady levy is abolished by an order made under clause 2(4). On enactment the provisions concerning registration in the Films Acts 1960 to 1980 will be repealed. Thus no film may be registered as a British film after that date. Such a film—there may be many—would thus be deprived of the opportunity to receive any moneys from the final Eady distribution, although it may be shown during the final levy period and achieve a large box office success.

Clause 6(4) as presently drafted provides for films eligible for payment from the Eady fund to be entitled to such payment after the enactment of the Bill. We wish to go further and to extend the provision to include all films which, but for the repeal of the registration provisions in the Films Acts of 1960 to 1980, would have qualified for registration and thus have been entitled to a share of the distribution of the Eady fund. All hon. Members will share our view that this step will give benefit to film makers. I invite the House to support these amendments.

Mr. Gould: Opposition Members are grateful to the Minister for carrying out his undertaking in this way.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 26, in page 6, line 31, leave out from 'repeal' to end of line 32 and insert

'of the said Acts of 1960 and 1970.'.

Mr. Trippier: I beg to move amendment No. 27, in page 6, line 40 at end insert—

'(5A) Where—

(a) a contract for the production or acquisition of a master negative, master tape or master disc of a film has been entered into before the commencement of section 5 of this Act; and

(b) any person, having incurred expenditure in pursuance of the contract (before or after that commencement) on the production or acquisition of the negative, tape or disc, makes an application under paragraph 2 of Schedule 1 to this Act with respect to it, that person may by notice in writing require that the question whether the negative, tape or disc ought to be certified as a qualifying film, tape or disc for the purposes of section 72 of the Finance Act 1982 shall be determined by the Secretary of State in accordance with the law in force immediately before the commencement of section 5 in like manner as if his application had been a request for certification made under section 72(8).

Any expression used in this subsection has the same meaning as it has in paragraph 2(1) of Schedule 1 to this Act.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 28 and 29.

Mr. Trippier: The purpose of these amendments is to fulfil an assurance given during our discussions in Committee to introduce a transitional provision to cover films completed after the enactment of the Bill but where the contract for the making of the film was entered into before the Bill came fully into force.

We are concerned to avoid any disadvantage or hardship that might be caused by the timing of the Bill. The amendment is therefore drafted to cover the circumstances of a film that would have been entitled to certification and so to tax relief under section 72 of the Finance Act 1982 if it had been completed before the Bill became law but is in fact completed after the Bill is enacted and cannot meet the criteria in schedule 1 and so is not eligible for certification.

There will be few cases, if any, where that may happen, because the criteria in schedule 1 are generally similar to those under the existing law. However, an instance could arise in relation to paragraph 5(1)(c) of the schedule, which provides that a film should be excluded from entitlement to certification if more than 20 per cent. of the photographs taken or sound recordings made were made outside the United Kingdom. Under existing law such films are eligible as British films to reduced payments from the Eady fund, but under paragraph 5(1)(c) of schedule 1 they will no longer be regarded as British films and will not be entitled to the benefit of United Kingdom tax allowances.

The amendment is needed to cater for such rare but possible circumstances. It provides that, where a contract for the production or acquisition of a film is entered into before the Bill is in force in its entirety, the maker or acquirer of the film may opt for certification for tax relief to be based either on the old law or on schedule 1 to the Bill. The amendment makes clause 6(7) unnecessary and, as indicated in Committee, it can be removed. Hon. Members on both sides of the House will wish to ensure that, in the circumstances I have outlined, film makers do not suffer financial disadvantages as a result of the enactment of the Bill, and I therefore invite them to support the amendments.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 28, in page 7, line 1, leave out subsection (7).—[Mr. Trippier.]

Clause 7

SHORT TITLE, COMMENCEMENT AND EXTENT

Amendment made: No. 29, in page 7, line 13, at end insert 'and (5A)'.—[Mr. Trippier.]

Schedule 1

CERTIFICATION FOR PURPOSES OF SECTION 72 OF FINANCE ACT 1982 IN CASE OF BRITISH FILMS

Mr. Trippier: I beg to move amendment No. 30, in page 8, line 24, at end insert—

'"sound recording" means a sound recording which is either an original recording or a re-recording;'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 31.

Mr. Trippier: The amendments are designed to allay anxieties expressed in Committee that the omission of the word "re-recording" from schedule 1 could leave a loophole in deciding the eligibility of films as British. As some hon. Members will be aware, in film production many scenes are shot in film studios. In smaller studios it is usual for the sound for each scene to be recorded at the same time as the photographs are taken, such studios being designed and equipped specifically to allow that, but on large studio sets—for example, those used in James Bond films—it is impossible to take high quality sound recordings synchronously with the photography. A recording is made, but only as a guide for later use.

Once a film has been edited into near-final form, it is taken to a specialist sound studio where a new sound recording is constructed, using the original actors speaking while watching their lips move on a monitor screen, and with special effects engineers adding background noises —these are visions of scenes to come when the House of Commons is televised — such as storms, gunfire and footsteps. That process is known in the industry as re-recording, and is distinct from recordings taken when photography is done.

There have been some problems of definition in this area, in that although makers of British films have had to comply with the rules on labour and studio use, re-recording sound was not mentioned in the rules, and therefore a film producer could undertake re-recording in a foreign sound studio with foreign labour and with no adverse effect on the film's eligibility as British.

In Committee the view was expressed that the word "re-recording" should be included in the Bill to make it clear that that loophole would be plugged. I said then that the reference in the schedule to recording sound covered re-recording, but that I was content for it to be made clear, and the Bill was amended accordingly. However, the location of that amendment is defective, because it relates only to a specific part of the schedule—paragraph 1(2) —not to the entire schedule. Therefore, we have tabled an amendment which we believe not only meets the concern expressed by hon. Members in Committee, especially my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Brinton), but further improves schedule 1. I invite hon. Members to accept the amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 31, in page 8, line 32, leave out '(which shall be deemed to include re-recordings)'.—[Mr. Trippier.]

8.52 pm

Mr. Norman Lamont: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

It is a sad reflection that in the brief period of six months since the White Paper was published at least 18 cinemas, with a total of 36 screens, will have closed. An important part of the Bill's provisions was to end the Eady levy as soon as possible, because the health of the cinema industry is vital to the health of the film production industry.

The Bill will lift from the distribution and exhibition sectors a raft of controls and regulations which are now out of date. It is unlikely that any steps open to the Government could reverse the trend overnight and bring back the enormous cinema audiences of the 1950s, but in abolishing registration, licensing and the quota the Bill will at least remove an unwanted and useless financial and administrative burden.

More positively, the Government support the film industry's initiative in the forthcoming British Film Year. This year is intended not as an exercise in nostalgia but as a celebration of the modern British film industry. My hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) reminded us that, as part of British Film Year, several companies will modernise and invest some of their cinemas. Such steps are vital if we are to get people back to the cinema.

Another measure that is extremely important in relation to the cinema industry, and thus to the film industry, has not featured in our debate today, but I believe that the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) recognises as important the Government's plans to carry out an experiment to investigate the effects of relaxing the barring arrangements which many independent cinemas claim deprive them of fair access to profitable films. As I said earlier, the hon. Gentleman might ask, why have we not gone further and made an order covering the entire country? We must take into account the precarious position of the cinema industry, and I hope he agrees that an experiment is the sensible way forward. I agree entirely with the point that he made in Committee that competition in the cinema is important. Had there been greater competition 15 or 20 years ago, the industry might not have so many problems today. I shall watch the outcome of the experiment with great interest.

The Eady mechanism used to make a substantial contribution to film production, but those days are long gone. The amounts going to British film makers fell from £4·6 million to £2·7 million in 1982-83, and were almost certainly less in 1983-84. In short, as a general production support, the Eady levy has shrunk into minor significance. That does not mean that the pool of available funds for production in Britain has shrunk in the same way. New names have appeared. Channel 4, with its programme of financing films intended for cinema and television showings, now invests £8 million a year in film production. The video sector, which for much of its history was the beneficiary of decades of film making, is beginning to face the need to invest in new products.

"theatrical features were produced in the United Kingdom or made by British crews . . . This is 11 films more than in 1983 and relects the continuing buoyant state of the United Kingdom film industry."

Those are not my words; they come from "Screen International", one of the leading trade journals. The article, which appeared just before Christmas, continues:

"This film making activity represents production investments of over £200 million compared to the £180 million in 1983."

To those who say that those achievements were due to capital allowances or to the effect of the dollar exchange rate, I would pray in aid some of the recent attempts to raise finance for production by Goldcrest and Thorn-EMI. It has been demonstrated clearly that money can be raised in the market for British films. Nevertheless, during today's debate there have been calls for injections of further financial aid to the film industry, either of taxpayers' money or by way of a levy, which is simply a tax by another name. Of course, we recognise that there is an area of film making which is as unlikely to be self-supporting as are ballet, opera, or any of the activities that contribute to the cultural life of Britain. That is why my noble Friend the Minister for the Arts supports film production through the British Film Institute.

It is against that background—the support that we are giving to the commercial sector and the neo-commercial sector through the new consortium that we are supporting and the support that is given by my noble Friend the Minister for Arts — that on the one hand we have rejected the demands of those who advocate general support for the production industry and on the other have considered the needs of those activities which have until now been funded by the Eady levy. The first of these was the British Film Institute production board. Here the Government have enforced the recommendation of the Cinematograph Films Council, but in this final year of the levy the BFI should receive out of the levy a discretionary payment equivalent to three times its expectation based on the recent past. This will give a breathing space to the BFI to find an alternative source to make up for the former Eady contribution. Its main funding will, of course, continue to come from my noble Friend.

The second activity for which discretionary payments from the Eady levy have been made is the National Film and Television School, to which the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) referred earlier. I gave him an assurance on the specific question that he put to me. I know, of course, that the school has reservations about the adequacy of its future funding. I am considering its position in the light of a meeting that I had the other day with the school's director. As I explained in reply to the earlier amendment, I believe that the £600,000 that has been made available will give it a degree of security.

Thirdly, and most important, the Government have heeded the arguments of those who pressed the case of the National Film Finance Corporation. Here, it is said, we are talking about the risky end of the commercial sector, the young and untried talent making the low and modest budget feature films. It is a measure of the Government's recognition of the NFFC's unique importance that we have been extremely careful to find a way of securing its functions when its means of support vanish with the demise of the Eady levy. I believe that the arrangements that we are making with its successor, the British Screen Finance Consortium, offer an excellent prospect of carrying on the traditions of the NFFC. That is what the Government tried to enshrine in the heads of agreement that we placed before the Committee. We tried to build in safeguards to ensure that Government funding will be used in conjunction with the private sector to support new talent, and to encourage the development of young producers in the country. I believe that all the partners in the new consortium are dedicated to that same purpose.

The Bill does not, of course, solve all the problems that confront the film industry, but sweeping away the controls and enabling the cinemas to be realeased from the Eady levy is, I think everybody will agree, urgently needed. At the same time, the transition to the new consortium will provide a means of concentrating Government assistance to the commercial film industry where it is needed. I believe that that new body, based on the memorandum that we have examined today, will carry on those traditions and contribute to the unique film industry that we have in this country and which we very much want to maintain.

Mr. Gould: We stand on the threshold of British Film Year, as the Minister said. British Film Year is meant to be a celebration of British film, but I believe that the Bill means that those celebrations must be muted and that the prospects for the industry are worse than they need have been.

The Bill is a missed opportunity. I am afraid that its deficiencies have been exacerbated by the decision taken earlier to remove the levy on television companies. The abolition of the Eady levy, as the Minister rightly says, was the agreed starting point for the Bill. I think that nobody disputes that the Eady levy has had its day. We are sad, however, because the abolition of the levy could have been used as an opportunity to put the industry on a new long-term and sound footing.

I believe that instead the Government have used that point as a pretext for dismantling, largely on ideological grounds, the structures of financial and institutional support which have so far kept the British film industry alive and kicking. The difficulty is that the risks which now stand in the way as a result of the Bill may well prove to be fatal. I trust that that will not be so. If the industry survives those risks and we still have a British film industry, it may be for a returning Labour Government to remove the risks and create the climate in which the industry can survive and prosper.

9.5 pm

Mr. Gorst: I have asked myself what sort of Bill we have been spawning, and I am sorry to have to say that I believe that it is now devoid of any meaningful financial provision for films, having suffered a debilitating hysterectomy earlier this afternoon. It leaves the future of the industry to a mixture of optimistic and pious predictions by my hon. Friend the Minister.

The original parents of the measure have long since divorced themselves from the responsibility of the upbringing of their progeny, and the new foster parents —in the shape of my hon. Friend—have proved well-meaning and most courteous in replying to all our inquiries. However, in the purely political sense, I have to say that I believe that they have shown themselves to be impotent to make adequate provision for their recently acquired charge, the British film industry.

Therefore, I cannot welcome the Bill, now in its, so to speak, polished form, with anything more enthusiastic than a whimper and expressions of regret and doubt. I believe that the Government should ponder upon the implications of their attitude. The film industry in this country is not a weakling art form appealing to an impecunious elite; it has cultural aspects that justify national support, partly because it enhances the understanding of our way of life overseas and partly because it communicates in a manner and with a force that can be not only breathtaking and entertaining but economically profitable.

Throughout the centuries, various geniuses of music, painting, opera and ballet have come to expect—and the nation that has housed them has accepted the responsibility —the nation to act as a patron of those arts. There is no substitute in the commercial world for the patronage of the state in those areas. The film industry blends commerce, communication and culture and is, in my view, entitled to expect similar treatment.

It seems that with the Bill the Government are abandoning the industry to the vagaries and uncertainties of an artificially fettered market. Indeed, they are also denying it fair access to the sustenance of multi-million audiences. That is what the Government seem to be doing through their policies enshrined in the Bill.

However, I conclude by hoping profoundly that every negative word that I have uttered, every critical thought that I have spoken, and every doubtful prediction that I have postulated will be disproved by events and will be totally untrue. I hope that I shall be wrong and that the optimistic Ministers who people the Government Front Bench will be resoundingly vindicated by the great benefit that their actions will have bestowed upon a valuable and talented British film industry.

9.9 pm

Mr. Ashdown: To use the words used by the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould), this is another in the catalogue of the Government's lost opportunities. The Government are capable of correctly assessing and analysing some of the ills at the heart of Britain, but then come up with an answer that is so ideologically dominated that it is inappropriate. The Minister may shake his head, but he has heard the same message as effectively from Conservative Benches as he has from Opposition Benches. Even if he takes no account of what we say, perhaps he will take account of his hon. Friends, who have been saying the same thing consistently.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The only thing at which I was shaking my head, which I have done consistently and I hope for the last time, was the latter point. We may have got this right or wrong, but we have not been motivated by ideology. We had to deal with the Eady levy, and when the Eady levy ended we had to reconstruct the NFFC. Our motive is dominated by responding to this situation.

Mr. Ashdown: I hear what the Minister says, and, having debated with him before, I will take it at face value. However, that is the only logical conclusion that some of us, and perhaps some Conservative Members, can come to when we regard the opportunities open to the Government and the extraordinarily illogical way that they have gone about them. As I have not found any logic in the Government's system, I can only come to the conclusion that there must be other driving forces. Perhaps the Minister will forgive me for such a mean thought, which persists in my breast.

The Minister is right to assess that the support structure for the industry is in need of reform, and he is right to say that the Eady levy needs to be replaced by a new mechanism. However, the Government's chosen mechanism will not lay down the basis for a new, long-term support structure within which the industry can grow, but will do something different. The Government have made funding of the industry the prey of a market place in which there are only two buyers—the television companies. In the end, whatever they may be doing now, they are bound to operate, whether formally or informally, in a way that will diminish the fair price that they pay for the goods that the film industry has to offer.

The Minister accepted that this is an imperfect market place and that the job of the market place is to determine demand and so allow things to develop in accordance with demand. However, he has turned down a mechanism that would have compensated, and would have provided a levy to the film industry based on the demands of the public. I thought that that was what the Government were all about.

Unhappily, the Bill cannot even be taken in isolation. It is the third in a series of body blows administered to the industry. In 1983 came the abolition of exhibitors' quotas, then last year the end of tax allowances, and now a Bill that takes away an albeit inadequate system of support and replaces it with nothing effective.

It is a supreme irony, as other hon. Members have said, that in British Film Year the Government have laid down the basis for a bleak and uncertain future for the industry. The industry depends on investment and on people taking risks, and people putting money on uncertain things. The kind of climate generated by these three measures will diminish the industry and weaken it, if not destroy certain sections of it.

This is a bad Bill and my party will be voting against it tonight.

9.12 pm

Mr. Brinton: The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) was not with us in Committee, and I was reflecting as he spoke that one of the good things about the discussions on the Bill was the constructive and friendly approach of my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench, who have listened to the arguments, albeit while disagreeing.

I have my reservations about how far the Bill has gone. I have spent a great deal of the time that I have been contributing in a small way to these debates trying to make it plain that there is a basic difference between film made for the cinema and film made for television. My hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, North (Mr. Gorst) referred somewhat hesitantly to a Bill that might be polished—I suggest that it has room for considerably more polishing in the other place. One of the big problems faced by the Bill and the Government is that over the years there has been a slow getting together of the cinema film and the television film, but the two have not yet married up. Therefore, in a sense, the Bill is reflecting something that is changing all the time and will not remain constant for long enough to be of value.

There is no doubt in my mind that the most useful thing that we could get is what we have not so far had from my hon. Friend. The Government have had to introduce certain reforms because the Eady levy was out of date and not doing its job. They have chosen the path set for them by the television lobby and have not supported the feature film. That is a different animal. One of our small achievements during the course of the Bill has been to get the whole of the film industry united around one statement: that the polishing will continue elsewhere.

9.15 pm

Mr. Gale: There will be three rousing cheers tonight in the Carlton cinema, Westgate-on-Sea, and in many small cinemas around the country about the abolition of the Eady levy. The industry needed that little shot in the arm. On their behalf, I thank the Government for it and I welcome it.

I agree entirely with my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Brinton) that the Ministers have listened patiently to the arguments and have put a great deal of hard work into the Bill. As a result, it leaves this House a better Bill. Earlier this afternoon we may have lost a skirmish. However, there will be an opportunity in another place to look again at the Bill. I know that my hon. Friends will listen to the arguments and will look again at the Bill. The Government have reaffirmed their support for a British film industry making good British films that will be shown in British cinemas and on British television. Therefore, warts and all, I welcome the Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Shipbuilding Bill

Not amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

New Clause 1

COMMENCEMENT

'This Act shall not come into force until an order made by the Secretary of State has been approved by a Resolution of the Commons House of Parliament.'.—[Mr. Geoffrey Robinson.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

9.17 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson (Coventry, North-West): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

What we at first thought was an innocuous Bill has during the course of Second Reading and Committee emerged quite clearly as a Bill that needs our close attention. Therefore we have put down for consideration this evening a new clause upon which we intend to vote. Far be it from me to delay the proceedings of the House at this hour, but the purpose of the new clause is to bring home to the Government the need for a new clause to establish both the new British Shipbuilders redundancy payment scheme and a scheme for those yards that are to be privatised before December 1986 when the existing shipbuilding redundancy payment scheme comes to an end once and for all.

We have made it clear that we shall not vote against the Bill on Third Reading. We have equally made it clear that we do not agree with the truncating of the scheme to an extension of only 18 months. But we do not agree that this should be done before the successor scheme has been established by British Shipbuilders. We do not agree that the Government should, with such commercial irresponsibility, write off all the financial liabilities of those yards that are to be privatised while at the same time not requiring them to meet conditions relating to maintenance of employment and conditions for its termination at least equal to those prevailing under the present scheme. Least of all do we agree, because of the uncertainties still surrounding the industry, that this is the right time to terminate this legislation which by the Government's own reckoning has worked so well. As the Minister of State said on Second Reading:

"No one would dispute that the scheme has contributed significantly over the years both to the alleviation of the problems of redundancy in a contracting industry and to progress in relation to the problems of contraction itself. It has provided a valuable tool in the management of change within shipbuilding and has helped in an extremely difficult period".—[Official Report, 9 January 1985; Vol. 70, c. 790.]

The time remains extremely difficult, and this is no time to end the scheme with the final and unchangeable deadline announced by the Government, a scheme that has helped to mitigate the hardship of thousands of shipworkers whose livelihood has been wrecked by the Government.

The truncated period might also lead to a haemorrhage of skills, leading to an unbalanced labour force. When the scheme was introduced by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) in 1978, the Minister of State, then a junior Opposition spokesman, said:

"The result of many redundancy schemes has been that some firms have been left with a labour force which is unbalanced".

If the Bill goes through tonight with the deadline of December 1986, we shall, in all probability, see precisely that adverse effect achieved.

The House will realise that the tightness of the money resolution has prevented us from putting the many amendments that we would have liked to modify the Bill. Nor have we attempted, for the reasons that I gave, to wreck it. But in moving and voting on the new clause tonight we wish to expose the irresponsibility and hypocrisy of the Government, and the Minister of State in particular.

Again in Opposition in 1978, the Minister of State said that he wished to extend the scheme that we were introducing for the nationalised sector of the industry to what was then going to be a small sector of ship repair yards only. He said that the same scheme should apply to them because it was Government financed. He said:

"I make this point because there is some concern in the small private sector . . . that the terms of the Bill will have an adverse effect on them . . . If that is the case, is it not worth considering whether the scheme proposed in the Bill should not have been an industry-wide scheme rather than confined to British Shipbuilders?"—[Official Report, 16 January 1978; Vol. 942, c. 181-85.]

Indeed, so firmly did the Minister become convinced of that concept of parity between public and private sectors that he took the point to another place. He succeeded there in having amendments agreed to, the effect of which would have been that the private sector repair yards would have been included within the state scheme. That would have been impossible, as he then well knew, because our deliberations in the House are governed by a money resolution, as they are not in another place. That tactic, Mr. Speaker, pursued with a speciousness and irresponsibility that did not become him, was correctly ruled out of order by your illustrious predecessor, Mr. Speaker Thomas, on 27 April 1978.

For that reason and others, we have not seen fit to try to take the matter to another place, although it is worth noting in passing that the Government have been defeated there no fewer than 79 times. However, that would be a futile exercise and a waste of the time of this House since on return to the House you, no doubt, Mr. Speaker, as did your predecessor, would have ruled any such amendents out of order.

But we must still put to the Minister and the Government those arguments that strongly make the case that the Government should first see that a new and equally good scheme, as promised by the Minister of State, is established before the Act comes into force. On Second Reading he said:

"However, at this stage there is no need to worry that the work forces may end up worse off."—[Official Report, 9 January 1985; Vol. 70, c. 793.]

I take that to be the work forces in what will remain the public sector and in the private sector.

That, for us, is a commitment, and we would have wished that commitment to have been clearly evidenced to the House by way of a new scheme presented to it, or even presented outside the House, but nevertheless for such a scheme to have been negotiated between BS and its employees, and, indeed, between those yards that are privatised or that are being privatised and their work forces.

True to his word, the Minister should have seen to it that such a scheme was forthcoming. It was just as important that that should have been negotiated for the private sector as for the public sector, which, we have his commitment, will be no worse off.

Regarding safeguards for the private sector, which the Minister of State was so anxious to obtain back in 1978, there is no question of these being given by the Government now. Although the scale of the problem in the private sector if and when these yards are denationalised is going to be much greater, it was already pre-empted on Second Reading, by the Minister of State who had done a U-turn in the most classic fashion, when he said, contrary to what he was urging us to do in 1978:

"I am quite clear that an extension to the private sector would be the wrong solution." [Official Report, 9 January 1985; Vol. 70, c. 793.]

That would be an extension to the private sector of whatever scheme British Shipbuilders are able to agree with their work force.

We are now without any undertaking of a specific and clear nature with regard either to British Shipbuilders or to the yards that are so irresponsibly to be flogged off. We are talking of the great names in the industry, such as Barrow, with some 12,000 unemployed, Yarrow, Swan Hunter and Vosper, totalling perhaps as many as 30,000 employees of whom the Government have washed their hands.

In refusing, then, to accept new clause 1 tonight, if that is the case—and we shall listen with great interest to the Minister's reply, although I fear that it will almost certainly be no — the Government will make it unmistakably clear to the employees of British Shipbuilders and those in the military yards to be privatised that they have abandoned a vitally important aspect of their commitment to them. The result could well be a haemorrhage of redundancies while the present scheme still lasts in those very skills we need to sustain a shipbuilding capability at all in this country. It will also mean, of course, a further acceleration in the economic decline of those regions of our country that have historically suffered so tragically from economic decline and social impoverishment.

We believe that that could be avoided. We urge the Government to agree to this new clause, which would entail the need to bring an order before this House making the position quite clear. That is all we are asking of the Government and I ask them to consider it very carefully. The purpose of the new clause is to enable the Government, before the Act comes into operation, before December 1986, to put before the House precisely what, with their guidance and under their instructions—for they have already written to the chairman of British Shipbuilders—has been negotiated by way of a new redundancy scheme between British Shipbuilders and its employees.

We should also like to know, and the House is entitled to know, what has been negotiated, if the privatisation measures go through, between the new owners and their employees. We believe that the uncertainty and despair that this legislation is likely to cause could be avoided. For these reasons, we urge the Government to accept new clause 1 to reassure the industry, public and prospectively private, that it has a future. If they do not, we and the shipbuilders can only fear the worst—fake assurances from a fake Department that cares nothing for the welfare of the working people and a nationally and regionally important industry.

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): I support what was said by my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, North-West (Mr. Robinson). The Minister, the Parliamentary Secretary and the Minister of State have said on a number of occasions that the shipyard workers have nothing to fear, that the new scheme will be as good as if not better than the present one. If that is so, they should accept the new clause.

I, too, would like to quote the Minister of State, who was then the Opposition spokesman on shipbuilding. When we were discussing the original Shipbuilding (Redundancy Payments) Bill he said:

"The other point that I would make, particularly following what the Minister said when he talked about a once-and-for-all situation, is that achieving competitive levels of manning is something that we have to go on doing all the time. We tend to look at Japanese steelworks or German shipbuilding firms and think about making an adjustment to get down to their level of manning, but this is a process that ought to go on all the time." That is precisely why we say that the shipbuilding redundancy scheme should continue.

9.30 pm

The Minister says that by December 1986 the shipbuilding industry will have negotiated a scheme that is as good as, if not better than, the present scheme. The Minister of State, then Opposition spokesman, said in the debate on 16 January 1978:

"One reason for this, and this brings me back to an earlier point about what happens in one industry affecting what happens in another, is that workers in British Shipbuilders and the unions there must have read the newspaper stories about the sorts of sums being paid to buy out redundant jobs in the British Steel Corporation".—[Official Report 16 January 1978; Vol. 942, c. 179-182.]

In Committee we spoke of concern about the fact that shipbuilding workers receive less by way of redundancy payments than the steelworkers or the sums paid by the British National Dock Labour Board, and they get less redundancy than the mineworkers.

It is clear that what happens in one industry affects what happens in another, and that should be heeded by the workers in other nationalised industries. They should realise that the way in which the Government are ending the shipbuilding redundancy scheme could happen to the schemes applying to the steelworkers, dockers and mineworkers in the not too distant future, when the Government feel that the time is right.

In Committee the Minister said that there was no need to fear that after 1986 workers in the private or public sectors would be any worse off. If he believes that, he should accept the new clause. On Second Reading, the Minister said that compensation was a subject for negotiation, and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, North-West pointed out, shipbuilding workers should not lose out.

Somebody once remarked that there was no need to look in the crystal ball if one could read the book. It is clear that shipbuilding workers who have negotiated outside the shipbuilding scheme have not achieved the equivalent of shipbuilding redundancy scheme payments, and one needs only to look at Tyne Shiprepairers for proof of that. That company was privatised and the men were bought out under the scheme applicable then for half their entitlement under the shipbuilding redundancy scheme. Scott Lithgow workers will not get their full entitlement. In other words, the remarks that Ministers are making are, to say the least, slightly misleading because workers who have already negotiated redundancy payments have not been able to achieve the same terms as were negotiated by the Labour Government in 1978. That is why the new clause is necessary.

If the Minister is so certain of what will happen when the scheme comes to an end in 1986 and renegotiations take place, there is no reason why he should not accept the new clause. It will ensure that when the new scheme is negotiated it will be brought before the House for debate. Then, if hon. Members are satisfied, the Government will have the full backing of the House for their actions.

At present, workers in the shipbuilding industry know what is likely to happen. Come December 1986, they are sure that they will be finished with the shipbuilding redundancy scheme and that the negotiations which they will have with the companies will not produce terms as fair to them as the terms that were introduced by the Labour Government.

In Tyne and Wear there are 72,000 men out of work, more than 35,000 of them having been unemployed for over 12 months. When 2,100 voluntary redundancies were asked for, more than 2,400 volunteered. They volunteered only because they were convinced that the Government would be bringing the shipbuilding redundancy scheme to an end in 1986.

If the Minister is genuinely concerned for the shipbuilding industry, he will accept what we propose. After all, the management does not want the scheme to end. They are aware of the problems that will arise, and it is nonsense for the Minister to say that all will be well under a voluntary redundancy scheme. It is not a voluntary redundancy scheme, because management determines who is made redundant. If all the platers in a yard asked for redundancy, the management would not give it to them. The same would apply if all the joiners opted for redundancy. The management picks out individuals, so it is nonsensical for the Minister to say that it is a voluntary redundancy scheme.

If the cut-off date for the redundancy scheme is December 1986, the platers could finish the steel work on a ship and be given redundancy payments under the scheme, while joiners, electricians and other finishing trades working on the ship at a later stage could lose the advantages to be gained under the scheme because the work continued beyond December 1986. The new clause is designed to restore some confidence, but perhaps "confidence" is the wrong word, because shipyard workers do not want a redundancy scheme, let alone to have confidence in it. Instead, they want confidence in the industry.

On Second Reading the Minister talked about 35,000 workers in British Shipbuilders having benefited from the redundancy scheme. That means that 35,000 men have benefited by being thrown on the human scrapheap. That is an example of the nonsense that is spoken by Ministers. These men have been made redundant in areas where there is no chance of getting a job if they are over 35 or 40 years of age. As I said in Committee, to say that men have benefited by being made redundant is rather like Pierrepoint saying that everyone he hanged benefited because the trap door always opened.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the major implications of the Bill is that those in the shipbuilding industry will be taken back to the bad old days and will face the sack when a ship is finished? Does he agree that it is likely that once a worker's part of the contract is finished he will be out? Is that not one of the implications of the Bill?

Mr. Dixon: That is perfectly true. Shipyard workers will work themselves out of a job. In the bad old days, as my hon. Friend has said, they used to lay the keel of a ship, get the ship launched and completed by the finishing date. The ship would leave the yard and the workers would be paid off. They would find themselves on the street. That is what happened in the industry before it was nationalised. There was a 50 per cent. turnover of workers in the shipbuilding industry.

When I worked in the industry I used to receive my Christmas box a week before Christmas. I would then be paid off — this happened to everyone — so that the employer did not have to pay two days of holiday pay. That was the sort of thing that happened before the industry ceased to be in private hands. We shall have one or two things to say about life in the industry in the days of private ownership when we come to Third Reading.

On Second Reading the Minister said:

"By the end of 1986 the state will own less than one third of the United Kingdom industry."—[An hon. Member: "Hear, hear".]

—I do not know who said "Hear, hear" It was probably the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg), who appears to be asleep.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg (Hampstead and Highgate): I only wish that I were asleep.

Mr. Dixon: The hon. Gentleman will have ample opportunity to sleep when the Minister replies to the debate. The Minister did not tell us what the size of the industry would be by the end of 1986. That is rather like the advertisements that we see on television. For example, we are told during one advertisement that a certain light bulb has 30 per cent. more life, but we are not told the life of the product with which it is being compared. In another advertisement we are told that a tyre has 50 per cent. more grip, and the obvious question is, "More grip than what?"

The Minister tells us that

"By the end of 1986 the state will own less than one third of the United Kingdom industry."—[Official Report, 9 January 1985; Vol. 70, c. 793.]

We do not know whether the industry will be building ships by the end of the century because of the way in which the Government are treating it.

I hope that the Minister will accept the new clause. It will give the men in the industry some satisfaction to know that their redundancy scheme—in fact, the scheme is inferior to the scheme enjoyed by the mineworkers, which the Prime Minister boasts about every week, or the schemes for the steelworkers or dockers—will continue to have effect until a new scheme is negotiated.

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): I ask the Under-Secretary of State to accept this modest new clause, because it gives the Secretary of State and the House the flexibility to manage the British shipbuilding industry much more effectively. As my hon. Friends the Members for Coventry, North-West (Mr. Robinson) and for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) have said, the Bill brings a guillotine into the management of British Shipbuilders. Because redundancy payments have almost become a way of life in shipbuilding areas, they very much affect industrial relations in the industry.

We are trying to give the Government flexibility. How can we tell what the position will be in 18 months time? It could be transformed in one way or another. There could, for example, be another Falklands crisis and the Government could cry out for ships. If the Bill is passed in its present form, the Government will have to go through the paraphernalia of introducing a new Bill.

I emphasise that we are not talking about over-generous payments. The payments to shipyard workers, compared with workers in the other heavy industries of coal and steel, are less. We cannot emphasise that fact enough. Those hon. Members from the north-east of England, where there are appalling unemployment levels and the four travel-to-work areas which are highest on a list of travel-to-work areas along the coastal belt of Tyne and Wear from Newcastle to Middlesbrough, are aware of the problem. It may be difficult for the Government to appreciate the fact that when British Shipbuilders asks for volunteers for redundancy the lists are over-subscribed. That over-subscription is based on fear and a lack of morale. The workers are afraid of losing the pittance of £2,000 or £3,000. That genuine fear can be seen in the pubs and clubs—everywhere in the shipbuilding area.

The replacement scheme to which the Minister referred on Second Reading will not be anywhere as good as this inadequate scheme. If the Under-Secretary of State accepts new clause 1, he will get himself off the hook and will make the management of British Shipbuilders much easier. I suggest that the Under-Secretary of State should join the Opposition, because we want British Shipbuilders, and the rest of British industry, to operate in management terms as effectively as possible.

The Government are imposing a deadline of December 1986. We all know that the redundancy schemes will be cut off because we have seen what happened with Tyne Shiprepairers in my constituency and other shiprepair yards that have been privatised. By placing in the legislation this albatross of the deadline of 31 December 1986, the Minister is making life much more difficult for himself and for British Shipbuilders. He will force men out of an industry when we cannot afford to do so. I urge the Under-Secretary of State to accept the new clause.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. John Butcher): I suspect that some hon. Members are anxious for us to make progress but that other hon. Members, some of whom have spoken on the new clause, are anxious that we should continue to treat seriously the issues raised in the new clause.

I fully appreciate the reasons why the Opposition have persisted with the line of argument which, in effect, asks for reassurances that those who work in the shipbuilding industry and who will remain employees of British Shipbuilders after the privatisation programme has taken place do not feel dragooned, enticed or pushed into redundancy programmes through a fear that any successor redundancy scheme will be less generous than the existing statutory scheme. I hope to deal with that point as clearly as I can.

9.45 pm

On a quasi-administrative point, the hon. Member for Coventry, North-West (Mr. Robinson) said that the new clause merely requires a statutory order before the Act comes into force in December 1986, but he will appreciate that the Act needs to be in force in June 1985 because we wish the further eighteen months from that date to cover British Shipbuilders employees while the new schemes are being negotiated and put into place.

Since we last discussed this subject on the Floor of the House, a number of things have happened. I remember vividly two or three hon. Members expressing their fears about the order position in British Shipbuilders' merchant yards. I remember the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) speaking out for his constituents and voicing his fears about the warship building programme and the need for orders at Cammell Laird.

Let us acknowledge for once that since then there has been a significant improvement in the order position, some of which is already known to the House. There are two or three items that I should like to lay before the House as giving grounds for optimism. The size of the order book will determine whether the provisions that we are discussing will be needed.

The House knows that Cammell Laird has an order for a type 22 frigate and that Swan Hunter also has a type 22 on order and that, subject to some detailed contractual obligations, has an option on a type 23. The position has improved dramatically at Austin and Pickersgill with two SD 14s. That order was obtained after great effort, and I pay tribute to the trade unions and to the management of Austin and Pickersgill for putting together a package which shows that they are determined to come out fighting, to make the best of their current order book and to see themselves through what has been a nasty few weeks to a position where I hope that they can compete and obtain more orders in the future.

I am delighted to report to the House that next week an order for a fisheries research vessel from the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food will be going to Ferguson-Ailsa. Without wishing to steal any of the thunder that I hope Graham Day will receive when he returns to the country in the near future, I can predict with some certainty that he will announce a major order for a merchant yard.

Dr. Godman: I also have some knowledge of the announcement that Mr. Day or his representatives are likely to make when he returns. The Minister gave good news about Ferguson-Ailsa. Can he expand on it?

Mr. Butcher: Only to say that the final details will be known next week, but having checked with my officials I am confident in having gone as far as I have tonight. I thought that while we were discussing the SRPS would be an appropriate occasion for those observations to be made.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Southampton, Itchen): My hon. Friend has not mentioned Vosper Thornycroft. When the House last considered this matter, there were high hopes in Southampton that Vosper Thornycroft would receive extra orders. Can my hon. Friend tell us anything about the prospects for Vosper Thornycroft and for Vosper Shiprepairers which is a Southampton yard which is short of orders? Those yards face the spectre of privatisation, and people are enthusiastic—[Interruption.] Perhaps I should express that slightly differently. There is anxiety in Southampton that it is losing orders because of the indecision about privatisation. I should be grateful to hear what my hon. Friend has to say.

Mr. Butcher: First, I am sure that a spectre could also be defined as a grand vision.

Secondly, it is certainly not my intention to be less helpful to my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope) than I have been to some Opposition Members. I advise my hon. Friend to fall into conversation in the Lobby with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence. I have had such a conversation myself. My right hon. Friend is fighting very hard for a major order that he hopes may go some way towards assuaging my hon. Friend's fears. My right hon. Friend's efforts in that direction are deadly serious.

The main purpose of the Bill is to extend the shipbuilding redundancy payments scheme from June this year to December 1986. On Second Reading, my hon. Friend the Minister of State clearly explained the need for such an extension. He noted that British Shipbuilders still has a long way to go to achieve real stability and a firm future. It would be foolish to ignore the risk that the market might force further rationalisation on the corporation. In such circumstances, the scheme could be of real value to both management and workforce. However, it is likely that by the end of 1986 British Shipbuilders and Harland and Wolff together are likely to employ less than a third of those working in the industry. The need for an inflexible statutory scheme, Acts of Parliament and statutory orders will have passed. The industry will then be better served by a non-statutory scheme agreed between unions and management.

Opposition Members have pressed the Government to describe or table the successor scheme. However, it is far too soon to predict the sort of scheme that will suit the industry in 1987. Opposition Members would be the first to complain if the Government were to prescribe the terms of a non-statutory scheme and to declare that those terms were non-negotiable. They would rightly say that the Government should allow industry to determine such details of the scheme as the balance between lump sums and weekly support payments, and that the industry itself should determine how those payments should be related to pay, age, length of service and so on. I am not prepared to predict the shape of the successor scheme. It is not for me or the Government to give an assurance that the scheme would be as generous as, or more generous than, the present arrangement.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: If that is so, why did the Minister of State specifically undertake on Second Reading that there was no reason to suppose that those employees still with British Shipbuilders would be any worse off under the successor scheme than under the present one?

Mr. Butcher: If the hon. Gentleman had contained himself for 30 seconds, he would have heard me emphasise the fact that it is no part of the Government's intention to require British Shipbuilders to implement a scheme that is, overall, less generous than the present one.

We have stated the Government's position clearly on three occasions, but we are not going to lay down a successor scheme in statute form.

Mr. Robinson: We hear, in the Minister's tortuous terminology, that the Government are not going to require British Shipbuilders to implement a scheme that is less generous than the present one. We want to hear again the commitment given by the Minister of State on Second Reading that people will be as well off as they are under the present scheme. Cannot the Minister give that commitment?

Mr. Butcher: The hon. Gentleman will have to re-read what I have just said and what my hon. Friend the Minister of State said. My hon. Friend was as clear as he could possibly be. There are times when the House indulges in tortuous terminology, but neither my hon. Friend nor I could have been clearer about what we hope for from the successor scheme in comparison with current arrangements. That is why my hon. Friend said, and why I repeat, that there is no need to fear that the work force may be worse off.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): I find the Minister's comment helpful. He has made it clear that workers will not be at a disadvantage under the new scheme as compared with the present scheme. If that is so, why does the Minister not simply extend the present scheme?

Mr. Butcher: We are extending the scheme for 18 months to give employees of British Shipbuilders, until December 1986, the reassurance that they will not be affected deleteriously. We are saying that, after 1986, there should be parity between the private sector and the public sector in regard to not having to put a statutory scheme on either of them. We also said in Committee—I hope that this will go some considerable way to reassure the hon. Gentleman—that when British Shipbuilders has negotiated its scheme with representatives of the work force the provisions of that scheme will be covered, as they are now, by Government funding. The Government have been asked whether the scheme will be financially neutral. There will be no cost to British Shipbuilders.

We have made our intention clear. We have signalled that we will supply the wherewithal, but we are not saying that the scheme will be statutory. Nor are we saying that we are prepared to impose such a scheme on British Shipbuilders when neither the private sector nor the warship building yards that are to be privatised will be subject to the same requirement.

Mr. Field : I am now puzzled by the Minister's use of the word "impose". If I heard him correctly, he is saying that he expects that, after 1986, British Shipbuilders will run a scheme as generous as, if not more generous than, the present one and that on no account will the scheme be worse than the present one for those who remain in the state sector.

Mr. Butcher: The hon. Gentleman is right to home in on the word "impose". We are not prepared to legislate for the continuation of the scheme as it is. We want the scheme to end in December 1986 and have given commitments to that effect. We want parity in the requirements put on employers between the private and public sector through this methodology.

New clause 1 would require the Government to introduce a statutory order before the Act came into force, and the order would be subject to affirmative resolution. That procedure would cause delay and uncertainty for those who work in the shipbuilding industry — those whom Opposition Members claim to represent. The procedure would also waste the time of the House—there has been plenty of that tonight—by permitting yet another debate on the need for the Bill. We could not even proceed with the writing-off of the Upper Clyde Shipbuilders Limited debt until the order had been approved. I see no merit in that.

Dr. David Clark: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it in order for the Minister to accuse hon. Members of wasting the time of the House?

Mr. Speaker: The Minister is responsible for what he says, but I do not think that he really meant that.

Mr. Butcher: I certainly did not mean that the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) had wasted the time of the House. This is an important Bill and I suspect that some Opposition Members, like me, wonder why we did not start this debate until about half an hour ago. I hope that that clarifies what I meant to say.

The procedure provided by new clause 1 would be similar to that which was undergone when the scheme was previously extended in 1981 and 1982. On both occasions there was primary legislation, followed by an order which extended the life of the scheme. That procedure was perhaps cumbersome, but statutory orders had to be tabled anyway to improve benefits, increase the upper-earnings limit, consolidate the regulations or to make other changes. However, we are making no changes this time. The upper-earnings limit increases automatically every year, so there is no need for an order.

Almost all those who have spoken have said that they welcome the main purpose of the Bill and the further extension of the shipbuilding schemes. There is, therefore, no sense in delaying its implementation, which is all that new clause 1 would do. I therefore urge the House to reject the new clause.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: The Minister's answer is extremely evasive. He has tried to sidetrack us with some judiciously placed orders and by telling us that 11,000 ship workers, who will remain in the public sector, are of little concern to him. Moreover, he has said that we are trying to waste the time of the House.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary has refused to give what my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) sought, that is, a requirement on British Shipbuilders that the scheme should be equal to the present one. If that were the case we would not need the present legislation. The Minister failed to give that undertaking, we must fear the worst and, therefore, we must push the new clause to a vote.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Shipbuilding Bill, the Milk (Cessation of Production) Bill, and the Town and Country Planning (Compensation) Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

Mr. Speaker's letter of 30 January 1985 (matters sub judice)

Mr. Speaker has authorised the publication of the following letter to Mr. Tam Dalyell, pursuant to the procedure laid down in Mr. Speaker's statement on 5 November 1981—[Official Report, c. 113].

"I undertook to write to you about the point of order you raised on Monday in which you drew attention to the comments reported in The Times of that day by Lord Hill-Norton on two cases of current litigation.

The first of these was the Ponting case. I ruled last week that this case, currently being tried at the Old Bailey, is sub judice. That ruling included the issues of jury vetting and in camera hearings. As I said then, for the House to discuss any facet of the security aspects of this case could be prejudicial to the conduct of the trial.

The sub judice rule remains in force until the verdict and sentence have been announced. If an appeal is lodged, the rule comes into force again until the appeal has been decided.

In the other case to which your referred on Monday, Thornycroft Giles v. British Shipbuilders, I am informed that there have been preliminary proceedings involving disputes before a court over the discovery of documents in which the Government have been involved. These proceedings are to be resumed at a later date so that they too must fall under the sub judice rule.

Of course it remains open to any hon. Member to pursue general points about jury vetting and in camera hearings in any parliamentary way open to him, provided that no reference is made to a case which is sub judice. I understand you and other Members are already using the available procedures in this sense.

I have of course no responsibility for anything that Lord Hill-Norton says, and no Point of Order for me can arise out of his alleged statements. But I do have a responsibility to uphold the rules which the House of Commons has itself agreed. One of the most important of these rules is that we should say nothing in this place which might prejudice a fair trial of persons before the courts, or give the appearance that Parliament is seeking to influence the administration of justice."

Shipbuilding Bill

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

10.11 pm

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): I do not wish to review the strategic arguments that affect the industry's future, because we have recently had an opportunity to do precisely that, although of course in Opposition time. However, there have been a number of recent developments in the fortunes of the industry which have given me serious cause for concern and directly affect the Bill now under discussion.

I and my hon. Friends are not opposed to the further extension of the British Shipbuilders redundancy scheme. What worries us is that we are voting to extend the Bill for the last time and that what happens after that, in spite of the assurances that the Minister tried to give earlier, is by no means determined.

The industry is being forced through a period of contraction by market forces, by the present ordering programme of the Ministry of Defence and, most significantly of all, as a direct result of Government policy. It is not possible to foresee where the industry will be at the end of 1986.

The Government have committed themselves to selling off those yards that they have designated as warship yards to the private sector by March 1986. If the Minister wishes to correct me on that figure, I will willingly give way to him. I understand that it is the Government's intention that all the yards designated as warship yards shall be in private hands by March 1986, or closed. The main customer for these yards, as we all understand is the Ministry of Defence. It is a pretty safe bet that any prospective private purchaser will be looking at the Ministry of Defence ordering programme and the potential competition before making any commitment.

The brutal fact of the matter is that there is at present more warship building capacity in British shipbuilders than there is demand in the Ministry of Defence. It may well be that private investors in the pirit of free enterprise will sustain more capacity than demand in the hope of putting their rivals under. In my view, a far more likely scenario than that form of investors' Russian roulette is that the private sector will be willing to invest only in sufficient capacity to meet foreseeable demand, and who can blame it? I would not expect Conservative Members to blame the private sector for that.

Let us consider the position of a warship yard that has not been privatised possibly because nobody will buy it and whose last ship is to be completed after the end of 1986. In those circumstances, is it fair to the workers that they should stare redundancy and long-term unemployment in the face without the British Shipbuilders scheme or any properly spelt out successor, and risk leaving the industry on terms that are less favourable than those on which people left the industry when the redundancies were first announced, selling their jobs at the first opportunity? That cannot be just. We have a duty to the remaining work force in the industry, not just to those who have already left and who the Government hope will leave before 1986.

There is bound to be a suspicion that the recently announced orders in certain merchant and warship yards are only a reprieve, and that it is the Government's intention to buy some time and buy off extra trouble while the sterling crisis and the miners' strike are under way. The fear is that later that reprieve will be clawed back, and the on-cost of providing those orders will also be clawed back from savings on the British Shipbuilders redundancy scheme. At the very least, the Government have a duty to spell out what terms and conditions will prevail in the industry for redundancy payments after 1986, particularly what terms and conditions will prevail in a warship yard which, presumably, will have a peculiar limbo status if it has not been privatised and is not intended to remain in British Shipbuilders. The status of such a yard is not clear, and the terms and conditions under which the men can expect redundancy are not clear either. For example, what will happen to their accumulated rights in employment, not under the state scheme, but under the British Shipbuilders redundancy scheme? Can the Minister give the House an assurance at least on that?

Another factor affecting the defence aspect is the cost of Trident. Potential investors in warship yards must work out how much of the conventional naval programme is likely to be delayed or cancelled through the escalating cost of Trident, unless the individual is a potential investor in Barrow-in-Furness. He would have to work out whether the British economy could sustain the Trident programme and what effect cancellation would have on the Ministry of Defence's demand for Trident-bearing submarines. That is all a matter of speculation. No hon. Member can predict accurately how events will unfold. In those circumstances, it is wrong for the House to acquiesce to the redundancy provisions of the Bill as if all were settled and planned.

I remind the House that we are not talking about generous redundancy terms. Time has eroded the effect and value of the original scheme. The average redundancy payment to a British Shipbuilders employee is £5,000. The age range of those leaving the industry contains some considerable surprises. Up to the year end of 1984, over the preceding two years some 45 per cent. of those seeking voluntary redundancy were over 50, which is expected, but what is not expected is that 37 per cent. of them were under 40. They should have the prospect of a working life, yet in my constituency half the unemployed men in the four shipbuilding local Government yards are skilled, time-served men with shipbuilding and heavy engineering skills. I am told that the average age of the present round of volunteers for redundancy at Swan Hunter is 33.

The reason behind those figures, which show that younger people are leaving the industry, is not hard to find. Since 1979 the real wages of shipyard workers have steadily declined. The Chancellor of the Exchequer tells us that when real wages decline, more jobs are created. His highly dubious theory does not work out in the shipbuilding industry, where the decline in the total labour force has been paralleled by the rapid decline in the real wages of the remaining labour force. Almost all the young ancillary workers with families in my constituency and many skilled men are now in receipt of family income supplement, rate relief or housing benefit. They are caught in the poverty trap, and the on-cost of working is making many men think carefully about their commitment to the industry.

Shipbuilding has become a low-paid industry. Let no Conservative Member say that the work force has made no sacrifices to save it because the evidence shows that it has.

All the basic decency and willingness to work that typifies shipbuilding communities is played on by the Government when they say, "Be competitive and there will be work at the expense of your fellow worker elsewhere in the country." Swan Hunter has made an effort to be competitive. Recently it submitted a competitive tender for two type 22s, hoping to win both on competitive grounds. The Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry said, when we discussed the Bill on Wednesday, 9 January, about the decision on the type 22s:

"The decision will be based on the judgment of the Secretary of State for Defence of the ability of the yards to complete those ships on spec, on time and within the contract price. In other words, it will be a competitive decision on merit, and on commercial grounds, if the hon. Gentleman wishes to call it that."—[Official Report, 9 January 1985; Vol. 70, c. 837.]

By "the hon. Gentleman" he meant me.

When the Secretary of State for Defence came to announce the orders for the two type 22s he made it clear that Swan Hunter had won the competitive tender, but one ship was going to Merseyside because of social factors, and in particular the hardship that would be caused by redundancies. I applaud the Government's willingness to consider social factors, particularly in areas of high unemployment, not least because similar arguments apply to my constituency. However, if Swan Hunter is forced to announce a further round of redundancies because it did not get the order for the second type 22, or because the promised type 23 is delayed for as long as the type 22 was delayed, the Ministry of Defence need not bother to urge competitiveness on the industry, and the people of Tyneside will know what worth to give to the words of the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): My hon. Friend will realise that I do not want to go into too much detail at this point, but when he is talking about competitive tendering, is he aware that, whereas Swan Hunter was allowed to compete for both frigates, Cammell Laird was allowed to compete for only one? The only coherent reason put forward for that was that if Cammell Laird had won both frigates it would have been taking on workers when Swan Hunter would have been making redundancies. My hon. Friend is right to focus attention on the competitive side, and is wise not to quote the answer given to a parliamentary question that he asked, which gave a rather different interpretation as to how the orders would be placed. However, is he aware that the basis for competitive tendering was not allowed to all the competing yards?

Mr. Brown: I understand my hon. Friend's point, which is a valid one. There is no issue between myself and my hon. Friend. The issue is between the Labour party, which has urged the Government to take account of social needs and factors such as high unemployment, and the Conservative party. The Minister said that the orders would be based on commercial factors, but the Secretary of State for Defence then made it clear that social and compassionate considerations such as unemployment played a part in placing the order. The Government have not said that before now.

This new theory raises an issue. How will the Ministry of Defence now get competitiveness from the warship yards when they are privatised? We all know that the Secretary of State for Defence now has a more wide-ranging decision-making process. Who will put money into a private business with only one major customer, an eccentric who is likely to say to a yard, "Yours was the most competitive bid, but I am placing the order elsewhere"?

The Government have now conceded that there is no free market in merchant shipbuilding, and even claim that that was always their view. They should now concede that there is also no free market in domestic warship building, even when they are the major customer. What a ludicrous state of affairs that is. The Government should think again about how they intend to approach the industry.

I do not mean to make a controversial suggestion, but perhaps the Department of Trade and Industry and the Ministry of Defence could agree a common approach. Until they have done that, the House would be unwise to set a final date to the British Shipbuilders redundancy scheme.

Mr. Dixon: The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry accused us of wasting the time of the House. We are talking about redundancy pay, albeit——

Mr. Butcher: I made it very clear that I was concerned about the fact that this debate was so late in starting. Perhaps I should not have implied that the previous debate took longer than had been expected, but I thought I made it absolutely clear that this debate was not wasting time but was dealing with very serious issues.

Mr. Dixon: The hon. Gentleman has made that clear now, but he did not make it clear before. We believe that it is important to talk about redundancy pay. It is very important to those workers in the shipbuilding industry in Tyne and Wear who are to be made redundant. Already 72,558 men are out of work in that area. Of those, 35,998 —or 49·6 per cent.—have been out of work for more than 12 months. They are the long-term unemployed. Those who are to be made redundant in the shipbuilding industry will join the dole queue in that area. They will have no chance of ever getting another job. The Prime Minister refers each Tuesday and Thursday to the miners having lost £8,000 in wages in 11 months, that gives some idea of what the redundancy payments amount to. They do not amount to even 12 months' wages.

During the Second Reading debate and the Committee stage not once did we hear either the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State or the Minister of State refer to the social consequences of redundancies in the shipbuilding industry. The shipbuilding industry, like the mining industry, is a closely knit community. My hon. Friend the Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett) knows how closely knit the shipbuilding industry is in his area. Almost 62 per cent. of the people who work at Swan Hunter live in Wallsend or in adjacent towns. My hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Clay) knows about the effect of Austin and Pickersgill upon that community. Most of the men live within five miles of the shipyard. That is the kind of social consequence to which we refer when we talk about shipbuilding communities.

In the 1930s, unemployment in the Tyne and Wear area was 30 per cent. above the national average. It is now 40 per cent. above the national average. Instead of deriding shipbuilding workers the Government should praise them every now and again. It was alleged that there was late delivery of the "Atlantic Conveyor". In fact, the "Atlantic Conveyor" was delivered within days of the original contract date. It is a pity that Ministers did not refer to the French shipyard workers. They had a contract for a sister ship of exactly the same design six months before Swan Hunter got theirs for the "Atlantic Conveyor" but they have not finished it yet. However, we hear nothing about the French shipyard workers. We hear only about the British shipyard workers whom the Minister and the Government seem to deride.

[Mr. Dixon]

On Second Reading the Government referred to massive investment in the shipbuilding industry. The Minister referred to investment amounting to £1,000 million. In a previous debate the Prime Minister referred to £1,000 million of taxpayers' money having been invested in British Shipbuilders since 1979. It is time that this was put into perspective. May I quote what was said by the former chairman of British Shipbuilders. He was the last decent chairman. The present chairman is a waste of time. He is doing more damage to the shipbuilding industry than MacGregor is doing to the coal mining industry. I am referring to Graham Day. In the Sunderland Echo on 23 July 1984 Sir Robert Atkinson said:

"much has been made of the £800 million Government aid to shipbuilding from nationalisation to the time I left the B.S. chair. But this was a 'half-truth' because the industry was so under-capitalised, one half of that £800 million was in fact used as working capital and in capital expenditure, not in direct subsidies."

That is what the former chairman of British Shipbuilders said about the so-called taxpayers' handout to the British shipbuilding industry.

Clause 2 talks about writing off the debt that the Clyde shipyards incurred under the shipbuilding industry board set up under the Geddes report in 1966. The British shipbuilding industry has been undercapitalised for many years. In 1962 we had the Paton report. In 1966 we had the Geddes report which set up the shipbuilding industry board which lent the industry money because people were not investing at that time. In 1973 we had the Booz Allen report. Each of those reports since the war talks of lack of investment in the shipbuilding industry.

How on earth can British shipyard workers compete with those in Sweden, on the continent or the far east when the industry was starved of investment when it was in private hands up to 1977?

In a survey carried out in the 1970s it was found that the assets in the British shipbuilding industry were £825 per worker, compared with more than £1,000 in Germany, more than £1,200 in Italy, more than £1,800 in Sweden and more than £2,800 in Japan. In 1982 British Shipbuilders invested £100 million. In 1982 the Japanese shipbuilding industry invested £620 million in their seven biggest yards. Korea has been investing £400 million a year. Yet the Minister comes along and tells us that the Government have been over-financing the shipbuilding industry.

The Government have had to invest money because while the shipbuilding industry was in in private hands up to 1977 not a halfpenny was invested in the yards. I can recall working in the shipyards in the 1960s when we used to push shell plates round in wooden barrows. Yet at that time the Japanese and Swedish shipyards had computers. No one would invest in the British shipbuilding industry. The workers could not even have gloves to hold lugs. I recall many nights going home with septic burns on my hands because the management would not give the acetylene welders gloves. Those are the sort of conditions in which we used to work in the shipyards.

Clause 2 talks about when the shipbuilding industry was in private hands and that is what I am talking about. I recall a launch in Swan Hunter when the management stopped the workers' launch allowance of 37½p a day, yet it stripped the joiners' shop to put a champagne party on for guests at the launch. That is what happened when the shipyards were in private hands. Let me tell the Government that the shipyard workers will not go back to those days.

On Second Reading my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) talked about victimisation. It was easy then because of what were called the markets. For the benefit of those hon. Members who do not know what they were I can tell them that they were named after cattle markets. We used to go each morning at 7.30 in the hail, rain or snow and stand outside the foreman's office. He would come out and point to those he wanted to work that day. Those who were not picked out used to go home soaking wet and not get a penny piece. That is what the industry was like when it was in private hands. We need no lectures from the Government telling us that the industry will be better in private hands. The industry failed in private hands, and that is why it was nationalised in 1977.

When the ship building redundancy scheme was introduced, my predecessor, the then hon. Member for Jarrow, Ernest Fernyhough, said:

"Sitting here, I wondered . . . whether the story of Jarrow would not have been different if we could have had something as such as this in the 1930s."—[Official Report, 16 January 1978; Vol. 942, c. 186.]

In the 1930s, in Jarrow men got nothing when they finished work. They were paid off with no notice at all.

After the war the only people who got notice were tradesmen. I got two hour's notice when I was sacked and that was to grind my tools. Anyone who did not have tools —who was not a shipbuilder, joiner, carpenter but an ancillary worker—got no notice at all. They were told by the foreman or manager that they should go to the time office and draw their books and money and stand on their own time to get their books and money. That is what it was like when the industry was in private hands. That is what shipyard workers had to experience.

We are talking about an area such as mine in south Tyneside where 60,000 people rely on state benefits. Most of the men who are paid off will join those who have to depend upon housing benefit. That is the position which prevails in areas where shipbuilding is relied upon for male employment.

Some hon. Members talk about a different scheme. Some say that the public and private schemes should be similar. The private sector has no redundancy schemes. Smith's docks on the river has no redundancy scheme because it remains in the private sector. Many private shipyards have no redundancy schemes.

The Minister says that no redundancy scheme other than the state scheme should operate. That is the truth. It is no good the Minister saying that shipyards are able to negotiate a scheme. He does not know what scheme can be negotiated. It is up to the unions and the management.

On Second Reading the Minister referred to compensation and said that it was the subject of negotiation. That was misleading. Directors from Tyne shiprepairers met me and my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) and told us what the buy-out was to the yards and asked us to have a word with the shipyard workers and to get them to accept the scheme. I told them that I would not advise them to accept anything less than they had at the moment. We were told that there was no room for negotiation. That is the truth of the matter.

We want the Minister to give us something constructive. We do not want to argue about shipbuilding redundancies. We want stability in the industry. Workers want a job, not a buy-off which will give them less than a year's wages.

The Government should have a maritime policy and tell the workers in the industry—those who go to sea in ships—that we have a Minister responsible for shipping. Possibly we are the only maritime nation in the world without a maritime policy. When one wants to talk about maritime policies or shipbuilding, one goes to the Department of Trade. When one talks about shipping one goes to the Transport Department and when one wants to talk about warships one goes to the Ministry of Defence. We want some political and financial support for the shipbuilding industry during the recession.

Mr. Frank Field: Does my hon. Friend agree that, while we have been in the House, there has not been a debate on a corporate plan for the industry and the amount of money that would be needed to finance such a plan?

Mr. Dixon: My hon. Friend is right. Indeed, the last corporate plan was put forward by Mr. Graham Day after he had been ordered to appear before the Select Committee that was looking into the shipbuilding industry. He was not keen on giving details of that plan to the Select Committee because the Secretary of State had instructed him not to provide that Committee with the evidence that he had given to the Department. The trade unions were not even involved in the process; he did not even discuss the matter with them.

We need a positive and co-ordinated Government policy. We should not have to stand here arguing about shipbuilding redundancy terms. The workers want to work and to build ships. The Government keep saying that we make a profit on warships and lose on merchant ships. One would think that one set of workers worked harder than another. The loss on merchant ships is easily explained. Every nation, including Japan and Germany, is having to subsidise merchant shipbuilding.

The British Government keep relying on a free market economy. That will not work, as we saw recently when the Chancellor had to intervene to stop the pound sinking further. We cannot allow our shipbuilding industry to sink. Let us have some positive plans from the Government.

Mr. Ted Garrett (Wallsend): I have spoken in virtually every debate on shipbuilding since I was elected in 1964. Each debate is more gloomy than the last, and this one, as we debate the ending of redundancy payments for shipbuilding workers, will not lift the gloom.

The hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope) made a Freudian slip when he said that he was worried about the spectre of privatisation. The word "spectre" was taken up by the Minister, who said that it could relate to something in the distant future. The word was also used by Karl Marx. Many hon. Members will have read the ending of the Communist manifesto, but few will have read the beginning. It begins by saying that a spectre is haunting Europe. That was written in February 1848. If, however, we change the word "Communism" for "unemployment," we can say that the spectre of unemployment is haunting Europe, no more so than in the United Kingdom, and in particular in our shipbuilding industry.

My hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) recalled the 1930s and the iniquitous system of employment under private ownership. Those who are still employed in the British shipbuilding industry have a deep-seated fear about the future. The only way to give them confidence is to have a degree of job security, despite the uncertain world markets. It must be possible to say that a regular work force, a minimum number, will be required for the industry.

There is a need to address ourselves again—I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) referred to it—to a corporate plan. Redundancy is uppermost in the minds of all those who are fortunate enough to have a job, but in a negative sense. They are concerned about getting their money and getting out. The Bill, which will be given its Third Reading tonight, will end any speculation. When the current extension expires, that will be the end of the shipbuilding redundancy payments scheme. The negotiations that will take place with prospective private employers, assuming that there are some, will be rather different from past negotiations. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow that the prospects are not marvellous when one becomes aware of the extent of the under-capitalisation and the shortage of the necessary equipment to bring the yards up to a modern state to enable them to compete in world markets. Irrespective of the complexion of the Government, the first task must be to improve the morale of the work force. Secondly, we must try to ensure some continuity in spite of the volatility of the world shipbuilding market.

I wish to correct my hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow on one detail. The "Atlantic Conveyor" would have been built to time if it had not been for the Ministry of Defence input. The MOD insisted on certain modifications and they were implemented by the shipbuilders. It was a nightmare job. However, the ship sailed on time. If anyone gets the chance to tour the ship, he or she will be pleased to see that it is a dual-purpose vessel which could be the harbinger of vessels which could be used in the event of another maritime conflict.

I ask the Minister to recognise that there has been an improvement in orders since we were considering the Bill in Committee. I do not seek to belittle the efforts that he and and his civil servants have made, in co-operation with British Shipbuilders, to obtain the orders, and I hope that more orders will be gained. We, as Members must realise that there is a hell of a problem before us in dealing with the industry —, "industry" includes the men, the management and everyone who is engaged in it—and we must resolve not to let it die, whatever the cost.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I shall make only a brief contribution. One of my reasons for making a short speech is that I was not a member of the Committee which considered the Bill. I was a member of another Committee and felt that I could not be a member of two major Committees.

[Dr. Norman A. Godman]

My reaction to the Minister's remarks can best be described as mixed. I regret his rejection of the new clause, no matter how gracefully it was expressed. On the other hand, I am pleased by the announcement of the order won by Ferguson-Ailsa for the research vessel for the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. The vessel will be built not in my constituency but at the sister yard in Troon. It is right that the order has been won by Ferguson-Ailsa, as it is the finest yard in mainland Britain for the building of small, specialist vessels. The order is to be welcomed by the management, the work force and the communities of Port Glasgow and Troon.

After a long, difficult and distressing period, things are looking up for Clark-Kincaid, which is the last marine builder on the Clyde. I am greedy for more orders to be placed. Ferguson-Ailsa and Clark-Kincaid are fine establishments, and I speak with some experience, having worked as a shipwright. Ferguson-Ailsa has just won an order for two supply vessels for the Canadian offshore oil industry. Those Arctic 2 vessels will work in the Beaufort sea. British Shipbuilders, and particularly John Peach and his sales team, has done well in winning such a marvellous export order for the Clyde.

We have to remember that the shipbuilding industry is important not only to the maritime communities in which a shipyard is situated but to the many firms in the marine equipment industry. There are far-reaching ripples from this type of order won by shipyards on the Clyde and elsewhere. Clark-Kincaid and Ferguson-Ailsa have fine work forces and good management teams. They have a first-class record in industrial relations and can build with the best not only in Europe but worldwide.

I suppose that I should get around to considering the Third Reading. On Second Reading the Minister of State said:

"My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland and I propose to ask both organisations"— the Minister was referring to Harland and Wolff, which is another fine yard, and British Shipbuilders—

"in consultation with their unions to establish appropriate successor schemes by the early autumn of 1986. It is too early to predict the details of such schemes. They will be negotiated between the management and work force, just as in the private sector. However, at this stage there is no need to worry that the work forces may end up worse off."—[Official Report, 9 January 1985; Vol. 70, c. 793.]

I sincerely hope that that wish is realised by the outcome of the negotiations between the unions and management.

These events take place against a deeply depressing backcloth of a declining western European shipbuilding industry. On many occasions we have heard—I have not heard any hon. Member challenge the statement—that it is impossible for the western European shipbuilding industries to compete successfully with the South Korean and, to a lesser extent, Japanese shipyards.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett) mentioned that during his 20 years as a Member the discussions on the British shipbuilding industry had become gloomier in each succeeding debate. During the next decade we shall face even more formidable problems from China and perhaps Brazil.

I sincerely hope that if the Government intervene in any way in these negotiations about a successor scheme to the British Shipbuilders redundancy scheme they will make a positive intervention and that the scheme that is initiated will be the equal of the one that the Government have decided to put asunder.

Mr. Bob Clay (Sunderland, North): On Second Reading, in Committee and tonight the Opposition have been and are trying to find out what the Bill tells us about the future of shipbuilding. We have to go a long way in a short time to satisfy those inquiries. We must have a far more satisfactory explanation that we have so far received as to why the Government wish to end the statutory scheme from the end of 1986.

What is so significant about that date? If there is nothing significant about it, why not review the scheme, as Opposition amendments have suggested? The Minister might then take another view. He could come back to the House. The scheme could be extended again or we could have further details of a subsequent scheme.

The Minister has hedged around the point a great deal, and various formulations have been used, but all that we have been told is that overall no one will be worse off. I can envisage all kinds of interpretations of those words in 18 months' time. I can think of many other circumstances in which Ministers have used such phrases. Later when we have found out what they mean, Ministers have said that matters were covered by their original words.

Can the Minister give us an assurance about the subsequent scheme? Will the scheme be a national one for whatever is left of British Shipbuilders—if anything is left—or will it be a port-by-port scheme? If the amount of money available for the scheme is the same—that is questionable—as it is now, plus inflation, will it be piled up for one age group if the management at that time is keen to get rid of that age group? Those are some of the questions that have not been answered.

I do not understand how the Minister can give any assurances, because the scheme is subject to negotiation between British Shipbuilders and the work force. How can the Minister be so sure about the outcome of the negotiations and that the scheme will be no worse than the present one?

Where will the money come from? We understood in Committee that the Government would be providing some money. It would be helpful if the Minister could give an assurance, before we give the Bill a Third Reading, that the Government will give a sum of money which will provide a scheme equivalent to the present one. We have not yet had that assurance.

The more we consider the matter and the more we question the Minister, the less satisfactory the answers become, and the more we have to stick to our original conclusion that something odd is going on, that there is some intention behind this, or that the Government are considering some options which we do not believe are in the best interests of the industry.

I do not wish to be parochial, but we all wish to make points about the industry in our area. I shall deal with Austin and Pickersgill, but I shall not run up any flags for it. Sunderland Shipbuilders' Deptford yard is on its last ship. We are waiting for a decision on the Morecambe bay exploration, which could guarantee an order for that yard. It is indirectly within the Government's gift to secure that order. Nothing has happened. That yard is beginning to go through the agonies that Austin and Pickersgill have been through in the past weeks and months. It would be useful if some decisions could be made about future orders for Sunderland Shipbuilders' Deptford yard.

On Report, the Minister referred to the order secured by Austin and Pickersgill. He said that he would like to congratulate the management and the work force. We are all pleased about the order, of course, but the Minister might have mentioned the fact that 420 redundancies had been announced at that yard. That is how cavalier the attitude is now. If one order can be announced, 420 redundancies do not matter. Furthermore, as I understand it, even with the Oblendorff order there are probably more redundancies still to come.

I congratulate the local management, though somewhat halfheartedly, on what it has achieved. I certainly congratulate the shop stewards and the work force. However, I do not congratulate the Minister's Department, the chairman, the finance directors, or the senior management of British Shipbuilders. It is a disgrace that when that order was available—not for the first time—last September, it was lost because of a price gap of £2 million while the Government sat on their backside and did nothing. The order then suddenly seemed to reappear out of nowhere, and last Wednesday the shop stewards were told that if they did not agree to various conditions and sign them by Friday the yard would not get the order—it would have had it.

That was the situation that faced the workers last Wednesday. I congratulate them on not giving in to such disgraceful blackmail. In a nationalised industry, with national wage agreements, the shop stewards in one shipyard were presented with an ultimatum and told to sign for a two-year wage freeze, taking themselves out of national pay bargaining, within 48 hours. They were told that if they did not do so the yard would probably close. Is that the stage that we have reached? If it is, we need not wonder any more about what will happen after December 1986.

What will happen after the Ohlendorff order is completed? It is a sorry state of affairs. A yard originally designed to turn out 14 SD 14s a year has an order for two ships. There is a huge gap in the work programme beforehand, and nothing else on the order book. Yet that order is seen as manna from heaven—as salvation. Unless there are more orders, the order will merely give a few months' breathing space between crises.

What are the Government doing about the Ethiopian order? We have not forgotten about it because of Ohlendorff, although I suspect that the high-up management of British Shipbuilders has the worst intentions. It was not the local management that laid down the condition about the two-year wage freeze, and it was certainly not Ohlendorff. A German shipowner would have no cause to lay down such a condition. He is interested only in such matters as price and delivery.

When the question of price became crucial, the Government should have closed the gap. Instead, there was an attempt to make the work force do it by signing an agreement within 48 hours. I hope that such disgraceful tactics will not be tried again on workers in this or any other industry. I hope that the Government and Mr. Day will have learnt their lesson from the fact that the workers refused to give in to blackmail, that a reasonable agreement was eventually reached and that the order was still secured.

I hope that the Government will intensify their efforts to secure the Ethiopian order for Austin and Pickersgill, because the Ohlendorff order will provide only a brief respite for the industry on the River Wear. Sunderland Shipbuilders will soon, like Austin and Pickersgill, be in a state of crisis. The area is already soaked with redundancies, not only in shipbuilding but in many other industries, or what is left of them.

I do not like playing around with statistics, but I should like to give some that bring the scale of the problem home to me. At one school in my constituency, 80 per cent. of the children are on free school meals; at a second, 75 per cent.; at a third, 72 per cent.; and at a fourth 70 per cent. Sunderland has 26 per cent. adult male unemployment, one third of whom have been unemployed for more than two years. The rest have been unemployed for one year. Skilled workers are being made redundant from the shipyards and there are no apprenticeships. There is no other skilled work left in the town. The waves of redundancies pile up on that level of unemployment and the percentage of the long-term unemployed also increases. Literally thousands have been out of work for years. The effect on the community is terrifying. The yards are fevered with fears of redundancy and talk of redundancy and the Bill has made that ten times worse.

Nothing that the Government have said has reassured people. The Government's announcement that the scheme is to be ended in December 1986 is a message to people in my area to get out now. The message is that nothing will be certain and that the Government will do nothing to make people feel that they have a secure future. If they get out now, they argue, at least they will get what is going under the present scheme.

The events at Austin and Pickersgill confirm another worry. I should like the Minister to deny categorically that such merchant yards are being prepared for privatisation. The fear is that all of the yards on the River Wear are being slimmed down and having bits and pieces sub-contracted out as part of the push to get the work force to accept the conditions that will come with privatisation. It is clear that those who are playing around and, in some cases, holding orders off and are trying to get things out of the work force before allowing them an order are the very people who intend to buy the yards. Such has been the process with the warship yards.

People in communities around the yards expect either closure or privatisation. If that is what the Government intend, they should come clean and let us know what we are up against. I assure the Government that we know how to deal with that. If the Government intend to let the industry continue to sink by not securing orders and keeping the order books unfilled, and to stave off crises with an order from time to time so that the management can regroup and get the next lot of redundancies through, they should not assume that there will not be resistance such as has been put up and is being put up by the National Union of Mineworkers. Shipyard workers have learnt much from the NUM about defending their jobs and communities. They will not allow the Government to leave the industry to die or to hand it over to the private owners about whom my hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) spoke so eloquently.

11.10 pm

Mr. Frank Field: I wish to make two brief points. First, in a sense this debate, and many others, represents a paradox. The Government could make a case for the amount of support that they have given British shipbuilders. Since 1979, £1 billion of taxpayers' money has been put into the industry, yet it is in a crisis. Some people would argue that that is because that sum is not adequate for the size of the problem, but it is also because of the way in which the Government have brought forward the plans for that spending.

Since 1979, the industry has staggered from crisis to crisis, and the Government have responded by changing the borrowing requirement. We have never been able to have a debate about the long-term structure of the industry and the funds needed to support it. Therefore, my first charge against the Government is that they have displayed the politics of caprice and, almost, of madness. They have put considerable sums forward, but never in such a way that we could rationally debate how best to preserve British shipbuilding.

Secondly, I wish to relate what has been happening at Cammell Laird to this measure. Many hon. Friends and hon. Members will know that in the summer there was a dispute at Cammell Laird, although the majority of workers had three mass meetings to reject industrial action. The workers decided privately and collectively to accept the tap on the shoulder to be told that they did not have a job, providing their sacrifice would be matched by the survival of the yard. There were two reasons for that decision. First, there was a redundancy payment scheme and therefore some compensation for making the sacrifice. With this measure, that compensation will no longer be available. Secondly, they hoped that others in the yard, and possibly their children and grandchildren, would have a job in the yard. My second charge against the Government is not that this is a scrappy, nasty, little measure — it is that — nor that they have not spent considerable sums supporting the industry but the courage and sacrifice of the workers at Cammell Laird and other yards in willingly taking redundancy so that the industry can survive, has not been matched by Government vision about the industry's future.

The debate is not merely about the winding up of the redundancy payments scheme, nor about the fact that the Government have not put forward considerable sums of taxpayers' money. It is about a charge against the Government that since 1979 we have never had a proper debate about the needs and future development of the British shipbuilding industry, and the resource that will be necessary to safeguard its future.

Throughout the years we have had endless debates, but always in crises, always trying to patch up differences and always knowing that after a few weeks we would be back with another crisis and a demand for more money. When the Minister replies, I hope that for the first time since 1979 he will give us some idea of when we shall debate a corporate plan for the industry.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): I wish to be brief, but nevertheless I wish to endorse the comments made by Opposition Members. I have a direct personal interest, especially in the comments of the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field). I was born within a mile of Cammell Laird and my grandfather worked in the shipyards at Hebburns. There is genuine distress that these yards are under threat at present.

I ask the Minister to address two matters that arise from the measures contained in the Bill. In Committee, the Minister said that the Government would be prepared to introduce a topping-up scheme to follow the present one. Opposition Members would prefer the present scheme not to be terminated, but the Minister said that he recognises that any scheme that follows will need a topping-up element. How much will the Government provide in that scheme? Unless we have some guidance on that, many workers will opt for the present scheme because they will be unclear about what may follow. The Minister has an obligation to explain to the House what sort of topping-up the Government will endorse.

I have many constituents who work at the Hall Russell yard, which is favoured for privatisation. Let us leave aside for the moment whether we believe privatisation to be desirable. I said in Committee that the yard was successful when it was in private ownership, and may be so again, but it has not been helped by being kicked in and out of the private sector for the past few years. The preferred option—expressed both privately and publicly —is that it should be privatised, together with Yarrows. However, during the past week, it has become clear that that is unlikely to happen. The Yarrows management pulled out of the deal because the workers at that yard were not committed to it.

Dr. Godman: Is it not the case that a certain Mr. Iain Sproat has expressed an interest in acquiring that yard?

Mr. Bruce: That is true, but I am not sure whether it is his money. I suspect that he is acting on behalf of people who have money. Nevertheless, the consortium of which Mr. Sproat is a spokesman has expressed interest in the yard. My concern is only that the yard should continue to be as successful as it has been. I am not convinced that privatisation is helpful, and what has happened during the past two or three weeks has produced an uncertainty that the yard could do without. The yard was successful in the private sector, but it was also successful in the public sector. How can it be in the best interests of the community and the work force to have such uncertainty, with offers being made and then withdrawn, and new offers coming forward?

More specifically, will the Minister now recognise that he will not obtain a quick and easy settlement of his privatisation deal, and that the period will have to be extended to ensure that all offers are considered? The most likely offer has been withdrawn, and the one still on the table has not been considered properly. He has an obligation to tell the House what will happen.

On Second Reading and in Committee the Minister said that the Government would introduce a topping-up scheme, but he has not said how much money will be involved. The uncertainties in the industry——

Mr. Dixon: Does the hon. Gentleman remember that the Minister said that the public sector schemes would be exactly the same as the private sector ones? How can he top up the public sector schemes if they are supposed to be the same as the private ones? Will he also prop up the private sector schemes?

Mr. Bruce: The hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) knows that I share his scepticism about the scheme. In Committee, we persuaded the Minister to agree to top up the scheme, but he has not yet said that he will top it up to the same level. Unless the Minister assures the House tonight that he will do so, there is likely to be a mass exodus from the industry because the workers will lack confidence in what he has said. Unless he is prepared to say to the House that the Government recognise the need to ensure that any follow-on scheme will be topped up to the same level as the present scheme, the shipbuilding industry will be faced with a continuing crisis. He has said nothing on Second Reading or in Committee to reassure hon. Members who represent areas in which shipbuilding is important that the industry will be supported by the Government for the foreseeable future.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: The remarks of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary on wasting time while he has tried to duck out of the debate will have done nothing to improve his hapless reputation for putting his foot in it. Not only was he not present for any of the preceding debate, for the best part of which I was present, but I think that it is very wrong of him to imply that the preceding debate in any way was wasting time any more than this important debate on the shipbuilding industry in any sense has been a waste of time. I hope that he will reflect on those remarks and try to stop putting his foot in it in future.

We have heard contributions from nearly all the major shipbuilding regions in the country, particularly those represented by Opposition Members. My hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown), in a powerful and logical indictment of the Government's proposals, referred to Swan Hunter. He and others of my hon. Friends were at a meeting earlier this evening with the managing director and industrial relations director of that company. In the course of the meeting, they made it clear to us that they were indeed ambivalent, if not worried, about privatisation and specifically about the provisions of the Bill for the termination of the scheme in December next year. They could not see the reason for this, and they will be making separate representations to the Government such as we will expect from other yards remaining within the public sector and those being privatised.

We heard also some powerful, emotional and emotive contributions from my hon. Friends the Members for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett), for Sunderland, North (Mr Clay) and most particularly for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon).

In the regional communities we would put it to the Government again that, as with the mining area communities, unemployment is already very often as high as 50 per cent. The unemployment is often made up of the long-term unemployed, those who have been unemployed for over one year. When my hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow referred to the practices of management in that industry, it reminded me of the practices of management in the motor cycle industry that brought that industry to its knees. No investment was being made in plant and machinery—the very fact which was so accurately and relevantly given by my hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow. This happened in the motor cycle industry in which we dominated the world market, just as we did in shipbuilding. We had 70 per cent. of the world market, not one penny was going into the industry, but the wife of the chairman was driving round Monte Carlo in a gold-plated Daimler, the late Lady Docker. That sort of attitude on the part of management has led to the crisis situations that we face in many of our traditional industries.

As to the spectre of privatisation, that was odd coming from the former leader of Wandsworth borough council, who pioneered so much of it with such enthusiasm. I refer to the hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope). I am pleased to note that he has remained present at least to hear these remarks. I hope that the spectre will come to haunt him as he now represents Southampton, Itchen. The Opposition would agree wholeheartedly with those sentiments, although they are not ones with which we would readily associate the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Chope: It is clear from what I said that I was expressing concern about delay in the privatisation in Southampton.

Mr. Robinson: I am sure that I need add nothing further to that. I will leave it to the constituents of the hon. Gentleman to interpret the obvious lack of concern that he has for them and the evident concern that he has for his own prospects on the Government Benches. There were further contributions from my hon. Friends the Members for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) and for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), who accurately spoke of the crisis that we face.

However, of course, this could be an industry of the future. After all, shipbuilding is not a dying industry. It is an industry in which there are applications for the new technologies. If we do not have those, where will the new technologies be used? Where will the new materials be used? Where will the robotics be used? Shipbuilding is there for control technology, for computer-aided design and manufacture. Without those applications in industries such as shipbuilding, those new technologies have nowhere to go for their application. That is why we are doing so badly in them, as the Parliamentary Under-Secretary knows only too well. In that situation, as many of my hon. Friends have said, all that the Government can do is talk about redundancies and make it clear to the House that they want as quickly as they can to wash their hands of any responsibilities in that respect, be it to the private sector or the small part of the public sector that they intend to retain.

We need a maritime plan that would involve the shipbuilding industry, both military and commercial, and the engine-building capability, both military—where we are totally dependent on foreign licences — and commercial. We need a policy that would link Government purchasing power to shipowners based in the United Kingdom. We need a rolling and committed programme from the Ministry of Defence. To none of those things has the Parliamentary Under-Secretary given us anything more than an evasive reply. We have had his tortuous, tortured remarks and self-contradiction of, "Now we all understand that it will all be levelled down." In other words, we shall have parity—not the parity of the existing national statutory scheme, but the parity of some punitive scheme that will apply equally to the public and private sectors.

Tonight the Parliamentary Under-Secretary has lost the argument, and he knows it. He has lost it because he never had an argument. The Government's approach is negative and pathetically inadequate. We can look forward to the future only with grave doubts and many fears for the industry, which the debate has done nothing to alleviate.

Mr. Butcher: I thank the hon. Member for Coventry, North-West (Mr. Robinson) for doing his impression of a Front Bench peroration, some parts of which we have heard before, some parts of which were unnecessary, and some parts of which were thoroughly and comprehensively inaccurate. If the hon. Gentleman had done his research, he would have found that the proposals that he put forward on new clause 1 were irrelevant. They would have taken twice as long as would be required under our proposal to give effect to virtually the same measure. Purely as a side issue, they would have made it very difficult for us to write off the national loans fund liability, for which we need legislation. That would have been the import of the hon. Gentleman's proposal.

I should like to clear up some of the general observations that were made. I do not know why we got involved in a post-mortem, but the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) seemed to imply that there was a difference between my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and the Department on the placing of the type 22 orders. I know that the hon. Gentleman had a problem in the previous debate in checking records and establishing hard data. If he looks at the debate on 9 January, he will find that I said:

"We equally recognise the concern in each"—

that is, all three yards—

"at the time it has taken to reach that decision, but it is essential that in reaching it we take fully into account all the factors, including the requirements of the Navy, the cost to the taxpayer, the performance of the yards and their need for work."—[Official Report, 9 January 1985; Vol. 70, c. 837.]

After that other factors are mentioned.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: The Minister is right in what he has read out, but then I rose, as I am rising now, to pin down the hon. Gentleman on whether competitive factors alone were to be taken into account, or whether wider social questions were to be taken into account. The Minister of State, who was sitting next to him, grinned because he realised the point. It was then that the Minister gave the answer that I read earlier, which was a precise pinning down to competitive factors alone. Then the Secretary of State went on to announce something quite different.

Mr. Butcher: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the biggest social factor in any constituency is the need for work—the rate of unemployment? Does he agree that the need for work is at the heart of any constituency's difficulties, in its social, welfare and other programmes? Is not the best way to ease demands on welfare programmes to increase the level of employment in a constituency?

Mr. Nicholas Brown rose——

Mr. Butcher: I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman again on this point. He is either deliberately misunderstanding it or he has difficulty in deciphering the clear language of Hansard.

The hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) said that we do not debate the corporate plan, and that we need opportunities for bigger and broader debates to show where we are going and what the future of the industry is to be. I understand his concern, and that was a legitimate point. He will know that on 25 July my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made a statement to the House on the 1984 British Shipbuilders' plan. The usual short debate that followed was dominated by doctrinaire arguments about privatisation, despite the fact that the plan had been made available to the House. Since then we have had several debates on various aspects of shipbuilding. On no occasion have the Opposition used the opportunity to challenge or debate the plan. Have Labour Members taken the trouble to go to the Library and to look at it? As usual, it is available there.

While we are on the subject, I hope that some Labour Members will join me in the hope—it is not too forlorn a hope, and may even be a distinct possibility—that the 200,000 compensated gross registered tonnes target in the corporate plan will be met in orders taken in this financial year.

I found the intervention of the hon. Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Clay) disgraceful. He should at least celebrate those two orders with us. He should recognise that the improvements for which the corporate management is asking in working practices and unit labour costs at that site are necessary. He will be aware that the unit wage costs at that site are higher than they are in some of the neighbouring sites. That is a legitimate target for the corporate management to try to bring in, in the light of the new order.

Mr. Clay: Will the hon. Gentleman accept that the nearest that British Shipbuilders has ever been to breaking even came during the 1982 financial report—when it got to within £19 million of breaking even, within the £25 million limit set by the Government—when it had a throughput of 400,000 tonnes? That corporate plan was suggested by the previous chairman, and it is only since the present chairman took over that there has been talk of the 200,000 tonne limit. That is one of the problems of British Shipbuilders.

Mr. Butcher: In his speech, the hon. Gentleman made comments about the previous and present chairmen. Time will tell, but at the moment the present chairman is out there fighting for orders. Some of the recent observations of the previous chairman do not seem to hold up under close examination. It would be far better if he spent a little less time justifying some of his past decisions, and a little more time in looking at the future of the industry. I am prepared, as the House should be, to give Graham Day the credit for fighting for the industry. He is out there now getting orders, and he will come back tomorrow, we hope, with an announcement on further orders. He is motivated to look after the interests of the industry, and I resent the comments made by the hon. Member for Sunderland, North and the way that he has sought to ascribe motives to the current chairman that are not of the best possible kind.

The hon. Member for Sunderland, North talked about the Scargill factor. It is regrettable that that was introduced into the debate. There will be another debate on another occasion, when no doubt that will be examined. I recall that my last visit to the north coincided with the day when the hon. Gentleman, who I understand is proud of being a member of the hard Left or is on the borderline between hard and soft Left, was having a contretemps on the picket lines. I recall that the hon. Member got the kind of publicity which no doubt he welcomes. When he talks about the Scargill factor, I would advise him, through you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, not to seek to link it to the shipbuilding industry, because one day people will discover that the Scargill factor caused great sadness and great bitterness.

Mr. Clay: The record will clearly demonstrate that I never used the name "Scargill" in any of my contributions. This indicates the hysteria on the Government Benches about the mining dispute. Conservative Members can talk about nothing but that particular name. I talked about massively high rates of long-term unemployment. Unemployment is a factor in both the mining and shipbuilding industries. In my constituency there are both mining and shipbuilding communities. That is why people are sick and tired of the Government's attitude. For the Minister to get up and talk about the Scargill factor when we are trying to talk about the fear of long-term unemployment in both mining and shipbuilding communities which are suffering from the same problem shows the Government's total lack of understanding and care.

Mr. Butcher: Members of the hard Left, both inside and sometimes outside the House, come dangerously close to celebrating human misery. They may view that as a driving force for their political ends, but the hon. Gentleman did not find it possible in his contribution to celebrate what could be a future for the yard about which he made representations both to the Department of Trade and Industry and in Committee upstairs.

When Opposition Members, in the context of shipbuilding, talk about the Government's social responsibility, they correctly say that there are other aspects of Government policy which should be of help in these hard-pressed regions and constituencies. Therefore, I remind the House once again that, in terms of regional aid alone, not even including Department of the Environment aid, since this Government came to power aid to Wearside has amounted to £31 million. In Teesside it amounts to £181 million, in North Tyne to £57·8 million and in South Tyne to £50·3 million. In Scotland — across the four travel-to-work areas where shipbuilding is still a major source of employment — we are talking about £137·6 million of aid. In Birkenhead the aid amounts to £174 million. That is not the behaviour of a Government who do not recognise that there are other ways of tackling the problems which Opposition Members have——

Mr. Nicholas Brown: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Butcher: No. I gave way to the hon. Gentleman on two occasions in the last debate. Once was certainly enough tonight.

The hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) made an obviously heartfelt contribution. I have already said that I cannot go along with the assertions that he made about the current chairman of British Shipbuilders.

The hon. Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett) linked his comment with a comment made by the hon. Member for Birkenhead and asked whether the industry has a future. That depends upon a number of factors. It has never been within the gift of an Industry Minister, of any political complexion, to say that there shall be a shipbuilding industry with a merchant sector of a certain tonnage for a certain period of years. The market that affects that question has always been out there somewhere. What we have said in the House ad nauseam is that this Administration — like the previous Administration — recognise that, given that there is not a free market in international shipbuilding and that subsidies are paid by all of our international competitors, we have legitimately to do something to stay in the race. Would that we did not. It is absolutely right that my hon. Friends should fight for fairer competition so that we can escape from the subsidy spiral.

It is our duty to keep our industry in the race and not to throw public money at problems such as unit wage costs, new procedures and new investment, which may therefore be more difficult to solve. Through the intervention fund and other measures, we should find room to manoeuvre for our domestic shipyards.

The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) understood the Bill's basic point. An employee cannot opt to be made redundant. He must be asked if he wishes to be made redundant by the employer, who must first declare the redundancy programme. I cannot remember the hon. Gentleman's exact words, but whole droves cannot say that they wish to take advantage of the scheme in spite of the fact that a shipyard may not want a particular redundancy programme. Workers cannot exit in large numbers.

I was asked whether the deadline of 15 February can be extended for the bidders of a yard about to be privatised. Yes, the deadline will be extended if existing bidders have difficulties and——

Mr. Gerald Malone (Aberdeen, South): Is my hon. Friend aware that the management of Hall Russell shipbuilders advised me yesterday that an extension of the deadline was not necessary and that our right hon. Friend the Secretary of State had been advised of that? Indeed, the management of Hall Russell no longer wishes the deadline to be extended, it having reconsidered its position over the weekend.

Mr. Butcher: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I shall confirm that in the aftermath of the debate.

I commend these words to Labour Members:

"The Bill was not introduced in any way as part of a plan for redundancies. We do not have such a plan. It is designed to cope with the redundancies which will inevitably occur. I agree that it is not a happy Bill. We should have preferred not to introduce it, but we believe that it is right to do so and we ask the House to pass it."—[Official Report, 7 February 1978; Vol. 943, c. 1416.]

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Butcher: No, I shall not give way.

Hon. Members should know that those are the words of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman). He said then what we have to say now. We wish that the Bill was not necessary——

Mr. Bruce: I asked specifically what kind of topping-up scheme the Government would contemplate to succeed the present scheme, and the Minister has not answered that. I should be grateful if he would tell the House.

Mr. Butcher: That question was answered in Committee. The Government have said that they are prepared to cover the costs of the successor voluntary scheme within BS. The hon. Gentleman will recall that he asked the question in a slightly different way. He asked whether it was self-funding. The answer was that the transaction is neutral.

Mr. John David Taylor (Strangford): The Minister has referred only to BS. Will he explain the position in relation to the biggest shipyard in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Butcher: The right hon. Gentleman should be aware that the scheme is identical for Harland and Wolff. That yard too will be covered by a December 1986 deadline and will be given exactly the same detailed payments at exactly the same rate as will pertain on the mainland of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Taylor: I accept that the present arrangements are identical throughout the United Kingdom, but when the present scheme lapses will the future arrangements for Harland and Wolff be identical to those for BS?

Mr. Butcher: It is up to the managements of BS and Harland and Wolff to negotiate their voluntary arrangements, given the guidance of my hon. Friend the Minister of State.

I ask hon. Members to accept this innocuous Bill, which deserves the support of both sides of the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill read the Third time, and passed.

MILK (CESSATION OF PRODUCTION) [MONEY] (NO. 2)

Queen's Recommendation having been signified—

Resolved,

That, for the purpose of any Act resulting from the Milk (Cessation of Production) Bill ("the Act"), it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of any payments made under the Act by a Minister of the Crown for the purpose of compensating persons, who are or have been registered in the direct sales register or a wholesale register maintained under the Dairy Produce Quotas Regulations 1984, for reducing milk production.—[Mr. Boscawen.]

Milk (Cessation of Production) Bill

Not amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

Clause 1

PAYMENTS TO PERSONS CEASING MILK PRODUCTION

11.48 pm

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John MacGregor): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 11, at end insert—

'(1A) for the purpose of compensating persons who are or have been registered milk producers for reducing milk production, the Minister may make payments to such persons who have undertaken—

(a) to reduce their production of milk for sale or for the manufacture of any milk product for sale; and

(b) to surrender part of their milk quotas to the reserve.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 2 and 10.

Mr. MacGregor: The amendments honour a commitment that I gave in Committee in response to amendments tabled by the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) and for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells). Their amendments would have made it possible for compensation to be paid to producers who reduce production as well as those who give it up altogether. I accepted that it would be sensible to amend the Bill in this way and undertook to propose amendments on Report.

The purpose of tonight's amendments is to provide authority for payments to be made to producers who cut production and surrender a portion of their quota as well as producers who surrender all their quota.

It may be helpful for the House to know the background to the amendments. They do not apply to the present outgoers' scheme, which is non-statutory. I stress that current Community legislation does not permit payments to be made to producers in return for partial surrender of quota. Under article 4 of Council regulation 857/84, which permits the national outgoers' scheme, producers must discontinue production definitively—that is, entirely.

We have no intention of altering the existing non-statutory scheme. We do not intend to introduce a new scheme to allow partial surrender even if Community legislation allowed it.

We are introducing legislation in the Bill to give the cover of primary legislation for any future schemes of whatever type for the convenience, I hope, of the House now and in the future.

We do not have any future schemes in mind, but it makes sense to give appropriate flexibility to any future schemes. Partial surrender of quota would introduce further flexibility into the quota system. It is, therefore, sensible to provide the necessary enabling legislation. I commend the amendments to the House.

Mr. Brynmor John (Pontypridd): We are grateful to the Minister for meeting the serious points made in Committee and for recognising a serious omission from the Bill. The partial surrender of quotas could make available milk which could help the dairy industry in its critical state.

The Minister is right that the provision will have no present benefit, but I hope that he will not dismiss out of hand the need for a scheme and will seek approval in the EEC for some partial surrender policy.

The amendment, welcome though it is, shows how ill-considered and rushed the original scheme from Brussels was. Nevertheless, a needless restriction has been removed and for that we thank the Minister.

Mr. Geraint Howells (Ceredigion and Pembroke, North): The Minister promised in Committee to table an amendment, and I am grateful to him for keeping his word. I hope that what he has done will benefit dairy producers in the years to come.

It is a shame that part of the quotas could not have been given up before. More than 240 small farmers in Wales have gone out of dairy production. As I said in Committee, the Government have had their priorities wrong. They should have gone for the big dairy farmers first, leaving the small dairy producers as family units. Because of the policy that they have pursued, we have lost too many small dairy farmers.

Mr. James Nicholson (Newry and Armagh): I welcome the concession that the Government are making because it will help large dairy farmers to contract and have an easier time running their farms. They will be able to sell their extra quota; or they may wish to lease it, although the Minister wants them to sell it.

I am concerned about the lack of uptake in Northern Ireland of the buyers scheme. The amendment will be of no help in that respect because the scheme has been a total disaster. Indeed, I described the Bill as a disaster in the House on 10 January, and as the amendment will be of no help to Northern Ireland, I can only continue to regard the measure as a disaster.

An effort was made to buy out 66 million litres of milk in Northern Ireland under the buyers scheme. I understand that only a little in excess of 10 million litres has been bought, or one sixth of what had been hoped for. Apparently the buyers scheme is to be renewed and producers will be informed of its continued operation. For how long will it be open? While I do not wish to seem a pessimist, I fear that the renewed scheme will be no more successful than the earlier one. However, I wish the Minister luck with it.

How much milk will be awarded to expanders in Northern Ireland? The Department said that the expanders would receive 46 per cent. of what had been awarded, as against 57 per cent. in Scotland, and the percentages for England and Wales have yet to be decided. Again, therefore, Northern Ireland has lost out. Not only did we lose the 65,000 tonnes—I will not go into detail on that tonight; the Minister is aware of the point I am making —but we are also losing out in percentage terms.

Only 25·7 million litres are available to meet the expanders in Northern Ireland, and that is not enough milk to go round. The scheme has been a total flop and something must be done to bolster the scheme in Northern Ireland. Perhaps the Minister will answer some of the suggestions I made when we last debated the subject.

Sir Peter Mills (Torridge and Devon, West): I support the amendment as it is right that the provisions within it should be on the stocks and ready for use in future. It is obvious that we need more milk producers to surrender part or the whole of their production so that their quota can be reallocated towards other dairy farmers to make them viable.

The problems that the quotas have produced are so serious that the Community should consider the amendment carefully and that which the Government are seeking generally to do so that a part or the whole of the surrendered production can be reallocated to other dairy farmers. This problem overrides all others in farming and I should like to see further financial funds found from the Community, or possibly from the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, so that it can be overcome. I believe that farmers are prepared to give up some of the grants and other benefits that they are obtaining from the Ministry and the Community so that the problem can be tackled.

We have taken a small step forward, and I hope that the Minister will press strongly at Brussels to enable the surrender of part of the production of milk to become a reality. I hope also that the Community will find more money so that farmers can get out of the milk production and make other units viable. Something will have to be done, and I trust that my hon. Friend the Minister of State will take what I have said extremely seriously.

Mr. David Penhaligon (Truro): I welcome this sensible and rational amendment, and I am pleased that it is to be incorporated in the Bill. The Government must have been ill prepared when they accepted the original proposal that lies behind the Bill in the absence of the amendment. It is inconceivable that the Commission would not have agreed with the contents of the amendment at the time when the regulations were proposed. It is interested only in reducing milk production, and it seems that it is not really interested how that is achieved.

When the deal of £650 over five years was offered to farmers, I did not think much of it. I have been surprised, to some extent, by the interest that dairy farmers within my constituency have shown in it. Enormous interest was shown initially by many dairy farmers throughout the country, but the number putting a signature on the dotted line at the bottom of the page has not been overwhelming. The hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Nicholson) has told us of the serious position in the area which he represents.

I shall be interested to know whether the Minister believes that the outgoers scheme will adequately buy, as it were, the quota system. That is crucial and I should like to know whether the buy-out scheme is on target. It will be interesting to know the size of the farm that is now covered by the scheme as it is gradually extended. Some of those running small farms rejected it when they had had time to analyse it. We should have that information before we make judgements on the following amendments.

Mr. Anthony Nelson (Chichester): I intervene briefly to support the amendment. It is welcome, albeit to the extent that it is jam tomorrow.

I have received some allegations from dairy farmers in my constituency about which I have written to my hon. Friend the Minister of State. It seems that under the outgoers scheme the funds available will account for only about a third of the applications that are received. Unless further funding is made available, possibly at the expense of the capital grant scheme elsewhere, for the outgoers scheme, there will not be sufficient money to pay the applicants. If that is the case, a great many dissatisfied customers will be queueing at the door of the outgoers scheme. If that happens, there will presumably be even greater pressure for the type of scheme proposed by my hon. Friend the Minister from those who apply but are rejected because funds are not available from the outgoers scheme. Even though that scheme will not be implemented immediately, I suspect that there will be an increased demand for this measure — I presume that my hon. Friend will press for it in the Community — because there will not be sufficient funds under the outgoers scheme, which, as my hon. Friend said, is a separate scheme.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will fight his corner and go in battling to press for funding for such a scheme and for it to be sanctioned by the Community. I have written to my hon. Friend about one priority that should come first—interchangeability. Although that is separate to the proposed amendment, it is important. To a large extent, it should be afforded a relatively nil cost to the Community in that there is an offset between the increased quotas for production for direct sales and the decreased quotas for production for wholesales. As I understand it, this cannot be permitted under Community rules, although the Government are sympathetic to the idea. They propose that this measure should be allowed by the Community.

I hope that interchangeability will be given immediate priority, because I believe that it will immediately end injustice to those who had the foresight years ago to shift out of wholesales and into direct sales. Those people are prejudicially affected compared with farmers on the next form producing similar amounts with the same type of dairy herd. This problem needs to be tackled first, and I hope that, in pressing the Community for funds for the scheme, my hon. Friend the Minister will not forget the need to press for interchangeability.

Mr. John David Taylor (Strangford): The Minister is well aware that milk production in Northern Ireland makes a greater contribution to that region than milk production does in many other parts of the United Kingdom. The Minister, therefore, understands that the controversy during the past 12 months about milk quotas has had a greater political impact in Northern Ireland than it perhaps has had elsewhere in the United Kingdom. As the Minister is aware, Northern Ireland is the one part of the United Kingdom that is liable to milk quotas and superlevies.

We shall need greater assurances from the Government if my right hon. and hon. Friends are to find it possible to support the Government on this measure. Can the Minister assure us that quotas within the United Kingdom will be transferable on a regional basis? Will the hon. Gentleman assure us that next year Northern Ireland will receive the 65,000 tonnes which seemed to disappear last year?

Mr. MacGregor: I think that it is right to remind the House that this is a comparatively narrow amendment and does not relate at all to the existing scheme. Nearly all the points have been about the existing scheme. For the sake of good order, it would be more appropriate for me to reply on Third Reading to a number of the points that were made about the existing scheme. I believe that that would be the correct way in which to tackle this matter, because I have no doubt that other general points will be made. This approach will enable me to deal with them all at once.

If I had not listened to the debate in Committee, the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) would have accused me of having had a closed mind and not being open to reasoned argument. As I did listen to the debate, he has accused me of not having thought of the point before and of not having brought forward the Bill in a form so complete that there would be no point in discussing the Bill in Committee. I cannot win with the hon. Gentleman. I hope that on this occasion he will be graceful and allow that the way I did it was right, and support the amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 2, in page 1, line 13, leave out 'such payments may be made' and insert

'payments under subsections (1) and (1A) above may be made; and such a scheme may make provision as to payments under one or both of those subsections'.—[Mr. MacGregor.]

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): I beg to move amendment No. 3, in page 1, line 16, leave out 'may' and insert 'shall'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to consider amendment No. 4, in page 1, line 17, leave out 'or instalments'.

Mr. Home Robertson: This is about the scheme which is operating at present. I do not want to encourage people to have a wide-ranging debate, but it would be relevant on this group of amendments.

The first purpose of these amendments is to make it obligatory for cash payments to be made under the scheme. The second purpose is to provide for the payments to be made as a lump sum instead of by instalments. It is envisaged by the scheme and the legislation that cash payments by the Government will be mandatory and therefore I shall not dwell on that point. Our main objective is to require the Government to pay the outgoers' payments in a lump sum instead of in dribs and drabs as is happening at present.

Throughout our proceedings, the Minister and his right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food have made much of the horrors of negotiating with the Chancellor of the Exchequer. We sympathise. It must be distasteful to have to be within spitting distance of him, but it is one of the hazards of being a member of the Tory party.

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food went along to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and he made great play of the fact that he obtained £50 million for the scheme. There is considerable doubt about whether that £50 million is worth £50 million, for reasons that I shall develop later. There is a difference between £50 million cash down and £10 million a year for five years. To be precise, in real terms there is a difference of approximately £10 million if we allow for interest at 10 per cent. on those deferred payments. The difference might be substantially more if we allow for higher interest rates such as those we are experiencing at the moment, and continuing inflation.

The value to the outgoers of the final £10 million instalment could be wiped out as a result of inflation and interest rates. The Opposition have already said that the funding for the scheme is pathetic and far from adequate. There is widespread support for that view from all parts of the House and throughout farming. The national farmers unions in England, Scotland, Wales and practically everywhere else agree that the scheme does not go as far as it should if we are to release the amount of quota required for a number of essential purposes.

The Minister said that he had £50 million for the outgoers' scheme, but, as I have sought to argue, the real value to farmers will be closer to £40 million.

A small dairy farmer with 40 cows who takes part in the outgoers' scheme and who received the full payment all at once would have a lump sum of £26,000. It is a substantial sum of money and it would probably be sufficient to enable him to invest in building a different type of livestock enterprise or to buy machinery to change his system from grass to arable cropping. He would also be eligible for capital relief for tax purposes on the money, if he used it in that way.

However, as the Government are at present operating the scheme, that will not be possible. The hypothetical farmer with 40 cows will be given £5,200 a year for five years. Because of the nature of those payments, they are likely to be taxed as income. With £5,200, at current prices, one could pay for about half a tractor. If, in order to restructure his farm, the farmer borrowed enough money to realise, say, £26,000 — which is what the gross figure would be if he received the full value of the compensation—the effect of interest and inflation, with the five yearly payments, would reduce the value to the farmer of the total compensation by at least £5,200 in real terms. By the time the fifth payment was made, it would already have been swallowed up in bank interest alone.

In earlier debates we have emphasised the need for adequate funds to create new enterprises in place of the dairy units being shut down under the quota scheme. We have also said that we doubt the wisdom of winding up only the smaller dairy farms, as is happening under the scheme. The phased scheme is of very limited value as an incentive to restructure farms. Indeed, a farmer will only be able to invest in alternative enterprises if he borrows money and adds the risks attached to substantial borrowings to the trauma caused by breaking with his traditional livelihood in the dairy industry.

A single lump sum payment could be much more effective. Such an approach to the scheme would make it possible for people to restructure their farms, remain in some kind of production and continue to provide employment. Its virtues are self-evident. I invite the Minister of State to accept the amendment. I invite him to ask the Chancellor to honour in real terms his undertaking to pay £50 million for the outgoers' scheme. It would be in the Chancellor's interests to do so. He is reaping the benefit of the reduction in the cost of intervention and of the rest of the CAP so far as it involves the dairy industry.

Like myself, the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, is a farmer. I am sure that when the right hon. Gentleman sells a tonne of grain after the harvest, he does not offer the merchant extended credit terms. He expects money on the nail. Perhaps the Chancellor of the Exchequer should not be allowed to get away with extended credit terms. There is ample justification for making capital payments to enable people to restructure their farms and for providing full capital compensation at the start rather than paying out the money in dribs and drabs.

Sir Peter Mills: I cannot agree with the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson). To give a capital lump sum in compensation would be most unwise. It would create enormous practical problems. I do not wish to be rude to the Opposition, but the suggestion simply shows their lack of experience of what happens in a market when a large sum of money suddenly descends on it. There would be an enormous distortion in the prices of store sheep and store cattle, as every farmer taking advantage of the scheme suddenly tried to buy store cattle, beef cattle or sheep.

There would also be a serious effect on other agricultural production. My experience as a practical farmer is that other sections of production are worried about a sudden and large influx of money. Opposition Members have obviously not thought of that. If 10 or 15 farmers near a market town had a large lump sum with which to buy store cattle or sheep, prices would rise dramatically. That would not benefit the buyer or, in the longer term, the seller. My hon. Friend the Minister is right to phase the payments so that the money is fed in gradually.

I am not a tax expert, but I believe that, over a five-year period, there will probably not be any tax deductions on the compensation. I am happy to be corrected on that. The money should be phased in, or there will be terrible distortion for everyone.

12.15 am

Mr. Penhaligon: I always give the most careful consideration to arguments advanced by the hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Sir P. Mills). I wonder, however, whether farmers in his area all agree with what he said about a sudden injection of money. I have not addressed a meeting of farmers who, given the choice between money today and money tomorrow, think that they will be better off if they get the money tomorrow. Substantial sums of money will be released anyway because many cattle will be sold. In either case, I suspect that a good proportion of the money will go to the bank.

The best solution is to enable farmers to choose. Many farmers in my area are interested in the scheme, not because they want to restructure their holdings but because they are under some pressure from bank managers as the dairy industry is suffering cash flow problems, not least because of interest rates.

My experience of farmers is that they are sensible people who make rational decisions. The flexibility for which I am arguing would therefore be advantageous. I am sure that the Minister would not have much difficulty in persuading another place that such provision should be made.

The best solution is a choice, the second best is a lump sum and the third best is instalments. The lump sum would be better, not least because, despite what the hon. Member for Torridge and Devon West (Sir P. Mills) says, a considerable amount of the money will not go straight back into the market to buy sheep or whatever, but to the local bank manager to keep him quiet. The hon. Gentleman represents an agricultural seat and will know that a great deal of pressure is being placed on many farmers about their present cash flow position.

Sir Peter Mills: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his kind remarks. However, if that is the attitude of local bank managers, the matter is serious, because farmers who are leaving milk production will not be able to start production in another area. I hope that bank managers, or at least their agricultural advisers at the main banks who read Hansard, will assist farmers to change their production and not to follow the road suggested by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Penhaligon: The implication of the hon. Gentleman's remarks surprises me. He is suggesting that he is not aware of the current pressure from banks on farmers. I know of it because my farmers tell me about it when I meet them. It is an extremely serious matter. My hon. Friend the Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells) is looking for an opportunity to draw some cases to the attention of the House.

My point is that such schemes work best with the maximum flexibility possible. Flexibility on this point would be advantageous to the dairy community, even if there was a fiscal adjustment in the capital sum to prevent taking it as a lump sum from being an obvious financial gain. Flexibility would assist some farmers who find themselves in difficulties when making sensible and rational decisions relative to their positions.

Mr. MacGregor: The hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) tabled the amendments on two false bases, as I understood his opening remarks. First, he said that they would apply to the existing and future schemes. I must disabuse him of that notion. As the amendments are drafted, they could apply only to future schemes, as the existing scheme is non-statutory. Secondly, if I heard him correctly—I am not sure that this is what he meant—he said that he sought to give the possibility of a lump sum, presumably for future schemes, although obviously he was talking about the existing one. His amendments would provide exactly the opposite. They would remove the possibility of flexibility, which already exists in the clause. He seeks to remove "may" and to insert "shall". Therefore, he would do the opposite of what the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) advocates, that is, to keep flexibility for future schemes, if there ever are any. The Bill as drafted does precisely that. It gives the possibility of either a lump sum payment scheme or instalments.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): My hon. Friend the Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) said that flexibility should be in the hands not of the Minister but of the farmer. If the Minister admires and would like to encourage flexibility in the scheme, will he assure the House that that flexibility will be in the hands of the farmer, who can choose between the two when the scheme is in operation?

Mr. MacGregor: The existing non-statutory scheme is already in operation, and we have debated it on many occasions. The Bill gives further statutory authorisation for future payments under the existing scheme. At present we are using the appropriation procedure, but the sums are so large that it is not appropriate for all the payments under the existing scheme. If there is a scheme in future, the Bill as drafted will not pre-empt choice in the way that the hon. Gentleman's amendment would do.

The amendment is unwise for three reasons. First, it would tie the hands of any future Government to an unreasonable extent, because such a Government would have to be able—I repeat "would have to be able"—to find the money for the scheme in one financial year. In practice, that would mean either that the total amount available might be less than it would otherwise be—the hon. Gentleman said that it would have to be paid in one financial year rather than over a period—or it might act as a great disincentive to a future Government to introduce a similar scheme. If we accepted the amendment, we should be binding the hands of a future Government to one method that may be inappropriate in the financial year in question. The clause as drafted gives a future Government the option to introduce a lump sum scheme, or a scheme spread over a period, as with the present scheme. It is right to retain that flexibility. After all, that is what the hon. Gentleman sought to achieve with his amendment that I accepted in Committee.

Secondly, the amendment would mean that when a producer was assessed for tax the full payment in the first year would be treated either as income for the whole of the first year or, if we follow the present tax arrangements, as capital gains tax. That would lock many producers into a much less favourable choice than they have under the existing scheme, where, if they choose the income tax option, they can spread their income assessments, and hence their tax bills, over five years. The hon. Gentleman's proposal could lead to an increased income tax liability compared with the present arrangement. That would prevent the use of the flexible and favourable tax arrangements in the present scheme.

The hon. Member for East Lothian commented on the income position of producers who take up the scheme. He ignored the considerable cash sum that can come from the sale of the herd and the consequent tax advantages. The Finance Act 1984 extends the possibility of choosing that option. If farmers choose that option, the proceeds of the sale are tax-free.

Thirdly, the amendment is unwise because of the effect on the markets to which my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Sir P. Mills) referred. It is significant to note that the schemes which are often quoted in debates about outgoers — the French and German schemes—also phase out the payments. I am sure that those Governments had in mind the point that the Government and my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West make.

For all those reasons, I cannot commend the amendments to the House.

Mr. Home Robertson: I take the Minister's point about the drafting of the amendment. We made the rash assumption that the Government intended to introduce a scheme under the statutory provision which they are bringing forward. In tabling the amendment, we intended to provide that lump sums only should be made available. If the purpose of the scheme is to provide sufficient funds to farmers to enable them to restructure their businesses, they would need lump sums to cover the capital costs of new stock and machinery — [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Sir P. Mills) can shake his head and say that farmers can sell their cows, but he knows as well as I do that, in many cases, the dairy units about which we are talking are mortgaged up to the hilt. Therefore, the sale of the cows will go to pay off existing debts and will leave little, if anything, to pay for new stock or machinery.

The Minister made great play of the fact that he did not wish to tie the hands of an incoming Government. I can say only that the present Chancellor of the Exchequer will not be Chancellor for ever; indeed, the way he is going, he might not be the Chancellor of the Exchequer for much longer. There is nothing to demonstrate that we will be hampered for ever with the kind of prejudices with which we are stuck at present.

12.30 am

I was interested in what the hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West said. He gave an interesting insight into the conduct of agricultural marketing in the west country. He seemed to be admitting that profiteering was likely to take place on a massive scale. I do not know about farmers in Devon. I can tell him from my own experience of observing people in the farming industry buy and sell stock that in my part of the world it is difficult to profiteer when dealing with hard-nosed farmers. I did not find his argument very convincing.

The Minister and the hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West have let the cat out of the bag. These funds are not intended to provide sufficient capital sums to allow units to redevelop and recreate new employment to replace the jobs lost in the rural areas. This is a glorified agricultural supplementary benefit scheme. A relatively mean pension is being offered in an attempt to pay these people. Frankly, I am not impressed by the arguments that have been advanced from the Government Benches.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. John: I beg to move amendment No. 6, in page 1, line 17, at end insert—

'(4) A scheme under this section shall make provision for the surrender of a tenant farmer's milk quota without the necessity for the consent of his landlord to be obtained.'.

I suspect that the Minister will take the point that he took on the previous amendment, namely, that it refers to a future scheme. My response is that it is the only mechanism by which we can secure discussion of the arguments and problems which will have arisen under the present scheme and which will arise under any future scheme causing a considerable amount of hardship and vexation. This hardship will occur because of the crucial decision to attach the quotas to land rather than to a person.

This central decision has led to the necessity for a landlord to express his consent and, according to the farming press, to a number of disagreeable occurrences. At such a time the tenant is faced with a maximum period of pressure. After all, he will have decided to get out of an industry to which he may have devoted his life. In such a situation, the landlord sometimes — and this has happened regrettably in a minority of cases—seeks to attach conditions, one of which is that there should be an increase in rent. In the farming press one case was reported in which a condition was made not only that the rent shall be increased but that the period for which the rent obtained should be shorter then the legal minimum of three years. That takes advantage of a situation created, to put it neutrally, through no fault of the tenant farmer, and attempts to turn matters to the advantage of the landlord. In a third case described in the farming press, the landlord had invested very little in the original dairy undertaking. These cases evidence what has happened.

Need this happen? In Scotland there is no such condition for a landlord to give his consent. I cannot understand why the tenant in Scotland is so much more trustworthy or why the tenant in England and Wales is so much less trustworthy. The Scots system—although I would not want my hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) to take this as a precedent —is far superior to the system currently obtaining in England and Wales.

There is an argument for saying that the types of tenure should be treated separately, attaching conditions to the land in the case of an owner-occupier or to the person in the case of a tenant.

The amendment makes it obligatory on the Secretary of State to make provision for such surrender but does not specify the manner in which to leave the maximum flexibility. One way in which this could be done is for the tenant to be asked to notify the landlord of any application to take advantage of the outgoers scheme and to give the landlord the opportunity to make representations to the Ministry when it was considering whether the tenant's tenant should be allowed to take advantage of the outgoers scheme. That makes the opportunity for pressure to be applied directly by landlord on tenant far less. It is a more indirect process. Therefore, the leverage is less hard on the tenant.

We have heard of hard cases under the present scheme. We do not want them to be repeated. We hope that the Minister will take account of the representations and try to devise a scheme, by accepting the amendment, in which the landlord is not compelled to give his consent, but some other safeguard for his just and natural interest is devised.

Mr. MacGregor: I recognise what the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John) is trying to do. We have had long debates in the House about the position of tenants in relation to the outgoers scheme. I recognise that some tenants have not been able to obtain their landlord's consent to their becoming outgoers.

As the House knows, when drawing up the existing non-statutory scheme — the non-statutory element is important—we tried hard to get both sides, landlord and tenant, to agree on procedures giving tenants more freedom of action. However, that agreement was not forthcoming in England and Wales. As a result, we felt that we had no choice but to require the landlord's consent in all cases.

It might be helpful if I explained the significance of my remark about the scheme being non-statutory. Since the agreement was not forthcoming, there would have been legal risks if we had not insisted on landlord's consent, as well as some problems of equity. Obviously, the problems of equity relate to cases where the landlord has made a considerable investment. However, there were also legal problems which we had to face. If a tenant joined the outgoers scheme and surrendered his quota without the landlord's consent, it might be possible, depending on the terms of his lease, for his landlord to sue him for breach of contract. Moreover, the landlord might be able to claim that the Minister had incited the tenant to break his contract because the scheme is based on a contract between the Minister and the producer, and is therefore based on contract law and not on statute.

One of the reasons why we introduced a non-statutory scheme, and one of the advantages of doing it in this way, was that it enabled us to get the scheme off the ground more quickly, and we are a long way down the road of completing the outgoers scheme this year. This will enable us to reallocate the quota much earlier. I am sure the House will agree that that is an advantage. Considerable legal and other problems were involved, and in the end we could not do as the hon. Member for Pontypridd urged us to do.

[Mr. MacGregor]

In many respects it was unfortunate that we could not get the agreement, but in practice tenants account for a significant proportion of outgoers. I pay tribute to the president of the Country Landowners Association, who has genuinely urged his members to listen carefully to every tenant who wishes to take advantage of the outgoers scheme and be as forthcoming as possible. We are seeing the evidence of that in practice.

The hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) referred to Scotland, where the legal system is different.

Mr. Home Robertson: Thank God for that.

Mr. MacGregor: Not always. Also, the procedures that allow some tenants to become outgoers without necessarily obtaining their landlord's consent are fairly limited there. They are limited to situations in which there is no reference to dairying in the lease, and also to situations in which the landlord provides no facilities. There are one or two other details, but those are the two crucial ones. Although the scheme has operated in a slightly different way in Scotland, it is not carte blanche. It is fairly limited. The results are interesting to compare. Some 36 per cent. of payments made in Scotland so far have been to tenants, and about 30 per cent. of those who received payment as outgoers by 25 January in England and Wales were tenants. Therefore, there is not a great deal of difference. That demonstrates both that the urgings made by the president of the CLA have had an effect and that many landlords are trying to meet their tenants' wishes. Although we tried hard to get an agreement along the Scottish lines, in practice many tenants can take advantage of the outgoers scheme.

In England and Wales, of the 40 per cent. who initially expressed an interest in the outgoers scheme, 30 per cent. are getting payments. We know from the way that the outgoers scheme has operated that it is not just the fact that they cannot get the landlord's consent that has prevented some of the others from taking advantage of the scheme. It is also that, in many cases, as with owner-occupiers, when they are faced with a firm offer, they decide not to take it up. It is difficult to be exact, but a considerable number of tenants are taking advantage of the scheme.

Mr. Geraint Howells: I am interested in what the Minister has said, but I cannot understand why so many landlords in this country are willing for the tenants to go for the outgoers scheme. I am sure the Minister will agree that the property is worth much less once the quota has been taken away.

Mr. MacGregor: Obviously, it will vary. In each case people will be making voluntary choices, and they will look at their situation and make their decisions. The evidence is that so far 30 per cent. of the payments have gone to tenants.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): I have been listening carefully to the figures which the Minister has quoted. They are interesting, but they do not substantiate his argument. The fact that 36 per cent. of farm tenants in Scotland and 30 per cent. in England and Wales have gone into the scheme must be related to the proportion of Scottish holdings which have tenants, in relation to the number in England and Wales. Even more important, we do not know what proportion of the tenants in England and Wales may have wanted to go into the scheme but have not made an approach because they knew the attitude of the landlord. That is the critical thing, and, given what the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells) said a moment ago, the experience is that large numbers would like to go into the scheme but cannot do so for the reasons that I have set out.

Mr. MacGregor: We can go on endlessly debating this matter, but we do not have the precise market research that will give us the answer. I can tell the hon. Gentleman that 39 per cent. of the applicants for the outgoers scheme in Scotland were tenants, and 40 per cent. in England and Wales. The figures are not far different. Despite the fact that we have not been able to get an agreement, it is still the case that a considerable number of tenants have been able to take advantage of the outgoers scheme. Beyond that we are speculating, because we do not have the information to come to conclusions.

Mr. Penhaligon: The Minister has twice said that he tried to get agreement on the Scottish lines and failed. Who has the veto on this agreement?

Mr. MacGregor: If we were to get this through a non-statutory scheme—I have already referred to the legal difficulties—it was necessary to get an agreement to which both sides, the landlords and the tenants, were able to agree. We ran into difficulties and it was not possible to reach agreement because of the many legal complications that might arise. Nevertheless, it is worth re-emphasising that the president of the Country Landowners Association urged landlords to be as sympathetic as possible to tenants requests. That must have had some impact.

Having dealt with the position to date, I should now deal with the amendment. In moving the amendment, the hon. Member for Pontypridd spoke about the problem that the quotas are attached to the land. This connects with the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson). At the moment the quotas are, in effect, attached to the land, and that is in the Community regulations. That was done for a variety of reasons, in particular because the Commission felt that that was the best way to make a scheme which was not open to anomilies and abuses in the various member states, and about which there would be more certainty of application.

In due course we shall be seeking to put more flexibility on this aspect into the quota system, but the first priority was to get the quota system applied, and to get on with the outgoers scheme and the allocation of quotas. The second priority was to get changes in mixed business. The third priority was to start discussing ideas of greater flexibility. I refer both hon. Gentlemen and my hon. Friend to the paper produced by my Department on the mobility of quotas, where all of these matters are discussed. It is will worth studying. In case there is an opportunity to discuss these matters in the Council of Ministers, we asked the industry to respond by the end of last month, and this it has done. We are assessing all the reactions that we have received to the ideas we put forward for introducing greater flexibility and greater transferability into the quota system. Some producers detach the quotas from the land.

Once we have made up our minds about what we wish to obtain, agreement has to be reached in Brussels. We have to ensure that the Commission is interested in our proposals, and the Council of Ministers then has to agree them. A number of member states are still wedded to the idea of the quotas being attached to land. Therefore, I do not underestimate the difficulty of obtaining greater flexibility. However, it is clear from our paper that we should like there to be greater flexibility.

I referred earlier to the legal difficulties surrounding the existing scheme. I should make it clear to the House that the amendment would not remove the risk that, in certain circumstances, a landlord whose tenant surrendered the quota without consent might be able to take action against the tenant for breach of contract. The obligation of a tenant to a landlord is contractual. If a tenant surrendered the quota without the landlord's consent, he might be in breach of contract, though not necessarily. It depends upon the terms of the contract. The secondary legislation which could be involved if the Bill were used on a later occasion could not change contractual rights unless the enabling primary legislation says that it can. That is the problem about the amendment. I do not want to make too much of that point because I recognise the difficulties surrounding the drafting of amendments. However, I have to make the point that the risk could still be there.

The more important point in relation to the amendment is that it is worded in such a way that it would apply only to future statutory schemes, not to the existing scheme. If at anytime we were to introduce a new scheme — I repeat that we have no such plans — I hope that we should be able to make more satisfactory arrangements for tenants. The statutory nature of the scheme would make that easier, but the amendment is not necessary to enable us to do this. Even without the amendment, we should be able, if we were able to overcome the problems, to operate a statutory scheme which did not insist upon the landlord's consent. Therefore, I believe that the amendment is unnecessary and unsatisfactory for the reasons that I have given and I am afraid I cannot commend it to the House.

Mr. John: The Minister has unduly relied upon technicalities which I had already conceded. These amendments are vehicles for debating important subjects. The Minister has not dealt, except in the most general way, with the position as between landlord and tenant. The point I raised was that, having attached the quota to the land, the landlord's consent was necessary, although he has played no real part in building up the dairy industry upon that land. Therefore, I urged the Minister to ensure that a system would be adopted under which at best the landlord's legitimate concerns can be expressed only indirectly.

The fact that the legal advice, which the Minister has received has been fairly weightily placed in his brief will not, I hope, prevent him from looking at the very real problems that exist in a minority of cases under the present scheme. I hope he will make sure that they do not happen again, by ensuring that the part the landord has to play is more indirect than it is at the moment. The present system is far too direct.

In view of what the Minister has said about the inapposite nature of the amendment I shall not press it, but I hope that he will not forget its underlying sentiment. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Home Robertson: I beg to move amendment No. 7, in page 1, line 17, at end insert:

'(4) A scheme under this section shall fix the amount of surrendered quota to be accepted at such level as will enable milk producers making development claims to produce in full such secondary wholesale quotas as have been allocated to them'.

The purpose of the amendment is to extend the objective of the outgoers scheme in order to take account of the acknowledged needs of producers who have good reason to expand their production above their primary quota. That may not be only in the interests of the individual producers, but many feel that such expansion is in many instances in the interests of the dairy industry.

At present the Minister has said that his objective is relatively limited. He is seeking to buy in sufficient quota through the outgoers scheme in order to redistribute that quota to those smaller producers who want to try to stay in business in order to allow them to come back up to their 1983 production level. The Minister has said that he needs 289 million litres for that objective in England and Wales.

In reply to his hon. Friend the Member for Devon, North (Mr. Speller), on 28 January the Minister said that he could possibly obtain up to 400 million litres if he accepted all the applications under the outgoers scheme. We appreciate that by no means all of those options could be realised. It is likely that that some of those who expressed an interest might not want to go through with it. Nevertheless, that sort of figure could give the Minister sufficient quota to top up all the small producers and to release an additional 100 million litres of quota for producers with special needs.

That is on the basis of current offers under the present scheme which some hon. Members have described as cheap and nasty in the past, and I stick to that description. We are inviting the Minister to recognise the need to make more quota available for redistribution and to increase the scale and scope of the outgoers scheme accordingly, especially in line with the possibility which has now been opened up under the amendments moved by the Minister earlier for partial cessation of production under some future scheme.

It is worth looking briefly at the background to the situation. The Ministry has set up an empire of tribunals and committees to assess the special needs cases, including those who want to extend production. Those tribunals have reached their conclusion in Scotland and will soon publish their recommendation for England, Wales and Northern Ireland.

We know that the recommendations made by the tribunals in Scotland will have to be cut back by 42·5 per cent. Because there is not enough secondary quota available for redistribution. Those figures have been tallied up in Scotland. We do not yet know the story in England and Wales. The inspired rumours that we see in the farming press seem to show that for England and Wales the cutbacks could be as much as 35 per cent. and for Northern Ireland as much as 55 per cent.

That makes a farce of the rigmarole of trying to work out how much additional quota should be distributed to people with special needs. We have a system of quasi judicial tribunals, assessing need and having to observe extremely harsh criteria in doing so. They are going on to make recommendations of the rock-bottom needs of farmers in those special circumstances and then the Minister will only be able to allocate perhaps two thirds of those recommendations at the end of the day. All that performance and still there is no way of satisfying that proven need.

[Mr. Home Robertson]

We for our part want the scheme to work. We want it to enable those who remain in dairying to thrive. We also want it to provide enough cash to enable those who come out of dairying to set up new enterprises on their farms and to sustain the local rural economy. The scope of the scheme is patently hopelessly inadequate. We urge the House to consider whether the amendment would make the scheme match up to the need.

Mr. Penhaligon: This is the key amendment. Unless the Minister makes a move, the farmers who have produced their accounts and books, have taken days off from the farm and travelled miles to the tribunals will be outraged. These farmers have worked and worried for months to find out whether they will receive extra quota, but after the great day arrives and they are given their quota, they will be told that there is not enough quota to go round.

This amendment would help the Government. I am sure that the Minister wants to help, if only he is given the opportunity. If we approved the amendment, he could go to the Chancellor and explain the enormous pressure and outrage amongst those who know about farming communities. He could then produce the few extra million pounds needed to square the circle. If the matter is not given serious attention, the whole quota scheme will come into disrepute.

Shortfall has been referred to. Scottish farmers give more substance to the case. Government Members representing Scottish constituencies have argued that the matter needs attention. Rumours suggest that there is a 30 per cent. shortfall. If that figure is not correct, we shall cease to worry, but I fear that it is correct.

We have an opportunity tonight to save a great deal of outrage and anger among local and national farmers' unions. Without the amendment, the final lunacy of quotas will arise. Quotas will be given, but they will be snatched away again. Farmers in Devon, Cornwall, East Anglia, mid-Wales and Scotland will not understand the logic of that, no matter how the Minister tries to explain it.

Sir Peter Mills: I was not planning to speak, but I feel that I must after what the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) said. He is not being fair. On each of the quotas a warning was given. That must be said. Only a certain amount of cake—a certain total of quota—is available to be divided as fairly as possible among all the dairy producers. It is a difficult task, and I pay tribute to the panels and tribunals. They have conducted themselves to the best of their ability.

I have always said that a quota scheme can never be fair. It never will be fair. It is the wrong way. I am an end price man—and always have been.

Can we get an extension of the outgoers scheme? I want that, but where does the money come from? I am certain that we shall not get it from the Treasury. It was hard enough to get the £50 million out of the Treasury.

The farming community accepts that there should be more savings within the Minister of Agriculture's budget. This is the major problem in agriculture. It is more important than anything to provide more money for the outgoers' scheme.

Savings of between £7 million and £8 million within the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food would be enough to make the position much happier. Alternatively, another method, one which I favour, would be to persuade the Community to pay. It is important for the Minister to fight hard in Brussels to see if money can be obtained from that quarter for an extension of the outgoers scheme.

I agree with the hon. Member for Truro that there will be great disappointment when the final figures come out and farmers see the amount of quota that they will be allowed. Many dairy farms will not be viable, and the only answer is an extension of the outgoers scheme. Finding the money is the problem. I suggest either savings within the Department or more money from the Community.

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): I had not intended to speak, but the remarks of the hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Sir P. Mills) drew me to my feet. The hon. Gentleman has visited my constituency and met members of my local NFU. If he comes again, he will have a chilly reception, following his comments tonight about the fairness of the tribunals.

The former president of the NFU called me to his house last Saturday and told me how he had suffered an outbreak of summer mastitis in 1981 and 1982. He took his case to a tribunal, before which, in 15 minutes, he got what he did not regard as natural justice. He is a member of the magistrates' bench in my constituency and is suffering —[Interruption.]

Conservative Members can giggle at that if they wish, but if one has an overdraft of £100,000 and bank managers at the front door, if one is losing quota and if one has no hope of making a living in the coming years, it is a serious matter. That state of affairs faces far too many farmers in my constituency and elsewhere. The system of appeal before tribunals has been grossly unfair and it should never have been allowed in the first place.

Mr. Ashdown: The hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Sir P. Mills) says that there will be disappointment when it is known that the quota to be distributed may be 35 per cent. less than farmers now believe they have. If one speaks to the farmers in my constituency — I am sure that the same applies to farmers generally—one hears that they believe that the quota that they have received is the figure for the secondary quota.

My hon. Friend the Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) is right to say that after the performance through which they have been—he described it as a quasi-judicial process, and that is what it is—there will be outrage. They had to produce facts and figures and present their cases in detail.

The Minister said that he had looked for a process that would produce a sense of justice, albeit—because the scheme had to be produced more quickly than he would have wished—a sense of rough justice. Many farmers in my constituency are complaining about the roughness of the justice. There is wide disparity between the decisions of the various tribunals. However, that will be nothing when the farmers realise that the quotas that they thought they had are no longer theirs.

It may be, as the hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West said, that we have been forced into a position which produces that unhappy result. Perhaps, as he suggested, the Minister will be able to get some more money from Brussels. He will not get any from the Treasury, that is for certain.

But that is not what we are discussing. The Bill is related not to the current situation but to what we shall be producing in four or five years' time.

Thus, the measure is concerned with a system which, because of the time factor, we should be able to get it right. Surely we do not want to perpetuate the present injustices. Surely we want to construct a scheme in which the quota which is surrendered matches the quota which is dished out. If we cannot provide justice now, we should be constructing a scheme that will provide it in future. I saw the Minister nod. Surely he must want that element of stability and justice. I do not understand why he feels that he must reject a system that is fairer than the one in the Bill.

Mr. MacGregor: I shall explain again to the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) what we are talking about. We are discussing the provision of more permanent statutory approval for future payments under the existing scheme. Secondly, we are taking the opportunity to give proper statutory backing, if ever there should be a further scheme, although I have made it clear that we have no intention of introducing a further scheme. The amendment applies to future schemes.

There is a dilemma and a problem over secondary quotas. It is important to start with the understanding that both base year revision claimants and expanders are involved. The provision for their secondary quota comes from the reserve for special cases which we created when we gave a primary quota to everyone of 9 per cent. As the national cut was just over 6·1 per cent., there was a reserve of just over 2·9 per cent. The reserve is being used for base year revision claimants and expanders. I am talking about wholesale producers and not direct sellers. The provision will not come from the quota that we are taking in under the outgoers' scheme because we are using that to help small producers and exceptional hardship cases. It is the special reserve that enables us to meet the special cases.

There are many producers who have expanded considerably since 1981 and they have caused the national cut to be 6·1 per cent. There are also many producers who have heeded the warnings about excess dairy production in the Community for many years and restrained their production. Many measures, which proved ineffective, were taken over the years to try to restrain milk production, and the producers who have shown restraint do not see why their production should be cut even more to make provision for the expanders. It is a difficult balance to strike, but I believe that we have managed to do so. That is the way in which we are dealing with the developement cases this year.

Mr. Geraint Howells: Can the Minister explain why so many dairy producers expanded their production between 1981 and 1983? The answer is Government policies to produce more and more milk.

Mr. MacGregor: Many producers took advantage of the various developments, the main ones being Community schemes, during that period. They did so in the knowledge that we were producing a surplus of milk production in the Community of substantial proportions, the cost of disposing of which was getting greater year by year. I have talked to many producers who have said, "We could see that there would have to be further restraining measures and so we did not increase our production." We had to pay heed to the problems of those producers as well as the others. It is in that way that I think that we struck the right balance.

We have made every effort to enable the panels and the tribunal to implement the process that has been established. I hope that the tribunal will soon—certainly before the end of the month—have finished its work. We shall then be in a position to tell the producers who have had provisional allocations from the tribunals what the final allocation is.

Mr. Andy Stewart (Sherwood): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. MacGregor: I know that hon. Members are anxious to proceed. I just want to develop this point. We have made it clear from the outset of the secondary quota process—as a number of my hon. Friends including my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Sir P. Mills) have said—that, if there were not enough quota available at the end of the day for all the allocations that the panels and tribunals gave, we would have to scale them down. We have never pretended about that and have made it clear from the start that it was probable that the scaling down would be substantial.

Mr. Stewart: I am sorry to intervene. I did not catch Mr. Deputy Speaker's eye. We have heard about how the panels arrived at their decisions. What profession made up the panels?

Mr. MacGregor: We endeavoured to have on the panels people with a wide range of experience. The panels included a considerable number of people who had been dairy producers, solicitors, land agents and accountants — a range of people who had the expertise and judgment combined between them to make the decisions based on the case made by the applicants. That operation had to be conducted quickly because we were anxious for every producer to know as quickly as possible where he stood. A splendid job was done by my Department in finding the people for the panels. It was not an easy task to increase the number of tribunal members from 12 to 90 over the Christmas period and expect them to work full time. We did as well as could be expected in obtaining that range of experience.

We have never made any secret of the fact that there will be a scaling down. In England and Wales that will depend on the final allocations by the tribunal for secondary quota—they are not all in yet—and on the final figures from the Milk Marketing Board. We are dependent on the board to ascertain what it has allocated for primary quota. It looks as though the scaling down will be at least 35 per cent. We have previously made it clear that that would be the case. We do not yet have the final figures from the Milk Marketing Board or the tribunals to enable us to be absolutely firm. We hope to be firm as quickly as possible.

A number of hon. Members have made the point that they want extra funding for the existing scheme, and that was the theme on Second Reading. I repeat what my right hon. Friend the Minister said to the House on 10 January. Given the Government's desire to reduce Government expenditure and the fact that there is substantial support for the dairy sector in other ways through the common agricultural policy, we can give no promise of an extension of the existing scheme.

[Mr. MacGregor]

Obviously, in a future scheme it will be open to any Government to cover any milk matter in whatever way they wish and with whatever funds they feel that they can make available. Therefore, it will be up to any Government, if they wish to consider a future scheme, to decide the amount of the funds available as well as the methods—a lump sum or payment over a period of years. There probably will not be development claims or secondary quotas in any future scheme, because the secondary quota process will be finished by the end of the month. It is a mistake, therefore, to tie down any future scheme in this way. It inhibits flexibility and is unnecessary. Therefore, again, I cannot commend the amendment to the House.

Mr. Home Robertson: The Minister does not have a terribly good story to tell, and I think he knows it. There is a serious shortage of quota for redistribution to people with urgent needs. That point has been made abundantly clear by hon. Members from both sides of the House.

The hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Sir P. Mills) was a lone voice coming to the support of the Minister. He said that the people had had a warning and should have known that scaling down would be necessary. That is not much help to those who are involved and who are trying to keep their businesses alive. They cannot milk warnings, although I suspect that the Minister and his hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West were trying to do that this evening.

1.15 am

The Minister said that the people who were expanding their herds until the last minute should have known that there was trouble on the horizon. He cannot have it both ways. Right up to the eve of the sell-out by the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food last March, I think, his Department was paying incentives to people to expand. The Minister is saying that people should have seen the smoke signals. The danger signals were there right enough but within weeks of introducing the quota system the Minister's Department was paying cash grants to people to expand their herds and invest in new equipment.

The story is not a happy one for the Government, and it is disastrous for many dairy farmers. They are faced with a "Catch-22" situation. When the quota system was introduced it was dressed up and it was to be as fair as possible. That is right. The Minister set up the tribunals and all concerned went along to present their cases. The House might have gained the impression from that that it was intended to satisfy proven need. That is not so. We have heard the figures. The scale-down from the proven need as assessed by the tribunals in Scotland is 42·5 per cent. The Minister has now admitted that it will be at least 35 per cent. in England and Wales. We understand that the figure could be substantially higher in Northern Ireland.

There is a way to obtain additional quota to satisfy that need. [HON. MEMBERS: "How?"] Through the outgoers scheme. That is what we are debating. It would be necessary to expand the scheme to buy in sufficient quota from people who are willing to leave or partially reduce their dairy herd, as will be possible through the new scheme under the amendments which the Minister has moved. That is how additional quota could be made available to try to introduce some fairness into the shambles which the Minister has managed to create.

We need an expanded outgoers scheme. If there was an ounce of fairness in the Minister he would accept the spirit of the amendment.

Title

Amendment made: No. 10, in line 5, after 'discontinuing', insert 'or reducing'. — [Mr. MacGregor.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.—[Mr. MacGregor.]

1.27 am

Mr. David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): It is extremely late, and I shall not detain the House for long. I do not normally speak on agricultural matters for the very good reason that my party is full of experts on agriculture. They have made several notable speeches today, especially my hon. Friend the Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells), who discussed the administration of milk quotas.

The Government should count themselves lucky that such a small proportion of right hon. and hon. Members represent agricultural constituencies and that even fewer members of the public understand what has gone on in the milk quota system. If it had happened in any other suject that was understood by the urban electorate, there would have been a real sense of outrage, considering that in recent years taxpayers' money, not just Government exhortation, was put into schemes to expand milk production, some of which I have seen in my constituency recently. A few years later, we are putting more taxpayers' money into schemes to stop people producing extra milk. That is an Alice-in-Wonderland position. The first moral, which the Minister will acknowledge, is that there must be longer-term planning at European and domestic levels of the production of agricultural commodities.

Secondly, although the Bill is designed to bring relief to the smaller herds, the smallish herds on single-purpose farms will be most hit by the quota scheme. The larger farms with varied production can divert some production and acreage from dairying to other disciplines. That is not the case with farms, such as the one I visited in my constituency, with between 50 and 100 cows, which are a single-purpose unit. It is impossible for them to diversify into another form of production. The hardship of the milk quota system has fallen disproportionately on smaller farmers. The scheme should have been changed so that those with large lush acreages had more taken from them and a greater opportunity to diversify into other forms of agriculture.

Thirdly, the House should be extremely worried about the tribunal or panel system, which has been erected to cope with the difficulties that have arisen. In our political system it is normal that with tribunals, there is either a system of appeal or ministerial override and responsibility in the House. In this case there is neither. Once a tribunal has made a decision, the decision is not open to discussion with the applicant, his Member of Parliament, his accountants or legal advisers, nor is the Minister responsible in the House for it. That cannot be healthy for our democratic system. The Government came into office dedicated to abolishing quangos. Yet they have set up a new system of quangos, which are entirely unanswerable.

The Government have a sorry record. I do not blame the Minister for that, because he is relatively new to the Department. During the past five years the Government's record does not bear close examination. In agricultural constituencies throughout the land there is a genuine sense of outrage at the way in which they have been treated.

Mr. Wigley: I shall speak briefly on Third Reading because of the significant effect of the dairy saga in Wales. In Gwynedd, especially in Dyfed——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will address himself not to that point but to the Bill. This is not Second Reading, but Third Reading.

Mr. Wigley: As I said, I am addressing myself to Third Reading because of the significant effect that the saga has had on Gwynedd and Dyfed, and the fact that the Bill does nothing to alleviate that, as it was intended to do.

Earlier we heard of the great likelihood of an insufficiency of resources to meet the needs and to safeguard the interests of dairy farmers. In Scotland more than 40 per cent. of the expected additional quota is being cut, and in Wales and England a cut of 35 per cent. is likely. There is no provision for financial compensation for that shortfall from what has been shown to be the necessary level of additional quota to make farms viable.

In my area, many farmers have waited for weeks to discover the results of those tribunals. They do not know where they stand, and now there is the additional uncertainty that, even if they receive an additional quota from the tribunal, it may not be granted to them. The farmers in my area want the Secretary of State for Wales and the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to go to Brussels and insist that additional quota is made available to Wales, because there is no provision in Wales for alternative farming. The land and the climate do not allow it——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. On Third Reading, hon. Members must address themselves to what is in the Bill. This is not a Second Reading debate. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will address himself to what is in the Bill.

Mr. Wigley: The Bill's failing is that it does not make the necessary provision to meet the problems of my constituents. It was put forward on Report as though it were doing so. It is not. That is why the House divided a few moments ago, and that is why there is great consternation, sometimes leading to riots, as we saw in south and west Wales in recent months.

This subject should not be treated lightly, even at this late hour. It is a matter of great concern to hundreds of producers in Wales, and that is why the Opposition are not satisfied with the Government's proposals. We expect further steps to be taken; at the very least, Ministers should return to Brussels to ask for more quota. In those circumstances, we should reject this inadequate Bill.

1.36 am

Mr. Geraint Howells: After visiting dairy farmers in the county of Dyfed in west Wales over the weekend to discuss the outgoers Bill, I was dismayed by the apparent irregularities and anomalies that are being revealed by the quota allocations. I deplore the devastation caused to the dairy industry by the Government's policy of the imposition of milk quotas without thought, consultation or foresight.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House have mentioned relevant and important matters during our debates on the Bill. Many farmers who bought their farms in 1983 are in dire trouble, and I am worried that the Bill does not cater for the needs of farmers who bought their farms then. Yesterday, I had the privilege to visit a dairy farmer who had moved from Yorkshire to Pembrokeshire. I am sure that the Minister will not deny a Yorkshireman a living in Wales. He was determined to buy a farm just outside Fishguard, so he came down from Yorkshire and had a word with the local bank manager, who said that he would not allow him—[Interruption.] I am trying to make a case for the people for whom I feel sorry. If the Government do not do something in the near future, many of those who bought their farms in 1983 will go bankrupt.

I visited that farm and met the Yorkshireman, who is aged about 30, and is married with two children. They were crying. When I saw the child turning to its mother —[Interruption.] If hon. Members do not believe what I am saying, the name of the person concerned is a——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not question what the hon. Gentleman is saying, but I hope that what he discussed with his constituent relates to the Third Reading of this Bill.

Mr. Howells: With respect, Mr. Deputy Speaker—I am sure that many Conservative Members respect my views—I feel sorry for the young men who will go bankrupt within the next few years through no fault of their own. They were the unfortunate ones who took heed of Government advice to expand and to produce more milk. They moved from one farm to another. The farmer who moved from Yorkshire invested over £300,000 in his farm in Fishguard, and unless he has a substantial quota he will not survive. However, it is more than likely that he will not get it. The net result is that he and his family will have to sell up. The stock that he brought with him from Yorkshire, which is worth about £65,000, will have to go, he will become bankrupt and he will move back north.

There is no point in saying to those two or three farmers who have moved into Wales and to the local people who bought farms in 1983 that there is nothing in the Bill to cover for their needs. If the Minister and other hon. Members do not believe that this serious situation exists in west Wales, I invite the Minister to come and see for himself, with the Secretary of State. He will not need police protection this time, there will be no demonstration, and I assure him that he will be able to talk to these families and discuss the problems that will arise in the future. Next year it will be too late. The farms will have been sold and many of these people will have become bankrupt.

I hope that the Minister at this late hour will do something tonight about these people who are worried about what will happen tomorrow morning. Many dairy farmers have to go to the bank every fortnight to explain how they stand financially. It is a great shame that the Government have introduced such a Bill, because it is causing a great deal of concern to those living in west Wales. I am sure that the day will come when the Minister will regret ever having introduced the quota system in Britain.

Mr. John: An apt summary of the Bill at the end of our consideration of it is that it makes the worst of a bad job. It is not the Bill that has created the undoubted hardship and suffering about which Opposition Members have spoken. It is the agreement of the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to the quota system on milk which has caused the problem. The hardship would continue even if the Bill were defeated, and might well be exacerbated.

The scheme, which is partly legitimised by the Bill, is regarded now on all sides as a bungled job. Indeed, the Ministry itself recognises this in at least two respects with regard to the future. First, by the amendments that have been moved, the Ministry has recognised that a mistake was made in not including a scheme for partial surrender of milk quotas as well as whole surrender. It has laid down the statutory framework to do this in future. Secondly, by statement the Ministry has resolutely set its face against the repetition of the quota system in the restriction of cereal production. We have it on the authority of the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food that he will rely on the price mechanism rather than on what is enshrined in the Bill.

The reason why I go further and say that the Bill makes the worst of a bad job, granted that the initial agreement at Brussels was a very bad job, is that the decision is a national one. The scheme enshrined in clause 1(1) is a national decision and not a Community one. The hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Sir P. Mills) conceded that the scheme arose from a national decision. It is this provision of the Bill which has restricted the payment of £50 million over the five years of the scheme. On Second Reading and in the debate tonight, it would have been simpler and more straightforward if the Government had taken the opportunity given by the Bill and by the quota system to realign the dairy industry in accordance with modern requirements as they are now revealed. The Bill fails to do so from the point of view of the outgoers because it gives them no lead or direction on whether the Government want them to remain in or go out of dairying, or, if they want them to remain in farming, what other form of occupation in farming and agriculture they want them to carry on.

Because the Government have not accepted amendment No. 7 on the surrender of quota, many of those who remain in dairying will not have adequate quota to make their holdings viable, whereas the aim of a Government faced with a surplus of dairy products is to ensure that those who remain in dairying have adequate quotas whereby they can carry on viable businesses and purchase sufficient supplies to service those quotas. We have heard about the apeal that led to cutbacks done on the basis of the milk available rather than need.

Those are the reasons why the Bill does not settle either the shape or the form of farming. Many of those who remain in farming will do so not because of the golden future that they see, but because—I believe that this is what the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells) was saying—they cannot afford to get out of the system in which they are now trapped.

There are many examples of debts, to which clause 1(1) does not address itself. Mention has been made of Dyfed, and of overdrafts of £250,000 and, indeed, of over £1 million because of expansion. Perhaps the warning signs were there, but they were masked by Government encouragement for expansion. As a result, many people have got into alarming debts. The Bill has little or nothing to say to those people. It has nothing to say about the destruction of their life's work.

The scheme is described as an outgoers scheme. In fact, the Bill does not deal with all those who are going out. We have had this argument before, and I do not propose to rehearse it at length. I hope that the House will remember that people who are employed withing the dairy industry —directly in dairying, in transport, feed production and so on — will be made redundant as a result of the scheme. In particular, the most immediate and direct effect will be on employment in the creameries.

That is why I say that the Bill gives backing to a scheme that is inadequate, and miserably so. It was agreed in haste in Brussels. The Minister went out there saying that he was not prepared to agree to a quota system, and came back trying to sell it to the House. It is a monument to the failure of the Ministry. It talked about farmers not heeding the warning of recent years, but it has not heeded the warning of recent years. It has been a Mr. Magoo style of politics in which the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food went on believing that its will would prevail over that of its partners until it bumped into reality at Brussels and had to adopt a system that it freely confessed in its response to the Select Committee it still did not like and want.

Because the anxiety is so keen, as hon. Members have said, in the agricultural areas, because the uncertainties felt by dairy farmers are still so great, many of whom have claims still in the pipeline, and because of the hardship that they have faced and do face, I believe that there is a duty on the House tonight not to add to that uncertainty unless what is before it s totally repugnant. The scheme is certainly inadequate. It is certainly puny, too, but no one can gainsay that the principle of compensating those who are forced to go out of milk production by a Government scheme is correct.

While we have the gravest reservation about the adequacy of the scheme and we believe that another, better scheme will have to be devised when the results of this one become known, we would be wrong to take away from the producers who are still awaiting adjudication of their claims to go out from the dairy industry the protection of clause 1(1). The quotas will remain whether or not the Bill is passed. We would take away the ability of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and food to compensate for that scheme if we voted against the Bill, and it was not passed. Therefore, we shall not divide the House. Nevertheless, I hope that the milk producers will never again be put into such a position by such an ill-considered Bill, and such a helpless, half-thought-out scheme as that to which the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food consented in Brussels.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): I wish to speak in the debate because I am concerned about the fact that the endorsement of the Bill will effectively endorse the considerate waste of public money that has gone into the dairy industry as a result of the Government's incompetence over the past two or three years. That is why the Bill is of concern not just to rural Members of Parliament but to all Members.

Like my hon. Friends, I have been out and about talking to the farmers in my constituency. I have come across a farmer with a large farm. I support the purpose of the bill, which is to protect the small farmer. That large-scale farmer was able to set up a new dairy venture two years ago, for which he received no less than £250,000 of public money to invest in a new milking parlour and for which he now cannot get a quota to produce an economic throughput of milk. If that is not an example of Government incompetence and misuse of public funds, I do not know what is.

The House has every reason to be concerned at the way that this issue has been handled by the Government and the misuse of public funds that has gone into the scheme which the Bill represents in terms of future compensation.

In the circumstances, the House has to realise that the Government are asking us to support a move that will effectively condone the misuse of public money on a huge scale. One farmer getting £250,000 is indefensible. As there is merely barracking from the few Labour Members who are here, the Liberal party is representing the real opposition to the Bill.

Mr. MacGregor: We have had many opportunities to debate milk quotas recently, and I do not think that the House will wish me to go over the whole issue again at this hour of the night. Nor do I think that you, with your sharp eyes for order Mr. Deputy Speaker, would allow me to. I shall confine myself to what the Bill is about, and will not stray much more widely.

Had the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) been present for more of the debates that we have had on milk quotas, he would realise that, as usual, the Liberal party is speaking with two voices. I have been urged to spend more and more money on the outgoers scheme by that party, but he is now complaining about the misuse of public funds through the outgoers scheme. He should be more consistent and listen to the debates.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg (Hampstead and Highgate): Does my hon. Friend agree that the number of Liberals here tonight is the largest that we have seen after midnight since they propped up the Government of the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan)?

Mr. MacGregor: I gave way to my hon. Friend because, unlike some hon. Members who have spoken at the end of the debate, he has been sitting patiently in the Chamber throughout the debate.

On the three points made by the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel), I say to him with great respect and not in any antagonistic sense that if he had attended rather more of our agricultiure debates he would have understood some of the points that he criticised. First, he said that there had been considerable inconsistency in the Community's general approach to the dairy sector. It is not the sole responsibility of any one member state and it is certainly not the sole responsibility of this Government.

I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that schemes have been introduced at Community level which have not been thought through and which therefore have hot been effective. The previous scheme which was designed to encourage people to get out of the dairy sector was ineffective. That scheme was negotiated at Community level, and we do not always get what we want at Community level. The difficulty about the scheme was that a five year time limit was placed upon it. Therefore, a considerable number of people were able to get out of dairying with the help of public funds and were then able to re-enter it before the quota system was introduced.

I was always very critical about that scheme. I go further. I take the right hon. Gentleman's point that there was inconsistency about the considerable encouragement of dairy expansion schemes while the attempts that were made to cut back on the surpluses were ineffective. Nevertheless, it was entirely right that United Kingdom farmers should have the opportunity to take advantage of these schemes. They enabled farmers to become more efficient and effective and to update their businesses and expand. It was right that they should have this opportunity while this remained the Community's approach. The Government would have been very heavily criticised if they had taken a purist view and said, "We are not going to let our farmers have the benefit of Community subsidies while farmers in all of the other member states enjoy them."

The United Kingdom Government have consistently argued for price restraint in the dairy sector. If their warnings about the need not to have big price increases year by year in the earlier price reviews had been heeded, probably it would not have been necessary to introduce the quota system. But we were unable to carry the other member states with us. When the original Community reform proposals of the Commission relating to milk were made known we made it clear that we should have to consider getting a quota system into a form that would be acceptable to United Kingdom producers.

There were illogicalities and inconsistencies in the previous approach. Although attempts were made to restrain production, they did not work. Because production increased to the level that it did while the consumption of many dairy products was falling, and surpluses were therefore rising and the cost of disposing of those surpluses was going through the roof, something had to be done. The result was the quota system. It is interesting to note that no Opposition speaker has referred to the fact that the costs of disposing of the dairy surpluses with which we were faced when my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling) and I attended the discussions about reforms in the Council of Ministers were very substantial and indefensible. I hope the right hon. Gentleman recognises that we had to take painful decisions. We did not like having to take them, but we were faced with the real probability that Community money for agriculture would run out altogether if something was not done.

On the right hon. Gentleman's second point, he quite rightly referred to the fact that it is the smallish herds on single purpose farms that are hardest hit, but he has failed to take into account the fact that the Government agree with him about that. The primary objective of the outgoers scheme is to help the small producers who wish to stay in milk production. I believe that it is the most effective way in which we can help them.

I am sorry that the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells) repeated a point that he has made in Committee about which he knows I am convinced is wrong. He says that we were wrong to start giving the offers to the smaller producers to come out. The objective was to help the small producers who want to stay in. But the scheme was oversubscribed and we could not make offers to everyone. Therefore, we took the view that as the smallest producers with no other option may wish to have the opportunity to take up the outgoers scheme —it is entirely voluntary and would depend on their individual circumstances—it was right to give them the choice first to do so. But if none of them had taken it up I would not have blamed them and we should then have gone on to the bigger producers.

Mr. Geraint Howells: I am sure that the Minister is well aware that the Government, as a result of their proposals, have got rid of 241 small dairy producers in my county to try to help another 250 producers. It is a great shame that all the pressure has been put on the small producers.

Mr. MacGregor: I have told the hon. Gentleman many times that there has been no pressure whatever. His figures are slightly too large, but I do not quibble with that. We simply felt, and I think that small producers are grateful, that we should give them the opportunity first and it was up to them to decide. We have constantly emphasised that the real purpose is to help the small producers who wish to remain in dairy farming.

The hon. Gentleman should recognise that the small producers in Wales are being helped by the outgoers scheme because fewer small producers are taking up the option. About 13 per cent. are taking up the option of the outgoers scheme, but Wales will benefit from 25 per cent. of the quota to be reallocated. There is a considerable swing to small producers in Wales as a result of the scheme.

The right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale talked about the tribunal and panel system. The dilemma that we face was brought out by the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley), who urged us to get on with the scheme because all producers with secondary applications want to know where they stand. I agree. We have been eager to get them to a position where they know where they stand as quickly as possible.

Equally, we wanted a fair and objective scheme based on individual circumstances, properly assessed by a group of experienced people, not by ministerial fiat, so that the scheme could be seen to be fair and so that every producer was given a fair hearing.

Of course there are discrepancies in panel judgments, but there is an opportunity to appeal to the tribunal and it is the tribunal which takes a national view and can iron out any of those problems. Given the need to reach decisions as quickly as possible, the large number of producers making secondary applications and the need for a fair system, I think that we got the balance right. I should like to pay a considerable tribute to the members of the panels and tribunal who, in all the circumstances, have done an excellent job.

Mr. Penhaligon: Will the Minister confirm that the reality is that if a constituent came to his Member of Parliament and that Member went to the bother and effort, as we all have done for individual problems, to raise an individual case on the Floor of the House, and if it were presented so articulately that the Minister was convinced of the justice of the case, the Minister has drawn up the regulations in such a way that when the appeals procedure that is currently going on is completed the Minister could do nothing about it?

Mr. MacGregor: We set up the system bearing in mind the need to reach decisions fairly quickly. If we had followed the route that has been suggested with endless opportunities for appeal, we would be going on into next year and the year after and that would not have suited the producers who want to know where they stand. This was an unusual operation in order to deal with the situation.

The hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Nicholson) described the outgoers scheme as a complete disaster in Northern Ireland. That is putting it much too strongly. As he will know, 161 producers, representing 10·5 million litres in a full year, have already accepted the outgoers scheme. So there is already a considerable acceptance. But I agree that the response to the outgoers scheme has fallen short of our targets and been disappointing. It has not been a complete disaster, but it has been disappointing.

In conjunction with the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, as I said on Second Reading, we are continuing to look for ways to deal with the difficulties that arise from that poor response, but we are not yet in a position to reach decisions. We are still waiting to discover the final position on the England and Wales outgoers scheme. In the meantime, the scheme is to be reopened in the Province for two weeks from 11 February to see whether it is possible to bring in a further quota.

The right hon. Member for Strangford (Mr. Taylor) talked about the payment of a superlevy. We have said clearly that until the system has been operated fairly and properly in all member states we shall not pay superlevy, but we are ready and in a position to do so. What happens in Northern Ireland will depend upon the outcome of——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister said that he had taken into account what I said earlier, but now he is discussing Northern Ireland, and the Bill specifically says that it does not extend to Northern Ireland. The Minister must wait until an order for Northern Ireland comes before the House.

Mr. MacGregor: A tiny part of the Bill does affect Northern Ireland.

Mr. John David Taylor: As a result of the Bill, will the free quotas be exchangeable within the United Kingdom and therefore transferable to another region of the United Kingdom-Northern Ireland?

Mr. MacGregor: We are straining at the rules of order, but the Bill includes a clause about Northern Ireland. Perhaps I may refer to it, without straining your patience, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Nicholson: Northern Ireland is included in the Bill and we shall be presented with an Order in Council on which we, representing dairy farmers in Northern Ireland, will not be allowed to make one comment. That is ridiculous. I should like to say much more, but I realise the time of night.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Clause 6 states than an Order in Council

"shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House."

That indicates that there will be an opportunity to discuss the Northern Ireland application of the measure.

Mr. MacGregor: I have responded to the argument because I recognise the importance of the outgoers scheme to Northern Ireland. A proposal will be coming before the Council of Ministers to give the possibility—in the first year only—to adjust quotas between regions. If that becomes part of Community regulations between now and the end of March, it will give us the opportunity, if we produce short of quota in England and Wales, of adjusting to Northern Ireland. It might be helpful to Northern Ireland producers.

I was asked by the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) to explain the progress of the outgoers scheme. A total of 3,888 producers in England and Wales have been invited to become outgoers—that is, those with up to 387,000 litres. Already 1,252 have accepted, surrendering quota of 154·4 million litres. That is 10 million litres up on the time when we last debated this measure.

First year payments have already been made to 1.046 producers at a total cost of £3 million. A considerable number of producers are in the pipeline—those who are still special case applicants who have been offered the outgoers scheme but who have been told that they do not need to make a decision until they know about their secondary applications, and those in the latest tranches who have still four weeks, or less, to make up their minds.

There ae 832 producers in categories with quotas of 190 million litres. If all accepted, we should obviously be over the top of our target of 289 million litres, but we know hat all will not accept. We are taking a calculate risk.

There is another good reason or moving in tranches in making offers. Many people are worried about the effect on the beef market if everyone took up the outgoers scheme straight away. That is why we have staggered the tranches and why the scheme has gone well and has not had the effect on the beef market that some people were afraid that it would have.

All the signs are that we shall get the 289 million litres and be able to meet all exceptional hardship claims this year. Obviously we shall get less quota this year than next—because many of the outgoers have already used up a considerable amount of their quota—but exceptional hardship claims will be met, and for the small producers we shall be able to meet our pledge next year of getting them back to their 1983 production levels up to 200,000 litres.

This year they will not be paying any superlevy, so it is next year that counts and we will be able to meet our pledge because of the success of the scheme, which suggest that the incentives are sufficient to encourage enough people to take advantage of it.

The outgoers scheme is successful. It is achieving its objectives in a way which is not disrupting the beef market, and in a way which will enable us to help all small producers who wish to stay in, and it has enabled us already to help those who have decided voluntarily to get out.

I agree with the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John) that it would be foolish for hon. Members to oppose the Bill tonight because it is giving a beneficial advantage to many producers and is helping us to restructure the dairy industry in this difficult situation. It would be a grave mistake, therefore, for hon. Members to try to throw the Bill out because that would prevent us from going ahead with the proper authorisation for the rest of the payments under the scheme and would not enable a future Government, if they so wished, to introduce another scheme. Dairy producers would not understand it if hon. Members attempted to oppose the Bill tonight, and on that basis I commend the measure to the House.

Mr. Ashdown: I apologise to hon. Members for delaying them and I apdlogise to the Minister for having failed to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, before he spoke because I should have liked him to have answered some questions.

Despite the Minister's blandishments, my hon. Friends and I will vote against the Third Reading. I have no doubt that the Bill will get through and that a scheme, though massively flawed, may be better than none. But the reality is that the measure is totally inadequate and requires us to lay a marker saying, "We at least regard it as inadequate and disruptive to the industry." If we do nothing else, we shall be laying a marker calling on the Government to produce a better measure.

The Minister claims that dairy farmers will not understand why we are voting against the Bill. That is not my experience. Dairy farmers understand that the Bill is flawed and inadequate. I could give many examples of those flaws, but I will confine myself to three.

First, whatever the Minister may claim, the Bill will result in fewer small family farms than were previously within the British farming infrastructure. The Minister said that many small farmers had agreed voluntarily to take the outgoers scheme. He is right. They had no alternative. The imposition of milk quotas reduced many of them to below viability, and if he comes to my constituency I will take him to a number of farms in precisely that position.

One farmer in my constituency has had to dispense with his own son on the farm. He was training him with a view to taking the farm over in due course—[Interruption.] His son was working as a labourer on the farm, learning the business, but he had to go. He had to cause his son to leave the business as he was able no longer to run the farm as a viable unit with the son as a labourer. He had no option but to take the outgoers' scheme. The Minister spoke of choice and of farmers exercising their own free will in taking the outgoers' scheme. The reality is that many of them have been forced to do so.

The Bill is not increasing the number of small farms in Britain. It is not giving asssistance to small family farms, which is part of Liberal farming policy. That is a sector of farming that needs positive encouragement. Whatever the Minister says about the freedom of choice that has been exercised, he cannot deny that the sum total of the effect of the Bill will be fewer family farms and fewer small farms. That cannot be in the best interests of the British farming community.

Our second reason for voting against the Bill stems from the Minister's remarks about the need to have a degree of flexibility between lump sum payments and instalments. That is what he wishes for the future. The Bill provides him with the opportunity to give the farmer the choice of accepting instalments or a lump sum payment and he has refused to allow him to have it. We know why. The Minister wants to have that choice himself. The choice will be dictated by the needs of the Treasury and imposed by the Minister and not by those of the farmer in the light of the business conditions in which he finds himself. The Minister wishes to retain flexibility for himself rather than giving it to the farmer — [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) seems to want to intervene from a sedentary position. If he wishes to intervene, I shall gladly give way to allow him to do so.

Lastly, and fundamentally, the Bill will remove certain rights from tenants in a way which will undermine their ability to be able to continue farming. My hon. Friend the Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) asked the Minister who it was who had a veto over these provisions and the Minister gave a pleasant but opaque answer. The reality is that landlords will have a veto over the operation of the Bill in so far as it affects tenants.

I have given three fundamental reasons to show why the Bill is inadequate. It does not meet the needs of the farming community and in the end a Bill will have to be introduced that does that more effectively.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives) rose——

Mr. Ashdown: That is why we shall oppose the Bill.

Town and Country Planning (Compensation) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

2.28 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Neil Macfarlane): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

When planning permission for the development of land is refused, the applicant is not normally entitled to compensation, but there are a few exceptions, and they include the provisions of sections 165 and 169 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 and the equivalent Scottish provisions which are of course of great interest to my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland the Member for Edinburgh, South (Mr. Ancram).

This is an arcane byway of planning legislation, which has recently been giving rise to difficulties. The purpose of this Bill is to deal with those problems, and to bring the provisions of sections 165 and 169 more into line with current thinking.

I shall start with section 165. The usual way of obtaining planning permission is by putting a specific development proposal to the local planning authority, but section 24 of the 1971 Act also allows my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to grant planning permission by means of a development order, which may either relate to a specific project or operate more generally.

Thus, the Town and Country Planning General Development Order grants planning permission for no fewer than 23 classes of development ranging from minor house extensions and the erection of gates, fences and walls to extensions to industrial premises — within certain limits—and development carried out by statutory undertakers. A development order is a statutory instrument, and Parliament controls the use of this power through the negative resolution procedure.

Section 165 relates to the situation that arises when a development order is amended. It provides that when planning permission for the development of land has been granted by a development order, when that permission is withdrawn, for example by the revocation or amendment of the order, and an application for planning permission for the same development is then refused, or granted subject to conditions, compensation is payable to the applicant for losses that are directly attributable to the withdrawal of the development order permission.

We are not aware of any compensation claim that has actually been made successfully under section 165. One reason is that permission granted by development orders has very rarely been withdrawn. In 1983, however, we amended the general development order to ensure that any development likely to involve the presence of a notifiable quantity of a hazardous substance would require a specific grant of planning permission from the local planning authority. Authorities have expressed concern that, if they refuse an application for development for which the order previously granted permission—and this includes quite substantial industrial extensions — they may incur a substantial compensation liability.

Again, I am not aware of any case in which that has actually happened, and I would expect an industrialist who was refused planning permission on safety grounds to try to redesign his proposal to make it safe rather than to press for compensation after the refusal. Nevertheless, the concern expressed by local planning authorities is understandable and real.

If a landowner has firm proposals for carrying out development permitted by a development order—if he has begun to draw up plans, buy materials, or has even let a contract for the work—it is right that he should be compensated for the abortive expenditure that he will have incurred if the permission is suddenly taken away.

However, under the present terms of section 165, the right to compensation goes much wider than that. In particular, it contains no time limit, so that the refusal of a planning application many years after the revocation or amendment of a development order may create a compensation liability. The landowner may have had no plans for carrying out the development during the time when the permission was available — indeed he may have bought the land after the order had been amended —but he may still be able to argue that he has suffered loss because he is not allowed to carry out the development.

The situation is wholly unsatisfactory. The Bill therefore provides that compensation will only be payable for adverse decisions on applications submitted within 12 months of the revocation or amendment of a development order. If a landowner already has a scheme in hand, this allows him time to put in his planning application. If he does not already have a scheme in hand, we can see no reason why compensation should be payable. A development order is not permanent, and the risk that a planning permission granted by a development order will be taken away before it is exercised is no greater than many other risks that are accepted as an essential part of a landowner's lot, and for which no compensation is payable.

Under section 169, compensation is payable for the refusal or conditional grant of certain classes of development which are specified in Part II of schedule 8 to the Act. This includes the enlargement of buildings which were in existence at the time of the introduction of planning control in 1948 so long as the cubic content of the original building is not increased by more than 10 per cent. Before compensation is payable, there has first to be an appeal to the Secretary of State against the planning authority's decision.

The reasoning behind this provision is that in 1947 the classes of development in schedule 8 were regarded as so minor that they were within the existing use of the land, and the landowner ought not to lose his right to carry them out. It followed that, if permission for such development had to be refused under the new planning system, compensation should be paid.

Most, but not all, of the classes of development specified in the schedule are also included in the general development order, about which I have just been speaking, so that planning permission is granted for them automatically and no question of compensation therefore arises. One of the main exceptions is extensions to blocks of flats. At one time, there were different views about the precise extent of the right to compensation if such applications were refused, but in 1983, in the case of Camden London borough v. Peaktop Properties (Hampstead) Limited the Court of Appeal ruled that, in principle, compensation would be payable for the refusal of planning permission for the addition of 17 flats to the top of a block of flats that had been in existence on 1 July 1948. That is the matter about which my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) came to see me. The court rejected the council's interpretation of section 169 that compensation was not payable when the proposal was to create separate flats intended to be in separate occupations from the existing block.

The effect of the court's decision has been dramatic and wholly unacceptable to the Government. According to a well-researched report which a group of residents associations handed to me just before Christmas, in the period 1979-82 the number of such applications was running at between one and four each year. In 1983, there were 12, and in 1984 there were 21. I know from anxious inquiries from planning authorities, particularly in central London, that the trickle of applications has now become a flood. I am told that this is because market factors are now favourable to the economics of such a project. I suspect that the truth is that many of the applications are being submitted in the hope that they will be refused and that a hefty compensation payment will result.

Last February, the Estates Law Digest organised a seminar entitled:

"section 169 Town and Country Planning Act 1971 — A Cascade of Gold for every building owner".

It drew attention to:

"The great possibilities for compensation for the owners of buildings which existed in 1947"

In the light of the Peaktop decision, and examined

"the essential conditions which have to be fulfilled to secure compensation".

Is it surprising that the number of applications has been going up ever since?

Of course, the more unacceptable the proposal is in planning terms—the worse the effect that it has on the environment — the more certain it becomes that the planning authority will be compelled to refuse planning permission and to pay compensation. The local authority must either fail to meet its obligations to safeguard the proper planning of its area, or it must incur financial liabilities which, at a time of financial stringency, it simply cannot afford to meet.

I recognise that section 169 and schedule 8 represent vested property rights, as section 165 does not, and that such rights should not be taken away lightly, even if it can be argued that attitudes to planning control have changed considerably since the time of the 1947 Act, but according to the residents associations' report, there are an estimated 1,230 privately-owned blocks of 10 or more flats built before 1948 in the three central London boroughs alone. We cannot allow the wholly unrestrained extension of these blocks, with all the effects that this will have on visual appearance and on the intensification of parking problems, to say nothing of the psychological effect on residents of the existing flats while the work is going on.

I have come to the reluctant conclusion that, in this type of case, there is clear evidence that the provisions of section 169 are being abused and that we must legislate to restore the position. For the moment at least, we do not regard it as either necessary or right to go beyond the specific abuse relating to penthouse flats, but we might have to examine the matter again if developrs begin to abuse other schedule 8 rights in the same way.

Finally, I should say something about the commencement provisions in clause 3. The amendment to section 165 and its Scottish equivalent will take effect on Royal Assent, so that, if a development order is amended after that date, there will be 12 months for a landowner to put in a planning application before he loses his compensation rights. In the case of amendments that have already been made to the general development order, like the one relating to hazardous development, the 12-month period of grace will run from the date of Royal Assent.

In the case of section 169, however, compensation will not be payable for adverse decisions on penthouse flat applications submitted on or after the date of introduction of the Bill on 24 January. While such a provision is unusual in planning, it is quite common in fiscal legislation. Speculators have already had all too long to put in their applications, while we had what turned out to be fruitless discussions with the representatives of property interests. If they are given a further period of grace, there is no reason why applications should not be made for almost every pre-1948 block before the compensation right is withdrawn, and we should simply be shutting the stable door long after the horse had bolted.

Mr. Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): My hon. Friend is going into great detail about the provisions of the Bill. Will he say something about the amendment to section 169 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971, which is mirrored by section 158 of the Town and Country Planning (Scotland) Act 1972? It refers to pre-1 July 1948 blocks of flats being enlarged. Does it also refer to applications to redevelop areas where blocks of flats that existed prior to 1 July 1948 are proposed to be demolished and redeveloped to the extent of up to 10 per cent. more than the original area?

Mr. Macfarlane: That is not contained in the proposals. The legislation relates to every block before 1 July 1948 where there is a proposed alteration to an existing block. Demolition does not come into it. We considered the entire range of opportunities and possibilities. Hon. Members may wish to pursue these points a great deal further, and we may have to consider them at a later stage and in another place.

We seriously considered covering applications already in the pipeline. This may help my hon. Friend to some extent. However, we reluctantly concluded that that would represent an unacceptable degree of retrospection, and open us to the charge of confiscatory legislation. We believe that the provisions of clause 3 are a reasonable balance between the conflicting interests.

This is a technical bill. The Government responded to the points made by my hon. Friends the Members for Hampstead and Highgate, for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler), for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams), and by many other right hon. and hon. Members. It deals with an important area which has been cynically abused in recent months. I commend the Bill to the House.

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): Without hesitation, the Opposition welcome the Bill. I agree with the Minister that it is necessary and urgent. I hope that he did not mean it when he said that he was reluctant to introduce the Bill, because we are extremely pleased that he has done so. It is an important piece of legislation.

It would be churlish of us not to welcome the Bill, because, as the Minister knows, when we discussed the Town and Country Planning General Development (Amendment) Order 1983 I pressed him strongly on this point. I was worried about the use of hazardous substances and premises. That continues to disturb us, because we hear of more and more worrying examples and reports of hazardous chemicals and substances being manufactured or stored in town and city centres.

On 1 February The Guardian reported a case in Norfolk in which 89 people were taken to hospital. The Health and Safety Executive in St. Helens stated that if there was an explosion there people would be endangered within a one-mile radius. Planning authorities have been extremely concerned about legislation to protect people. In 1983 the Government took some necessary steps. The Bill is urgent, which is why we are helping the Government to get it through the House.

At that time we discussed section 165 of the 1971 Act, and I raised the case of Carless Chemicals in Middlesbrough. Middlesbrough corporation was involved to the tune of about £800,000. It had to pay that to a firm not to expand in the centre of Middlesbrough. Local authorities have been worried about their liability to pay compensation when they revoke general development orders. The Bill appears to cover that point.

I shall not say much about clause 1(2), which is about the 10 per cent. extension—the permitted development of pre-1948 dwellings is generally known—except to say that we strongly deplore the racketeering that is going on, especially in London. We deplore the pure speculation of property developers. It is little short of scandalous that, as the Minister said, a seminar was held last year entitled, "A cascade of gold for every business owner". The Government should have the support of every hon. Member in trying to plug that loophole.

Rural areas are also affected, because this is a town and country planning measure. The 1977 general development order is being reviewed by the Government, and the Opposition believe that the time has come for the review to be completed. We do not understand why there is not more control over the planning of the rural environment. I understand that a serious candidate for exemption from general development order status is livestock development in the proximity of residential dwellings. We all know how serious a problem such developments can be. Although we want farmers to comply with general planning, we do not wish them to be penalised financially for schemes which they entered into generally. As the Minister knows, farmers are often encouraged by the agricultural and horticultural development scheme to submit five or even seven-year development plans. The purpose is to assist farmers to bring their incomes up to levels comparable with non-agricultural incomes over a period of five or six years.

Naturally, such plans are conceived in the light of prevailing planning regulations. What worries me is that a farmer may be refused consent for a building that was planned in his rolling seven-year programme. Will the Government consider whether the 12-month limit is too tight in this case? In some cases it might be better to have a 24-month period.

Mr. Macfarlane: I should make it clear to the House that the Government have agonised over this decision for several months. Our discussions and negotiations with interested parties lead me to believe that we must consider the time element. That will have to be done at a later stage, or in another place, but I note what the hon. Gentleman says.

Dr. Clark: I am grateful for that assurance, and I take it in the spirit in which it was given.

However, may I develop the point a little further? Although the discussions are mostly about livestock development, I wish to draw to the Minister's attention the fact that not only agricultural development is causing problems with the general development orders. Some farm buildings that are used for other purposes also cause great problems. I take as an example a case in Lancaster. As the House will know, under class 6 of the first schedule to the general development order, a farmer can erect a building of 465 square metres, and 12m high, as long as it is more than 90m from the next building.

I was invited by the chairman of the planning committee of Lancaster council to visit such a building at Quernmore near Lancaster. It was outrageous. The farmer —I should call him a mushroom grower—told Lancaster city council that he wished to build mushroom sheds. I should emphasise that the mushrooms could have been grown in any disused cotton mill on the outskirts of Lancaster, but the farmer wished to erect them on his farm in an area of outstanding natural beauty. They are extremely unsightly polythene sheds which in no way fit the vernacular architecture of the area.

Lancaster city council tried to do something about what had been done. It tried to persuade the farmer that this was not the appropriate way out. I wrote to the Secretary of State about it, as did Lancaster city council. An article 4 directive was given. However, as the House knows, an article 4 directive does not stop development, and the farmer had cut the sod on each of his six sites. I went up last week to view this again, and it is most unsightly.

I urge the Government, when reviewing the general development order to take into account other buildings which may not necessarily be livestock buildings, because they cause a great deal of inconvenience visually and in terms of smells.

In the hope that the Minister will take those points on board we welcome the Bill and will do what we can to speed its passage through the House. I hope that the Minister will take seriously the points that have been raised, especially with regard to the timing, so that it will be possible to put this right in another place.

2.50 am

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg (Hampstead and Highgate): First, I thank my hon. Friend the Minister and our right hon. Friend for introducing the Bill. I have pestered Ministers at Marsham street — which itself is not a building of outstanding natural beauty—heavily in the last year. I know the problems that they have experienced in trying to find a simple form of words to cover a most obnoxious practice.

I also thank the Opposition for their courtesy and help in trying to speed the passage of the Bill, which deals with an issue that is wholly non-political.

If I may say so, for almost the first time in my political life in Parliament, I am doing something that Camden borough council would wish me to do, so there is a complete bipartisanship.

The sort of thing that has been happening was instanced by my hon. Friend in the case of Peaktop, a mushroom —if the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) will allow me to use that word—company created merely for the purpose of getting a crock of gold. No reputable property company has been indulging in this sort of practice, but a host of small property companies have come along and looked particularly at places like central London and Hampstead where there are mansion block blocks of flats. These companies have decided that they will make a planning application to add a storey, irrespective of the dirt, the noise and the aggravation that this would cause to the tenants and, indeed, without heed to whether the building foundations would even bear the extension. If the council has tried to be prudent, it has had to face the possibility of paying heavy compensation. Camden took the decision to refuse the application by Peaktop. The case went to the Lands Tribunal. Camden ratepayers will have to pay £100,000 compensation as a result of the application having been refused. There is at least one legal interpretation which says that this appalling property company could have made a reapplication three months later, could have had it refused again and could have received another £100,000. That is the kind of racket that has been building up. As my hon. Friend rightly said, one needed to take urgent action in that case. I am delighted that the cut-off date was publication of the Bill.

I pay tribute to one of the Camden councillors, Commander Ron King, who has been doing a great deal of devilling on this matter to try to establish the extent of the problem. With me he has seen the Minister and he has been trying to ensure that the actions of the council were taken in such a way as not to show undue haste but to examine the cases carefully in the hope that legislation might come along. Legislation is here and the nuisance has been stopped. On behalf of a large number of residents of Camden, and particularly of Hampstead, in which most of the blocks of which I know exist, I offer a heartfelt vote of thanks to my hon. Friend the Minister which I hope can be extended to the House when the Bill is speeded from here to another place and quickly receives the Royal Assent.

Mr. John Wheeler (Westminster, North): I shall be brief, it being such a late hour. I simply wish to add my thanks to my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State and to endorse all that he said, as well as the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg).

In my constituency a serious problem has been developing over property speculation. I am glad to see my hon. Friend the Member for City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke) in his seat. He knows, too, that in the City of Westminster great concern has been exhibited about the issue, and the local authority was anxious to see that proper action was taken. We are grateful that the Government are acting promptly and swiftly, and glad that the House is supporting the measure.

2.55 am

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I shall also be brief. We, too, welcome the Bill. It is clear that there was a terrible dilemma, particularly for central London boroughs as planning authorities. They were confronted with two undesirable options. Either they had to grant planning permission for the extension of the mansion blocks about which we have heard, with, as the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) said, all the inconvenience — in planning terms, they did not want to do that — or they had to refuse planning permission and pay substantial sums of compensation.

I should like to amplify the hon. Gentleman's explanation. The case went to appeal from the Lands Tribunal, and the finding went against Camden borough council. As soon as that happened the door was open, and the local authorities were all on a loser. It was then necessary for the Government to intervene to deal with the loophole that had been exemplified. That was important.

I have only one regret, and I do not say this as a criticism of the Minister. I understand that the problem was first brought formally to the Department's attention in October 1983 and informally in 1982. I appreciate that there have been several attempts to produce legislation — the hon. Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) introduced a Bill that has been superseded by this Bill. There have been strong Back-Bench representations on behalf of the boroughs, but it may be a valid, but minor, criticism that there could have been earlier action. However, we have got past that stage.

The Bill deals with two elements, as the Under-Secretary said. The second is hazardous waste and so on. I have always held the view that the use classes need regularly to be reviewed, particularly in this area, as science develops and uses change. One of the problems is that, because we have not responded quickly, inevitably there has been exploitation in that planning authorities have not been able to control adequately the developments in their areas. Once we are talking about hazardous waste and so on, we are talking about serious uses of land which, above all, planning authorities need the power to deal with.

We are dealing with a limited Bill that we all wish a speedy passage into law, but I hope that the Minister will accept that there are many pressures, which I hope his Department feels, for other reforms in planning law on issues that are underneath the surface. This is just the tip and the peak of the matter. It is not entirely the Minister's responsibility, although it is his Department's, but there are problems such as the landlord-tenant relationship in private mansion blocks, which I know are being reviewed by the Department of the Environment. There are issues under the surface, and the Bill deals only with the most extreme examples.

Subject to that request and concern that we do not just stop here and move quickly to make sure that the other matters are dealt with as soon and as comprehensively as possible, we welcome the Bill. We hope that the owners and residents, particularly in the mansion blocks and the areas of the four central London boroughs who have been most concerned have their problems alleviated and that the ratepayer and taxpayer do not have to foot the bills, when their money has gone into the pockets of those who have no scruples, and they needed the Government to intervene as they have done tonight.

2.59 am

Mr. Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): I wish to intervene on only a couple of points, and I do not wish to be ungrateful to my hon. Friend the Minister, who introduced in an expert manner what is a very complicated, if not obscure, town and country planning measure. It has serious financial implications, but I am sure that both sides of the House will agree that that should not alter the rights to compensation unless we have carefully considered the implications. My hon. Friend the Minister has done that.

I wish to relate my remarks to the proposed amendment to section 169 of the principal Town and Country Planning Act 1971 — which is mirrored by section 158 of the equivalent 1972 Scottish Act. The anomaly could not have been foreseen, however clever the authors of the Town and Country Planning Act 1947 had been, or the authors of the 1971 or 1972 Acts had been. This raises the problem of the balance between giving the rights to an individual who owns property on the one hand, with respect for the wider implications of the Town and Country Planning Act for a community or a neighbour on the other.

It was an immensely sensible compromise that a man should be allowed to extend his property by up to 10 per cent. without going through the rigours of the town and country planning legislation. That is one thing, but it was never suspected that a substantial development could be added by an enlargement of up to 10 per cent. without the need for planning permission, or, if planning permission were denied, the right of compensation. The important point that must be stressed, and what the bill seeks to amend, is that the development is, in many cases, happening in areas of central London that have already been intensely developed to the maximum permitted density. My hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) pointed this out. To allow those properties to be enlarged by putting a further floor on the top of the building would not only deny rights to light to the surrounding properties, but, with all the consequent problems of intensive development, creating problems of parking on the roads below and so on.

Therefore, my hon. Friend the Minister is right to introduce the legislation. I have only one or two inquiries, which I shall make now, to save further time later. Bearing in mind that the Appeal Court decision that raised this anomaly was made in the spring of 1983, and that this part of the Bill will take effect for applications from 24 January this year, what about the financial obligations that may be faced by many of the councils on the applications that have clearly been put in for spurious motives? There could be a considerable financial obligation on some of the local authorities. I should be grateful if my hon. Friend could touch on that point.

We are talking about denying rights to certain people, whether we think that they are deserving of those rights or not. I have no doubts about the merits of this measure. A local planning authority may try to use this Bill, when it becomes an Act of Parliament, to its advantage, and deny people what they think that their rights are. Under the existing town and country planning legislation, whenever a local planning authority refuses planning permission to an applicant, that applicant has the right of appeal to the Secretary of State. That is a cast-iron assurance that if the Bill is enacted the owner of such a property will not suffer any loss of rights and that the local planning authority will be given no unfair advantage. For that reason, I very much hope that the House will pass this measure.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams (Kensington): I should like to place on record a very warm welcome for this short but important Bill. It has particular relevance to the borough which I have the honour to represent. I do not need to speak at length, because in introducing the Bill to the House my hon. Friend summarised so well the reasons for its introduction and the urgent need for it. There is an overwhelming case for its introduction by the Department.

Since the decision in the Peaktop properties case in 1983, it has been possible for owners of large structures in multiple occupation to put planning authorities in a position where either they have to approve planning applications which ought not to be approved or they have to incur liability for large sums in compensation which their ratepayers should not be required to pay. I recognise that it was not easy to find the appropriate way to reverse the decision of the Court of Appeal in the Peaktop properties case. In discussions with the Department I raised the possibility that it could be done by restricting its application to conservation areas, or possibly by placing an upper limit on the total amount that a local authority might be obliged to pay in compensation.

In the end, in order to help matters forward, I tabled in this Session a short Bill — the Planning Authorities (Restriction of Liability) Bill—and I am most grateful to my hon. Friends the Members for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) and for Fulham (Mr. Stevens) for supporting me. We set that Bill down for Second Reading on 25 January. It was not an entire coincidence that in a very welcome move the Government decided to table their own Bill on the day previous to that on which my own Bill would have come up for Second Reading. I am also very pleased that the Department chose the remedy that I finally decided to recommend to the House in my Bill, namely, to allow the compensation to refer only to individual dwellings.

I need say no more in welcoming the Bill other than that I am very glad that tonight it will complete all of its stages in the House. I hope that very shortly the Bill will go through all its stages in the other place and soon become an Act.

3.8 am

Mr. Macfarlane: May I respond briefly to the many points that have been made. I am grateful for the welcome that the Bill has received from hon. Members. We have made a great step forward not only for the people of London but for the people of Scotland, and, perhaps, elsewhere. If I do not answer fully all the points that have been made, I shall write to hon. Members.

The hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) referred to hazardous substances. I believe that the amendment to section 165 goes a long way towards meeting the compensation problem which has been one of the main points of concern. But there are other problems. As soon as the parliamentary timetable permits I intend to introduce a new system under which written consent for the keeping of hazardous substances will have to be obtained, along the lines of the consultation paper which my Department published last July.

As for Carless chemicals, this would involve the removal of an existing factory, and it would continue to attract compensation. It has nothing to do with the permission granted by the general development order. As the hon. Gentleman knows, we are reviewing fully all the amendments to the general development order. The points that he made in his spech are well taken and well noted.

I have studied the case in Lancaster. We shall consult widely all of the interested parties. Agricultural intensive livestock units are, of course, an integral part of our consideration.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) talked about the problem of a landlord possibly being able to obtain compensation twice. That has been gone into thoroughly and I have concluded that it is not possible to obtain compensation twice for the same loss in value of land. The second refusal for similar development would therefore not give rise to a claim for compensation under section 169. I shall ensure that my hon. Friend has all the details.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: My hon. Friend has given a view based on legal opinion from his Department. The information that I gave was legal information available to Camden council. One will always find two lawyers who take different points of view. I only ask my hon. Friend to make sure that that cannot happen any more.

Mr. Macfarlane: I would not wish at this late hour to cast aspersions on the integrity of the lawyers whom we employ, but I shall make certain that there is some reasonable recognition of the points that my hon. Friend has made.

The point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) has caused great concern. The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) also mentioned the delays of 15 months or so that have occurred. We were prompted to introduce the legislation now because the floodgate was beginning to open.

It is difficult for my Department to provide accurate statistics of the likely number of applications in the pipelines which have occurred as a result of the seminar which was held at the Savoy in 1984. The fact that it was held there was symptomatic of the cascade of gold which it was hoped to develop on that occasion. We have tried to identify and understand the problems and financial obligations of the local authorities. There is no doubt that many of them could well be faced with anything up to an eight figure compensation problem. That is serious and has all sorts of impacts upon the rate support grant, which I shall not go into this evening. The problems facing the local authorities are well known. That figure could be excessive.

I accept that some planning authorities will have rooftop and flat applications before them, but where the landowner has done his part by submitting the application it would be wrong to take away his right to compensation retrospectively. Moreover, that could mean that authorities which had delayed giving a decision on such applications would escape a compensation liability, while those who had determined such applications promptly would be at risk and that would not be right.

The role of the Secretary of State is inherent throughout all the constitutional elements of planning law in Britain, and that still prevails.

Dr. David Clark: A number of the authorities are in penalty. For example, it was feared that Lancaster would go over the target if it applied for a stop order and would therefore be liable to compensation. There are precedents —I think that there was a case with Cumbria county council about sheep scab—where the Government were prepared to abate the special payments in cases where authorities were going into penalty. Would the Minister be prepared to look into that with some London boroughs, because it is important?

Mr. Macfarlane: I am touched by the hon. Gentleman's concern for my hon. Friend the Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale (Mr. Lennox-Boyd), who is forbidden to participate in these affairs at the moment. His point affects many local authorities and I have no doubt that they will be swift in coming forward if they feel that they have any request to make. At the moment it is no integral part of the survey which I have initiated with the local authorities.

The House is giving an important approval tonight. I need to identify many issues with hon. Members, and I take note of them and am grateful for their comments.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

Bill committed to a Committee of the whole House.—[Mr. Major.]

Bill immediately considered in Committee.

[MR. HAROLD WALKER in the Chair]

Clause 1

RESTRICTION ON COMPENSATION: ENGLAND AND WALES

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams (Kensington): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 2, line 8, at the end add 'and any individual dwelling in the building would be enlarged by more than ten per cent.'.

I am obliged to you, Mr. Walker, for giving me special permission in the circumstances to move this short amendment in spite of the fact that I was able to table it only yesterday.

It seems that with the Bill as it stands a application could be made for an individual flat within a large structure to be expanded by an amount equal to 10 per cent.—not of its own original volume, but of the original volume of the whole structure. I ask my hon. Friend to examine the possibility of there being a defect in the drafting of the Bill. If he is not happy to accept my wording, which is almost certainly defective, I hope he will ensure that the lacuna is removed from the Bill.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Neil Macfarlane): My hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) has a point which he thinks important, but his amendment would not achieve that which he is trying to achieve. In some respects it would destroy what we are trying to do.

I understand my hon. Friend's point, but the Bill is limited to applications which would increase the number of flats in a block. That is what my hon. Friend is worried about. Penthouse extensions which convert the top storey of flats into maisonettes increase the value without increasing the number of units. The Bill provides that compensation is not payable when two conditions are met. The amendment adds a third precondition — that an extension must also relate to an extension of one or more individual flats by more than 10 per cent. before the compensation right is excluded.

That is incompatible with the second condition which I have mentioned. It would mean that compensation would continue to be payable for penthouse extensions which create new units rather than extend existing units. The amendment should have begun with the word "or" rather than the word "and".

I am ready to examine any evidence, and I shall look at the matter once again. It is important, and I want to be fully satisfied. I suggest that we examine the matter later or urge the House of Lords to table an amendment if necessary. I shall write to my hon. Friend on the subject and keep the House informed.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I accept that I should have used the word "or" instead of "and" to convey my meaning. That proves that my amendment is defective. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 1 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 2 and 3 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Bill reported, without amendment.

Bill read the Third time, and passed.

West Midlands (Industrial Situation)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Major.]

3.18 am

Mr. Bruce George (Walsall, South): We have heard a great deal in previous debates about the cascade of gold. I hope that some gold will cascade in the direction of my constituency. It is certainly long overdue.

I have made regular appeals in Adjournment debates to the Government to halt and reverse the decline of the west midlands and the town of Walsall, yet the situation deteriorates. A few statistics support that assertion. The west midlands has had the lowest rate of growth of any region in the country in the last 10 years. Between 1980 and 1984 the unemployment rate in the west midlands rose by over 10 per cent.—the worst regional figure in the country. Over half the unemployed are classed as long-term unemployed. The official unemployment figure for Walsall South is 7,675. But the actual figure is much worse, as it excludes much of Darlaston and, as we are aware, the unemployment figures have been skilfully manipulated to mask the real total. Without doubt, national unemployment is way over 4 million. In the Walsall area, 17·8 per cent. of the population is unemployed, way above the regional and national figures.

No doubt reassuring words will continue to emanate from the Government. Lord Young assured us a few weeks ago that Britain was not in recession. Try telling that to the army of workless in my constituency. I have the statistics of the increase in unemployment between the 1981 census and the figures for December 1984 on a ward basis.

In the St. Matthew's ward, the increase in unemployment between those few years was 45 per cent.; in the Bentley and Darlaston, North ward, 46·6 per cent. was the increase, much of it due to the collapse of engineering, of the nuts and bolts industry and of many large, well-known factories; and the allegedly more prosperous area of Paddock saw unemployment go up by a staggering 61·9 per cent. Where is the economic miracle that we were promised? What has happened to the so-called recovery?

Recent events have shown the Government's financial strategy to be bankrupt, as they have marched the nation on six years' hard slog in which the public services have been slashed and public works starved of investment so as to cut Government borrowing. The pay-off was the promise of lower interest rates. That has not happened. Now, the pound is at parity with another great currency, the rouble. That shows the depth to which we have sunk.

Regrettably, the Chancellor will not pay the price of the Government's failure. The rest of us will pay. House owners will pay the price by way of big increases in their monthly payments; industry will continue to pay because the big increases in interest rates will cost British industry at least £600 million this year; the unemployed will pay because the interest rates squeeze will force probably another 100,000 out of their jobs and into the dole queues.

If the Prime Minister succeeds in reducing unemployment in my constituency to the level it was when the Conservatives came to office in 1979—when it was 5 per cent.—I will put a good word in with the principal of the West Midlands College of Higher Education and ask that she be awarded an honorary degree of the Council for National Academic Awards—that is, if the Secretary of State for Education and Science has not closed the college down first. I cannot guarantee that my constituents will be as generous or forgiving as I am.

The Minister will, no doubt, tell the House of initiatives that will yield dividends—notably, assisted area status—but not everyone is as enthusiastic as the Government about the efficacy of the economic aspirins that my region is being given. I have a letter written by Mr. G. Bates, president of the Wolverhampton Association of Building Employers Confederation. He went to a seminar recently in Birmingham which looked into what would happen to the region because of assisted area status. He wrote:

"I therefore attended a seminar staged by the Birmingham Chamber of Commerce which was to inform management of what was available to them under the new policy. I left the seminar completely deflated."

I hope he is wrong and that the measures will bring relief to an area that a few years ago was one of the most prosperous in the country.

Not only in employment and industry has my constituency suffered, but also in housing. As my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) knows well, we have made representations to the Government because their housing policy has been a disaster. Public sector housing has been halved and house improvement payments are drying up. Walsall has reached a crisis. Our surgeries are a weekly testimony to the failure of Government policy and to despair. There are over 12,500 on the housing waiting list and there are 30,000 unattended repairs. The local authority asked for £37 million under the HIP scheme and it received £9·5 million about a quarter of what it requested. The problems of single parents are appalling and the problems of single parent families are severe. In an excellent report entitled "Singled Out in Walsall" it is stated:

"the problems of homelessness among single people of all ages are growing rapidly but especially among the young."

There has been such little house building. Surely one way in which the local economy can be boosted is by improving the infrastructure and getting the building workers back to work. This should happen, and I hope that it will.

One of the rays of sunlight over the sad events of the past few years has been the way in which some local individuals and groups have responded and are responding to the crisis. The Pleck Community Association has produced a most imaginative set of schemes to relieve unemployment in the area. I am following closely, as I hope the Minister will, one of the schemes that it is submitting. It seeks to remove much of the responsibility from the shoulders of small business men and to arrange for it to be taken on by experts from the association and by those who they will employ.

There is another experiment involving Darlaston and an experiment which is being undertaken by Roap hall. This is a sign of the way in which local individuals and groups can respond.

Another problem that besets the area is that of derelict land. Walsall has many attributes, but it is not among the most beautiful towns in the land. That is the consequence of industrialisation in years past. Much of the land in the town is derelict. It consists of 225 sites and extends over 560 hectares. Despite the immensity of the west midlands and black country problems of dereliction, Government aid has been cut, though I must acknowledge in fairness that Walsall is getting a slightly larger share of a smaller cake. Derelict land is blighting housing. It is making it difficult to attract industry to the area and it is a sheer eyesore. Dereliction is growing at a faster rate than the rate at which land is being brought back into use. Walsall has 29 per cent. more derelict land than in 1983. There is a need for land to be brought back into proper use and we need central Government funding. The Government should not seek to rape the green belt in my area instead of pursuing a proper policy of land reclamation.

Linked to the problem of derelict land is that of limestone. The current position is severe. About £75 million worth of property is undermined by limestone. That is the legacy of limestone mining and other works. These works have resulted in the sterilisation of land and the retardation of industrial development. The failure to provide a proper solution to the limestone problem could contribute significantly to a downward spiral in the borough's economic fortunes. Action must be taken.

The Ove-Arup report must be implemented swiftly, especially by infilling where this is necessary. I shall comment briefly on the Mineral Workings Bill, which is passing through another place. Clause 8(3)(a) gives an authority power to carry out works where there is "imminent" danger of collapse. We know that it is a moot point whether the risk of collapse in many of the workings is imminent. The wording of clause 8(3)(a) seems to be unnecessarily demanding. I can foresee mining engineers and lawyers arguing for years over whether the danger of collapse in any particular case is imminent. Some words such as "where there is the prospect of collapse" would provide an easier test to satisfy.

I propose a limestone workings compensation scheme to supplement the solutions outlined in the extensive and brilliant Ove-Arup report. Such a scheme has been put to the Department of the Environment by local authorities and it would provide a cost-effective option for the mines and zones in which the potential for collapse is low. For example, imagine the plight of a householder in my constituency who recently purchased a £50,000 house. He has paid for a search, yet he now cannot sell. He probably has no claim against the local authority, the solicitor or estate agent. His insurance may not cover that contingency, even if there is physical damage. The insurance does not cover loss of value.

The NCB has a scheme for compensation under the Coal-Mining (Subsidence) Act 1957 and there are other precedents. I believe that certain minimum requirements should be covered in a compensation scheme and that the Government must be sensible about this matter. Compensation should be payable if damage is caused to property by limestone subsidence and where the landowner is unable to obtain redress from any other source. Compensation should be on the basis of the actual cost of repair or market value at the option of the agency responsible for dealing with compensation claims. This would restore confidence in the property market and, because the risk of collape is low, the number of compensation would be small.

I should like to refer to the restoration of ancient monuments, of which there are some in Walsall. The Guildhall goes back many centuries, although the present building dates from the 1850s. I am the chairman of the Guildhall restoration committee and, on a number of occasions, I helped to keep the bulldozer away from this fine building. An excellent scheme has been put up by a local architect, Gordon Foster, and has been supported by the local authority. The scheme has now been submitted to the Department of the Environment. I urge the Secretary of State to look favourably on this scheme, to make a quick decision and to provide financial assistance to those at the heart of the scheme. I am afraid that, if there is a delay, the Guildhall, which has been suffering the effects of erosion, may not survive another bad winter.

I do not expect the Government to change course. They will soldier on with failed policies. The Government will be protected from the consequences of those policies by the Opposition's failure so far to present their alternatives and to have those alternatives accepted. When the party's head bangers have finally been subdued and we can concentrate on presenting the real alternative to this Government's policies, the Government's days will be numbered.

3.32 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. David Trippier): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George) for the opportunity to debate the industrial and environmental position in Walsall. As usual, the hon. Gentleman has made his points cogently and diligently. Although I can never agree with his politics, he is a vociferous and able advocate on behalf of his constituents.

We have tonight heard a great deal about the industrial situation in Walsall, and the west midlands, together with the reasons to which the hon. Gentleman attributes the present industrial situation—a situation which must be improved, as I am the first to recognise. However, we must remember that the present position did not come about overnight. Industry in Walsall and the west midlands generally was experiencing a decline in its fortunes long before the present Government came to office in 1979. The decline was greatly accelerated by the world recession which, with hindsight, is not surprising given the region's over-dependence upon a relatively narrow industrial base concentrated on precisely those industries most vulnerable to recession.

Walsall is similar to many other parts of the west midlands in this respect and has not been sheltered from the effects of the recession. Firms—especially those which had for so long experienced overmanning—could not be sheltered from the recession and have shed a considerable amount of labour during the last few years. The result is the historically high levels of unemployment in parts of the region, and Walsall has one of the highest rates in the region—17·8 per cent. in January 1985—which have rightly been of interest to the hon. Member tonight.

As time went on, it became increasingly obvious that the recession alone was not entirely responsible for that situation—although it played a considerable part. There were weaknesses in the structure of some industries of importance to the region. The motor industry is an example often quoted.

Although the Government's general economic policy has laid the foundations for a successful entrepreneurial spirit, and my Department's national schemes of assistance to industry were available throughout the country, it became clear that the worst hit parts of the country, and particularly parts of the west midlands, were at a disadvantage when competing for new industrial investment. Plainly further action was necessary to help rebuild the region's industrial base.

[Mr. David Trippier]

We have responded to that. In December 1983 we published a White Paper entitled "Regional Industrial Development" which made it clear that changes had made the assisted areas map out of date and areas with less acute problems than the west midlands no longer justified assisted area status. That was a point that was frequently being made to us by hon. Members representing west midlands constituencies including the hon. Gentleman.

As a result, and after a comprehensive review, my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Industry announced to the House on 28 November 1984 the changes in the Government's regional industrial policy, including the new assisted areas map.

The biggest change in the map was that a large part of the west midlands region was included, for the first time, as an intermediate area, including the hon. Member's constituency which falls mainly in the Walsall travel-to-work area, and a small part of the Birmingham travel-to-work area. Approximately 77 per cent. of the working population of the west midlands now falls within an assisted area.

The new policy, which accompanied the new map, is designed to focus help so that it will have the greatest direct impact on employment at a lower net cost per job. It is intended to be less costly, and more cost effective. However, the increase in coverage of the map from 27 per cent. to 35 per cent. of the working population will mean an increase in selective assistance with the balance between automatic grants and selective assistance throughout the country shifting considerably towards the latter.

What does that mean for Walsall? For the first time, the Walsall and Birmingham travel-to-work areas will be eligible for regional selective assistance under section 7 of the Industrial Development Act 1982. This takes the form of, first, a project grant which is available for projects in the manufacturing and service sectors.

Secondly, under the in plant training scheme grants may be made to cover up to 80 per cent. of eligible training costs. Thirdly, there is the exchange risk guarantee scheme which covers firms against the exchange risk on foreign currency loans in return for a service charge. Fourthly, there are loans from Europe. Fixed interest loans from the European Investment Bank of up to 50 per cent. of fixed project costs are available. Similar loans are available from the European Coal and Steel Community for projects which create employment opportunities for redundant coal and steel workers.

In addition, the hon. Gentleman's constituency will qualify for support from the European Regional Development Fund. That will give his local authority access to the ERDF for its infrastructure projects for the first time. Although I appreciate that under the temporary arrangement agreed with the European Commission, Walsall metropolitan district has been eligible since January 1984 for ERDF aid for infrastructure projects by virtue of its Inner Urban Areas Act 1978 designation, intermediate area status will ensure that that eligibility continues. Only last week the European Commission announced a further batch of projects in the region which have been allocated ERDF funding. Those include £52,000 for two projects submitted by Walsall metropolitan district council, and a further £1·8 million for the black country route which will help to open up that part of the region for industrial investment and which is warmly welcomed in the hon. Member's constituency.

Clearly the west midlands' industrial structure and that of Walsall is such that large numbers of companies will now be in a position to benefit from assistance. The amount of aid coming to the region will, however, depend upon the response of the business sector, since regional aid is demand led. The west midlands assisted areas represent 20 per cent. of the total map coverage, and it is important to the region that it receives a fair share of the assistance available.

Initial response has been favourable. Since last November's announcement, the Department's west midlands regional office has received over 3,500 inquiries about regional selective assistance. These have, so far, generated 135 applications that are being examined by the Department's officials. Of those active cases, nine are in the Walsall travel-to-work area.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Is the hon. Gentleman saying anything that will give hope to the unemployed in my hon. Friend's constituency and my own constituency? Can he say that the misery of mass unemployment in the west midlands and the black country will come to an end in the lifetime of the present Parliament?

Mr. Trippier: The hon. Gentleman should not be so negative. He is directing his question at someone who represents a constituency not dissimilar to his own or that of his hon. Friend. Only two and a half years ago, the unemployment level in my own constituency was far higher than the level in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, to which I have referred. As a result of concentration on small firms and the assistance given by the Government to that area, we have reduced unemployment by a third. That is not hypothesis. It is a fact.

Intermediate area status is not alone in working to regenerate Walsall's industrial base. The designation of intermediate area status was in recognition of the area's need for greater employment opportunities. As I have already mentioned, this is in addition to the Government's general economic policies which are of paramount importance. The stress on stable prices, a low rate of inflation and a favourable climate for enterprise are prerequisites for a modern industrial economy. There are also specific policies operated both by my Department and other Government Departments. For example, under section 8 of the Industrial Development Act 1982, firms in the old Walsall travel-to-work area have received 97 offers of assistance totalling over £2·5 million for projects involving costs of £11·6 million since May 1979.

There is also the small firms sector, which has greatly benefited from our measures in this field. The small firms service, for which I am responsible, continues to offer its services to small businesses in the region. Inquiries have been averaging over 660 a week for the last month compared with just over 600 this time last year.

With regard to other Departments' policies, in 1983 Walsall was made a designated district under the Inner Urban Areas Act and has received urban programme allocations of £461,000 in 1983-84 and £550,000 in 1984-85 — with a further £550,000 allocated for 1985-86.

Walsall has also benefited over the years to the tune of £1 million from the traditional urban programme, the fund open to all authorities seeking grant aid to support social schemes in urban areas of special social need other than in those areas designated under the urban programme as partnership or programme authorities. This represents one of the highest levels of support in the country under the traditional urban programme.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment is advised by a panel of experts on appropriate remedies and resources to tackle the legacy of limestone mining in the black country. Under the guidance of this panel a programme of remedial actions has started, including considerable activity in the Walsall area. The Department of the Environment and the local authorities funded a major report from consulting engineers, and so far about £1 million of derelict land grant has been spent assessing the Walsall problem in more detail. Major remedial action in Walsall is planned to start in January 1986 with infilling of the Littleton street mine near the town centre. My right hon. Friend hopes to announce shortly the 1985-86 allocation under the derelict land grant for remedial works to limestone caverns in the black country generally including Walsall.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to Walsall guildhall. I understand that applications for listed building consent and urban development grant for the restoration of the guildhall complex have recently been submitted to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment for his consideration. In the circumstances, it would be inappropriate for me to comment about the applications at this stage.

The hon. Gentleman also asked me to respond on matters relating to housing, although it is the responsibility of other Departments. In recent years, Walsall borough council has given priority to the modernisation and repair of the substantial numbers of council houses in its ownership. It has also launched a major initiative to renovate pre-1919 houses in the private sector through the development of what has come to be known as the block repair scheme. These priorities have been very much in accord with national housing policy, which is for the private sector to assume a greater role in the provision of new housing.

The hon. Member mentioned the level of housing investment programme allocation to Walsall. The indications show that Walsall has had its fair share of housing resources available to the west midlands region recently. For 1985-86 Walsall has received £9·636 million, which represents some 91 per cent. of last year's allocation. Walsall has done markedly better than almost all other authorities in the region as most others received only 82 per cent. of last year's allocation. Housing investment allocations have to be seen in the context of the overall need to contain public expenditure. Within this constraint, the extent of housing need in Walsall has been fully recognised in the level of recent capital allocations.

The hon. Gentleman correctly highlighted industrial circumstances in Walsall, but his approach, like that of many in the Labour party, was rather negative. We can all recognise the problems, but some of us can see the steps that have been taken to overcome them. Following the granting of intermediate area status to the industrial heart of the west midlands, the Government have demonstrated their positive commitment to help the regeneration of the region's economy. Intermediate area status will bring many opportunities for those in Walsall to respond positively to take full advantage of what this status offers. I am glad to say that the signs of this are already apparent. Long has been the plea from the west midlands for the opportunity to compete on equal terms with other parts of the country. The opportunity is now to hand and we are looking to see the west midlands generally, and Walsall in particular, strong and vigorous once again.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at thirteen minutes to Four o'clock am.

Oral Answers to Questions

ENVIRONMENT

Council House Building

1. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the number of council house starts in the years 1978, 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir George Young): The figures for the first six years are as follows: 75,000, 55,000, 34,000, 21,000, 29,000 and 30,000. The provisional figure for 1984 is 23,000.

Mr. Flannery: Do not those figures reveal a disgraceful position? There are 500,000 building workers out of work, longer and longer waiting lists in all big cities, and houses being sold off at half price, which depletes the urban housing stock, yet the Government produce these figures, which alarm anyone who wishes to house our people. When will the Minister resign?

Sir George Young: I urge the hon. Gentleman to broaden his horizon and consider other indicators of housing performance apart from local authority starts. Local authorities' improvement grants have increased from £90 million to more than £900 million. I suggest that he has a discussion with an Opposition spokesman on housing. The hon. Gentleman implied that he was against the right to buy but, as I understand it, Labour party policy, as announced by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Bar (Mr. Rooker), is to admit that the right to buy has been a success, and that the Labour party would face considerable opposition if it went back on it.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Does my hon. Friend agree that the Labour party is being hypocritical in trying to stop people from buying their homes? That is wholly contrary to the views of the council tenants, who want to buy their homes rather than to see massive additional house building.

Sir George Young: There is clearly a private debate going on within the Labour party about whether to remain committed to repealing the right to buy. As I understood it, the party is against that, but the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) does not seem to have been party to that decision.

Mr. Allan Roberts: Will the Minister stop diverting the question away from the abysmal number of local authority starts by referring to the Government's other so-called initiatives, which have not resulted in anything substantial? Has not he or the Secretary of State, had a word, for example, with Laurie Barratt, and their other friends in the building industry, who say that their well-cherished joint venture scheme will no longer go ahead because of the 15 per cent. VAT on building improvements and the Government's freeze on the right to of local authorities to spend their capital receipts?

Sir George Young: If one looks at the performance of the private sector between 1980 and 1983, one sees that the number of starts increased from 98,000 to 167,000. One must put that in the balance, as well as the factors that the hon. Gentleman mentioned.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: Are not Opposition Members foolishly playing the numbers game when they concentrate solely on public sector new building? Is it not the case that many authorities—my own in Nottingham is a case in point, with 47,000 homes in its ownership—should be concentrating on maintaining and improving their existing stocks?

Sir George Young: My hon. Friend is right. Whatever the political complexion of local authorities, they have all recognised that the real challenge is to modernise and improve the existing stock and to convert other stock that needs improvement. That has been the thrust of local authority expenditure, and it is wholly misleading to take as the sole criterion of performance, as the hon. Member for Hillsborough did, the number of local authority starts.

Mr. Heffer: Has the Minister had drawn to his attention a report of the commission headed by Prince Philip, which made it clear that those who wanted to rent property were having great difficulty in doing so because of the cuts in capital expenditure determined by the Government?

Sir George Young: I have seen an interim report from that commission containing some evidence. As I understand it, the commission has not yet come to any conclusions. The Government await with great interest the findings of this important commission.

Mr. Robert Atkins: Is it not true that many local authorities choose to direct their housing resources into more productive areas? For example, the borough of South Ribble is the national leader in building sheltered accommodation of a private, housing association or even a council nature. Should not local authorities direct their resources towards that?

Sir George Young: My hon. Friend is right. We have encouraged local authorities to provide housing for the elderly, the disabled and the homeless rather than try to meet the general needs, which we believe the private sector will have a crucial role in satisfying.

Improvement Grants

2. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he has for the future of improvement grants.

The Minister for Housing and Construction (Mr. Ian Gow): We intend to issue a consultation document on private sector housing improvement policy, including the future of the home improvement grant system, as soon as possible.

Mr. Pike: Does the Minister recognise the great anxiety caused by the fact that many councils have already stopped giving improvement grants? The Government must produce not only a new policy, but the essential cash for councils to do this work. Will he carry out his earlier promise to the Government and resign if that cash is not forthcoming?

Mr. Gow: Not all that we read in newspapers is true. As to the hon. Gentleman's substantive point, it comes ill from a Labour Member to talk about improvement grants. During the last financial year spending on improvement grants was £900 million, compared with £90 million in the Labour Government's last year of office. In this financial year we expect — we cannot give a final figure — spending on improvement grants to be about £750 million.

Mr. Latham: When the document, which is already rather late, appears, will it address the fact that improvement work is especially labour-intensive — the most labour-intensive in the construction industry — and that it is a cost-effective way of repairing urban decay?

Mr. Gow: I agree with both parts of my hon. Friend's supplementary question.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Is the Minister aware that many unemployed people who own small terraced houses in cities such as Leeds cannot find the capital sums needed to maintain their homes? Is it not within the Government's brand of Conservatism to assist a property-owning democracy? Do they realise that their schemes would become much more favourable if they made more money available for private sector grants?

Mr. Gow: The primary responsibility for maintaining and repairing a home rests with the owner of that home——

Mr. Straw: Is that what the Minister said before the election?

Mr. Gow: I wish that Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen would not shout from a sedentary position, but would listen to the answer. A major part of the review of our home improvement grant policy is that we should achieve a better targeting of available resources. We shall try to ensure that resources from the public sector go to assist those who cannot afford to carry out improvements and repairs, and to the houses in the greatest need of repair.

Mr. Hargreaves: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is hypocritical of Labour Members to condemn the Government's record on improvement grants when one considers that in my constituency in 1978—the last year of the Labour Government — the local authority spent £233,000 on improvement grants, and that this year it is spending £1,800,000? Does my hon. Friend further agree that unless we spend even more we shall end up building more council houses?

Mr. Gow: My hon. Friend's point is a vindication of the Government's policies and an indictment of the policies of their predecessors.

Mr. John Fraser: Will the Minister stop his smug, braggart boasting about the generosity of the election bribe of £900 million, which to many people amounts to little more than telling a man about to be executed that he is having a good breakfast? [Interruption.] It is all very well for the smug Minister to smirk as well. Does he not realise that 250,000 home owners have had applications for home improvement grants in for over a year, and that his cuts in the housing investment programmes and freezing the use of capital receipts mean that they are still waiting in anxiety and distress and are now unlikely to get their grants? This is an act of treachery by a Tory Government towards many poor and anxious owner-occupiers.

Mr. Gow: Some of that synthetic anger——

Mr. John Fraser: It is not synthetic anger. Come to my advice bureaux.

Mr. Gow: The hon. Gentleman is not the only hon. Member who has advice bureaux. When my right hon. and learned Friend the then Chancellor of the Exchequer introduced the exceptional measures for improvement grants in his Budget of March 1982, he made it clear to the House that it was a temporary measure, partly in response to the 1981 English house condition survey. In fact, the exceptional measures for improvement grants were twice extended beyond the period that my right hon. and learned Friend had originally announced.

Ministry of Agriculture Environment Co-ordination Unit

3. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many officials in his Department are engaged in liaison between his Department and the environment co-ordination unit of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Patrick Jenkin): Contacts are numerous and frequent, and no precise figure can be given.

Mr. Chapman: As land use statistics relating to our dramatically changing countryside are collected and assessed by my right hon. Friend's Department rather than by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, will my right hon. Friend assure the House that there is the closest co-operation between his Department and the recently established environment co-ordination unit of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food? Will he also assure us that the close co-ordination and co-operation will be at ministerial level?

Mr. Jenkin: Happily, I can give my hon. Friend assurances on both those counts. There is increasingly close co-operation and also an exchange of views between the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and my Department, both at official and ministerial level.

Mr. Ron Davis: I remind the Secretary of State that the level of co-operation between his Department and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has been subject to criticism by the Lords Select Committee, by the Royal Commission tenth report and, most recently, by the House of Commons Select Committee on the Environment. In the light of that, does the right hon. Gentleman not feel the need to introduce a new sense of urgency into his discussions with the Ministry of Agriculture? May we expect a statement or some new policy initiative soon to resolve the undoubted difficulties between the right hon. Gentleman's Department and the Ministry of Agriculture?

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman is being a little unfair to both Departments. I am sure that he has noticed a number of recent conservationist initiatives taken by my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, including the initiative in Brussels for the new structure directive, the change in the farm grant system to favour conservation, the participation in the new and very welcome experiment in the Broads to preserve the Halvergate Marshes, the reduced levels of financial support for drainage grants, and support for farming and wildlife advisory groups throughout England. These all represent a considerable shift in emphasis, which I am sure is welcomed on both sides of the House.

Mr. John Mark Taylor: When he turns his mind to matters that have to do with agriculture and with the Department of the Environment, will my right hon. Friend consider the European Community fund for the preservation of the habitat of endangered species? Is the United Kingdom drawing on the fund adequately?

Mr. Jenkin: If my hon. Friend would care to put down a specific question on that point, I should be very happy to give him an answer.

Mr. Denis Howell: Does the Secretary of State agree that the Select Committee report of this House was extremely scathing, but also realistic? Will he acknowledge that since the enactment of the Wildlife and Countryside Act it has been reported that over 156 sites of special scientific interest have been damaged? Do the Government not accept considerable responsibility for that damage? They provided only £600,000 to police the Act in relation to land acquisition and management agreements. Although the Government are to provide £7 million this year, which we acknowledge and appreciate, it shows the degree of ineptitude of the Government. May we have an assurance that the Government will provide sufficient money so that all the responsibilities of the Nature Conservancy Council can be carried out?

Mr. Jenkin: I must ask the House to await the Government's response to what is without doubt an important report by the Select Committee. I thought that the right hon. Gentleman's acknowledgement of the very substantial increase in the funding of the Nature Conservancy Council—an additional £7 million—was singularly churlish. I can tell the right hon. Gentleman that this increae has been very much welcomed by the council.

Planning Laws (Contravention)

4. Mr. John Hunt asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is satisfied with the enforcement procedures provided by the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 in respect of buildings constructed in contravention of the planning laws and subsequently occupied as a main or only residence; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Neil Macfarlane): My right hon. Friend is satisfied with the provisions of section 87 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971, as amended. If, however, my hon. Friend is aware of any special difficulties, my right hon. Friend will be glad to consider them.

Mr. Hunt: On tht very point, is my hon. Friend aware that a mobile prefabricated home was recently erected on green belt land in my constituency within a few days without any kind of planning permission and that Bromley council reckons that because of the cumbersome nature of the present planning laws it may take several years for this building to be removed? Is this not an affront to the law-abiding neighbours in that area? Can we not tighten up the law in order to deal more promptly and effectively with those who deliberately flout it in this way?

Mr. Macfarlane: I do not think that either my right hon. Friend The Secretary of State for the Environment or my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is anxious to return to the conditions that prevailed in the 1960s, which involved the use of magistrates' courts. They would lead to all kinds of problems. The vigilance of the local authority is absolutely critical and vital in all these circumstances, and Bromley has a good record. Its officers know what legal measures are appropriate. I am aware that there have been exceptional delays in some cases, in particular in the case to which my hon. Friend has referred. However, local authorities can take more effective action quickly by prosecuting for failure to obtain the site licence that is required under the Caravan Sites and Control of Development Act 1960. However, we must have a look at these problems, and I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Rural Conservation

5. Mr. Kenneth Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent measures he has taken to conserve the rural environment.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. William Waldegrave): Our recent agreement to the Broads experimental scheme is a significant step forward both to safeguard the unique landscape and to test the effectiveness of a new means of achieving a viable agriculture in environmentally sensitive areas. We have also just published the Government's response to the Countryside Commission's review of uplands policies.

These decisions follow my right hon. Friend's earlier announcement of substantial increases in grant-in-aid to the commission and the Nature Conservancy Council in 1985-86.

Mr. Carlisle: I am grateful for that reply, but will my hon. Friend emphasise that if we are to conserve wildlife in the wider countryside we need to develop the concept of integrated farming in its practical applications? In this respect I was glad to hear what my hon. Friend said about the Broadlands experimental scheme, but will he press for the extension of this integrated approach to other areas?

Mr. Waldegrave: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's support for the experimental scheme. It has been widely welcomed on both sides of the House and by those who are concerned with the integration of farming and the countryside. Similar schemes are in operation in some of the national parks. This is a major step forward. We all want to learn from it how to go forward in this very sensitive area.

Mr. Chris Smith: In pushing forward his unfortunately inadequate steps to conserve the rural environment, will the Minister be giving wholehearted and full backing to the Bill that is to be introduced on Friday next by my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark)?

Mr. Waldegrave: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is a great expert on these matters. The Government have done much more than the Labour Government did. It is well known that we welcome the blocking of the three-month loophole, as proposed by the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark). However, I hope that the hon. Member for South Shields will await my proper response to his Bill when we debate it on Friday.

Mr. Steen: Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the best ways of conserving greenfield sites in the countryside is for the Government to auction off some of the 112,000 acres still on the land register and in public ownership?

Mr. Waldegrave: I think that there is something in what my hon. Friend says, but it does not relate directly to these issues.

Dr. David Clark: Obviously the protection of the rural environment depends essentially on closing the loopholes in the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981. Will the Minister state whether the Government intend to back the Bill that will be discussed in the House on Friday, which seeks to close those six major loopholes? Will the hon. Gentleman make a clear and unequivocal statement to the House on where the Government stand? We need the answer now.

Mr. Waldegrave: One major loophole is covered in the hon. Gentleman's Bill, and the Government have long made it clear that they welcome its closure. They also welcome the forthright support given by the all-party Select Committee for the Wildlife and Countryside Act, which has been the subject of much rather ill-informed criticism on the part of some Opposition Members, although not the hon. Gentleman.

South-East (Structure Plans)

6. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the present progress of structure plans in the south-east.

The Minister for Local Government (Mr. Kenneth Baker): The south-east region comprises Greater London and 12 shire counties. The latter are covered by 17 approved structure plans, most of which are at varying stages of review and alteration. At present I have before me proposals for nine alterations. My hon. Friend will know that Berkshire county council is preparing a single new structure plan to replace the three existing ones for east, west and central Berkshire. A draft for this replacement plan was published last April for public consultation.

Mr. MacKay: Is my right hon. Friend aware that his Department's diktat to Berkshire county council to make provision in its structure plan for central Berkshire for a vast number of new houses to be built is completely opposed by the population of Berkshire for three very good reasons? First, there is not the demand for those houses. Secondly, terrific damage will be done to the environment. Thirdly, employment in the regions concerned and our inner-city policy will be adversely affected.

Mr. Baker: I understand that the county council issued a consultation document containing a figure of nearly 8,000 extra houses, but that it has now issued a further consultation document, and public meetings are being held and public consultation is being carried out about it. I appreciate that there is considerable pressure around London and in the home counties for new houses, but there is also a strong counter pressure against new large estates. A balance must be struck in such matters.

"Coal and the Environment"

8. Mr. Dormand asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a further statement on the Government's response to the Commission on Energy and the Environment's report, "Coal and the Environment."

Mr. Macfarlane: Progress continues to be made in implementing the commitments given in the Government's response to the commission's report.

Mr. Dormand: Will the Minister give further attention to two aspects that are emphasised in the report? First, renewed efforts should be made with regard to dereliction. However, I immediately recognise the excellent work that has been done under Governments of both parties. Secondly, the despoliation of beaches is as serious now as it was when the report was published in 1981. In coalmining areas beaches provide an important amenity, yet they are an eyesore now as they are covered with coal waste. Will the hon. Gentleman do something about that?

Mr. Macfarlane: We share the hon. Gentleman's anxieties and agree with the strategy that he wants to see implemented. Within the resources available, I can give the hon. Gentleman that full assurance. The Horden pipeline experiment is of great importance but is not at present operating because of the dispute. However, in use it has proved technically very successful. The experimental period is to be extended to allow a full assessment to be made once the dispute is over.

Mr. Forman: When considering the Government's response to the impact of coal on the environment, will my hon. Friend and his ministerial colleagues be prepared to give full weight to the possibility of installing equipment on a pilot basis which might reduce the emissions of acid and other noxious substances from coal-fired power stations?

Mr. Macfarlane: I note my hon. Friend's request. I shall study it and write to him.

Mr. Gareth Wardell: Are the Government satisfied that no longer will opencast coal mine workings be permitted as near to occupied dwellings as 50 yards?

Mr. Macfarlane: We have considered many elements of planning and coal, coal extraction and the general development order. They are all under review and are constantly under discussion, though the role of the local authority is obviously of prime importance. We have made great steps, and I shall look into the point that the hon. Gentleman raises.

Mr. Barron: Will the Minister also look into the cost of the protection of the environment arising from coal mining? Does he think, for example, that the Exchequer might relieve the National Coal Board of some of its costs, so making pits more economic?

Mr. Macfarlane: The hon. Gentleman, representing the part of England that he does, will be pleased to hear that my right hon. Friend has agreed to provide £2·5 million to help finance spoil disposal schemes. A list of possible schemes has now been drawn up and discussions between my Department, the NCB and the local authorities involved are continuing. That is good news.

Borough of Brent (Negotiable Bonds)

9. Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for the Environment why the London borough of Brent has been forbidden to issue negotiable bonds to assist in its financial responsibilities and with the construction of new homes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: No such instructions have been issued, either by the Government or, I understand, by the Bank of England.

Mr. Pavitt: Does the Minister realise that the fact that the Conservative-controlled London borough of Brent is rate-capped means that, although the instructions have not been issued, there is no way in which negotiable bonds can now be put on the money market to deal with the crisis there of 17,000 on the housing waiting list and £30,000 a week being spent on the homeless? Is he aware that because of that taxpayers and ratepayers will have to pay an extra 0·5 per cent. if, after July, when we reach the top of the reserve list, the London borough of Brent is then able to borrow capital to deal with its problems? Does he realise that, as a result of the situation, taxpayers and ratepayers will have to pay an increased subvention, all because of the way in which the Government are looking after the money market first and homemakers second?

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman has got hold of the wrong end of the stick. The list of authorities wishing to make bond issues is full until the beginning of April, but the Bank of England has accepted bookings for Brent bonds to be issued subsequent to that. The hon. Gentleman rightly says that Brent is under Conservative control. That is why it is one of the rate-capped authorities that will comply with the law. It has already shown the way to many other rate-capped authorities by making savings of up to £20 million without making one person redundant.

Mr. Simon Hughes rose——

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. Gentleman's supplementary question relate to Brent?

Mr. Hughes: Yes, Mr. Speaker. As the right hon. Gentleman will be aware, Brent council is a hung council, with the Tories only governing by agreement with the Liberals. Is he aware that the only way in which that authority will be able to meet the rate-capped limit—[Interruption.]—is if the £3 million of housing benefit repayment due is paid into its budget? What does the right hon. Gentleman propose to do to make sure that outstanding repayments of millions of pounds to that and other rate-capped authorities are paid so that they may be able to fix a rate? [Interruption.] May we also have an assurance that the money brokers will not charge extra interest just because they are rate-capped authorities.

Mr. Baker: I am delighted that the Conservative group in Brent has the support of the Liberal group there in implementing economies without Brent having to suffer. That is the policy that has been followed by the authority, which is conducting its affairs in a responsible and sensible way.

Alnwick (Urban Aid)

10. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment why projects in Alnwick are no longer eligible for urban aid.

Sir George Young: Our policy is to concentrate traditional urban programme resources in the more extensively deprived urban areas with 20,000 or more population. Alnwick district has no urban centre of that size.

Mr. Beith: May we be told who dreams up the arbitrary lines and population figures so as to exclude from urban aid places which his officials have hitherto recognised have problems of social deprivation and unemployment just as great as those of areas of larger population? Will the hon. Gentleman recognise, when making future grants, the problems of areas such as Alnwick, whose problems were recognised in the past?

Sir George Young: I understand that even during the time of the Lib-Lab pact Alnwick did not receive any special treatment under the urban programme. The policy, which I am prepared to defend and which I hope the hon. Gentleman will support, is to concentrate the urban programme on areas which suffer from extensive deprivation. Having looked at the statistics for his constituency, I must tell the hon. Gentleman that the needs do not compare with those of other urban areas, where the need is far more extensive. There are small acute pockets of deprivation in Alnwick, but the scale of the problems is such that the local authority should be able to cope with them from its normal resources.

Housing Capital Expenditure

12. Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he is satisfied that the amounts allocated to housing capital expenditure in "The Government's Expenditure Plans 1985-86 to 1987-88" will be sufficient to prevent the deterioration of the housing stock.

Sir George Young: The Government's plans allow for over £3 billion of public investment in housing in each of the next three years. It is for local authorities to decide what proportions of their share to use on renovating their stock, on home improvement grants or on other capital expenditure.

Mr. Alton: What advice does the Under-Secretary of State have for authorities such as my own, which have already entered into legal and binding agreements for next year's capital programme and now find that their allocation is insufficient to meet those contracts? What advice does the hon. Gentleman have for authorities which have stopped their housing action area programmes and have put most of their resources elsewhere?

Sir George Young: The message to Liverpool must be that it needs a heavy injection of realism. The council's stated intention for capital expenditure on housing stretches far beyond any reasonable expectation of capital provision. The message to go back to Liverpool is that Liverpool must try to live within its means.

Mr. Yeo: Is my hon. Friend aware that housing expenditure is one of the most labour-intensive forms of any public expenditure? Is he further aware that the reports in today's press of the possibility of further cuts in housing expenditure have given rise to considerable concern?

Sir George Young: There is no foundation for that headline.

Miss Boothroyd: Is the Under-Secretary of State aware that, because of the Government's pernicious financial policies, for the first time in the history of the Black Country towns within Sandwell are unable to build council houses? What message does the hon. Gentleman have for the more than 6,000 families who are on a council waiting list in that area?

Sir George Young: The first message to any local authority must be that it should look at the number of vacant units it already has. Often those units are vacant for more than 12 months. The local authority's first priority must be to get that stock back into use.

Dr. Hampson: Does my hon. Friend agree that we are accustomed to the press selectively quoting from leaked Government documents? Will he go beyond what he said to my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo), because, unless he knocks on the head the impression given in The Guardian today that councils will not be eligible to use their assets, there will be no incentive for councils to sell their assets, which is central Government policy?

Sir George Young: I have seen the article to which my hon. Friend referred. The headline in particular is grossly misleading. No such proposal is on the table.

Mr. Steel: Does not the hon. Gentleman's answer to the questions asked by the hon. Members for Leeds, North-West (Dr. Hampson) and for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) mean that he is denying the figures contained in the reports, which claim to come from his Department, showing that there has been a severe reduction in the number of new starts in house building in the public and private sectors? Is the hon. Gentleman denying those figures?

Sir George Young: When my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced on 18 December his proposals for the capital spending in 1985-86 by local authorities, he indicated that the pesent system was unsatisfactory and that he was embarking on discussions with the local authority associations. My right hon. Friend has held a useful meeting with the chairman of the local authority associations. That article arises from a subsequent discussion between my right hon. Friend's officials and officers of the associations.

Mr. Bendall: As the London borough of Redbridge has had its share cut by £7 million, how does my hon. Friend think that Redbridge, with a large number of Airey houses, can repair those units? The cut will seriously delay those repairs.

Sir George Young: I am well aware of the particular problems in Redbridge, where there are a number of Airey houses. I have had a meeting with the chairman of the housing committee. The representations made by my hon. Friend and by the chairman of the housing committee have been taken into account in assessing Redbridge's housing allocation for next year.

Mr. Rooker: I ask the Under-Secretary of State two questions. First, will he answer question No. 12 and say whether the money will prevent a deterioration in the housing stock? Secondly can the hon. Gentleman categorically tell the House whether the proposal announced by the Secretary of State to cut to 20 per cent. the amount that local authorities can use will be the figure in the order brought before the House, or will the figure be less than 20 per cent., as forecast in The Guardian this morning?

Sir George Young: The figure will be 20 per cent. On the first question, the responsibility for preventing the deterioration of the housing stock has to rest in the first instance with the owner-occupier, who is, in the vast majority of cases, the owner of the stock, rather than the Government.

Council Housing (Privatisation)

13. Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will take action to privatise local authority housing other than through individual sales to sitting tenants or third parties.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Private developers have bought, improved, and successfully resold, thousands of derelict and vacant local authority dwellings. Some local authority tenants are taking on the responsibility for running their own estates through management co-operatives. I want to see these welcome trends accelerated.

Mr. Marlow: As it appears that in those countries where rented accommodation is provided by commercial enterprise rather than by a municipal organisation the housing and the environment are better and the cost is somewhat less, will my right hon. Friend consider being more radical in his proposals and require some local authorities to divest themselves of some of their larger and less well-run estates to private enterprise organisations licensed by the Government and operating within certain requirements?

Mr. Jenkin: There are now some 70 schemes of substantial local authority estates or blocks of flats being refurbished and developed in partnership between the public and the private sector. Some of those include tenanted estates. It is encouraging to find that when tenants are offered the chance of and consulted about participating in such ventures they prefer to do that rather than to stay with the local authority. That is something that we are pursuing with considerable energy, because I believe that it is an important development.

Mr. Winnick: Why does the Secretary of State not recognise that hundreds of thousands of people are living in great housing hardship and misery because they cannot be housed by their local authority? Is it not a striking illustration of the Government's callous indifference that they have each year cut the amount of money made available to local authorities? In my borough, only because it has not had the money available, no contracts for new council housing have been entered into for the past six years. When will the Secretary of State recognise his responsibility towards people in such a desperate housing plight in my borough and the rest of the country?

Mr. Jenkin: I am a bit surprised that the hon. Gentleman is not prepared to welcome schemes where private sector money will relieve local authorities of the cost and responsibility of refurbishing some of their most unattractive and difficult to let areas so that the local authorities can concentrate on providing for the needs where the hon. Gentleman has identified. He has a blinkered view of the best way forward in this matter.

Mr. Spencer: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is only too self-evident from the evidence of Socialist city councils up and down the country that the vast amounts of money that have been directed into those quarters have not benefited the council tenants, who were meant to be the beneficiaries, and that it is necessary to consider new methods of financing housing for those who cannot afford to pay for it themselves?

Mr. Jenkin: I agree with my hon. and learned Friend. I am prepared to adopt the words of one Labour leader of a council in the north-west, who said the other day:

"In many of these great urban estates the public sector has caused the problems, and they will not be solved without the support of the private sector."

I agree with that.

Mr. Cartwright: Does the Secretary of State confirm that the best way to deal with monolithic council estates is not to sell them for private profit but to devolve power to the tenants to enable them to run their own affairs through management and maintenance co-operatives? What practical steps is he taking to encourage local authorities to make progress along those lines?

Mr. Jenkin: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. There is room for a variety of solutions. Some of the tenants' co-operatives that have been developed have been extremely successful. If he consulted his hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton), he would find that it is a matter of great regret that Liverpool city council has cut off tenants' co-operatives from any access to city finance——

Mr. Simon Hughes: Quite right.

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Member says "Quite right." He should go and talk to the people who are waiting for their houses from those co-operatives.

Mr. Hardy: Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that in many areasa local authorities are not allowed to improve as many houses as they would like, or as their tenants and local ratepayers would like? Is the right hon. Gentleman also aware that in those areas regional and local newspapers are frequently given to criticising councils for their failure to improve as many houses as they would like? Will the right hon. Gentleman make it absolutely clear to the media that councils cannot improve the number of houses that they would like because of Government policy and ministerial action, rather than because of their own decisions?

Mr. Jenkin: If the hon. Gentleman has only just discovered that it is the Government's policy, in pursuit of their general economic initiatives and the control of inflation, to keep a firm control of public spending, I am not quite sure where he has been for the past five years. I would have more sympathy for any council that had gone out of its way to seek private sector partnership to try to resolve some of its problems—[Interruption.] I am glad to hear that the hon. Gentleman's council has done just that. That is the way in which those blocks of flats and estates can be refurbished and developed. There are now examples all over the country which are cheered and applauded by those who live on the estates.

Thames Water Authority

14. Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last met the chairman of the Thames water authority; and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. Gow: I met the chairman on 14 January. We discussed several subjects, mainly financial.

Mr. Sims: Can my hon. Friend tell me why he has chosen to ignore the view put forward by the chairman of Thames water authority that the figure that my hon. Friend uses as a reasonable return on assets is hypothetical and unrealistic? Is my hon. Friend seriously asking me to vote this evening in support of orders to limit the extent to which local authorities can increase their rates, and is he asking me tomorrow evening to vote for orders that will place on the Thames water authority the duty to impose a far higher rate than it wishes or needs to impose?

Mr. Gow: The net tangible assets of Thames, as at 31 March 1984 and as certified in the accounts that were signed by the chairman and the director of finance and audited by Arthur Andersen, are £4,425 million. I understand the views expressed by my hon. Friend. He is correct in that, to my regret, there is no agreement between the chairman of Thames and myself about the basis on which a proper return on investment is required. Nevertheless, it is true that for the current financial year the rate of return required by Thames is 0·5 per cent., which is the lowest target for any water authority, and for the coming year the target set for Thames is 1·37 per cent., which is still the lowest target for any of the 10 water authorities.

Mr. Pavitt: Will the Minister convey to the chairman of Thames water authority the admiration of many hon. Members on both sides of the House for the way in which he has resisted the Government's attempt for the first time, to make water a taxable commodity? Will the Minister convey our thanks to the chairman for standing up to the Government in the vigorous way that he has already done?

Mr. Gow: We are setting higher targets for the water industry as a whole, including Thames. I should like to join the hon. Gentleman in paying a tribute to Mr. Roy Watts — [Interruption.] Oh yes. The chairman of Thames water authority is fully aware of the fact that he was chosen by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to be chairman of Thames because he had the qualities that were required of the chairman. I pay tribute to what he has achieved. The dispute is about the rate of return that should be required on a current cost accounting basis.

Mr. Jessel: Will my hon. Friend please explain why any financial return on capital is needed at all for this public utility operating in a monopoly beyond what is required for current outgoings, for provision for future construction and repair and for repayment of debt over a reasonable period, such as eight or 10 years?

Mr. Gow: Because it is the Government's policy that assets in the public sector should earn a proper rate of return. In that respect we are following precisely the principles that were laid down by the Labour Government in their White Paper in 1978.

Mr. Eggar: When my hon. Friend met the chairman of the Thames water authority, did he discuss the denationalisation of that body? Is he aware that the board is in favour of such a course of action? Could he not agree with the chairman of the board on that objective at least?

Mr. Gow: I did not discuss that possibility with the chairman of Thames Water Authority on the occasion to which the question relates. My hon. Friend will be aware of a reply that was given last week by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to a question on this subject.

Dr. Cunningham: Is the Minister aware that we welcome his confirmation that Mr. Roy Watts has not only acted with courage but within his terms of reference, unlike the hon. Gentleman, who seems to be doing everything possible to exceed his in leaning on the chairman, second-guessing him, overruling him and imposing a tax on water consumers in the Thames area? Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that, by normal accounting methods, Thames Water is the seventh most profitable business in Britain? Will he also confirm that the current cost accounting methods he is seeking to impose are not widely employed in business in Britain and amount to an imposition by the Government of a naked tax on water consumers?

Mr. Gow: It is strange that there should be this conversion of the hon. Gentleman. The orders that will be debated tomorrow evening are the fourth and fifth orders that have been laid before the House. The first three orders, which were made under section 29 of the Water Act 1973 and which were calculated on exactly the same basis of current cost accounting, were not opposed by the Labour party. I remind the House of the conclusions reached by Price Waterhouse and Co. in its report in 1981 on the principle of current cost accounting. It said:

"The approach to current cost accounting, which has been adopted by the water authorities, is both soundly based and sensible."

Domestic Rates

15. Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from ratepayers concerning the likely level of rates for 1985-86; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I have received a variety of representations. If authorities budget to spend at target the average increase in rates should be in low single figures.

Mr. Proctor: Does my right hon. Friend agree that high rates are inimical to job creation and that there is much support for the Government's rate-capping proposals in areas such as Basildon, which is spending £600,000 on housing administration, and Lewisham, which has just commissioned a report that will cost the ratepayers of Lewisham about £5,000, into the psychological impact of golliwogs on children in Lewisham?

Mr. Baker: My hon. Friend has to suffer under the district council of Basildon, which is living in an unreal world, having increased its planned spending last year by 20 per cent. Undoubtedly, the ratepayers of Basildon will be helped considerably by the rate-capping that we are introducing this year.

Mr. Fatchett rose——

Mr. Boyes: Does the Minister agree that the natural solution to the level of rates is to let those who have to pay them speak through the ballot box? Through various measures, such as the abolition of the GLC and metropolitan councils, and now rate-capping, the Government seem to think that democracy can be thrown out of the window at their whim. They will suffer as a consequence of that in future.

Mr. Baker: Only 18 out of the 413 local authorities will be rate-capped this year. This means that some 390 will be living within the system. Some of those authorities will be allowed—and are already predicting—very large rate increases. For example, Liverpool city council, which is not rate-capped this year, is predicting a very substantial rate increase. We feel that the Government share the responsibility for protecting ratepayers in the hard-pressed areas.

Mr. Forth: Could not my right hon. Friend hold out hope for hard-pressed ratepayers, and avoid the necessity for future rate capping, by bringing forward proposals to reform local Government finances in such a way as to re-establish the connection between voting and paying tax, the lack of which is one of the main reasons for the current problems in local government?

Mr. Baker: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The link between the rate demand and the ballot box has grown very thin in many areas. This is one of the many matters that I am considering in my review of local government. I hope that it will be possible to bring forward proposals later this year for public discussion.

Mr. Loyden: Does the Minister not understand that at a time of mass unemployment, when thousands of people are awaiting housing, and when, in many towns and cities, there is an aging population, local authorities need not less but more finance to provide for those problems, which have been directly caused by the present Government?

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman represents part of the city of Liverpool. His city council is making such demands upon the national Exchequer that no Government could possibly meet them. I hope that that will not result in a grave crisis in the city of Liverpool later in the year. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to help to solve the housing crisis in Liverpool, he should persuade the city council to end its policy of buying co-operatives and instead to encourage co-operative housing development, which is what many of the people of Liverpool want.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: In Leicester, which is to be rate-capped, I have received fewer than 12 letters expressing opposition to rate capping and more than 150 expressing approval of it. Will my right hon. Friend assure his Department that the majority in Leicester believe that rate capping is important for the future of the city?

Mr. Baker: I thank my hon. Friend for his robust defence of Government policy.

Mr. Speaker: I must correct a wrong. I call Mr. Fatchett.

Mr. Fatchett: I am most grateful to you, Mr. Speaker. Despite the embarrassment that you caused my hon. Friend the Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes), I thought that he did very well with his question.

Is not the reality that the Minister has had to introduce rate capping because the Government have totally failed to honour their commitment in relation to local government expenditure? They have failed to abolish rates. They have lifted the burden of local authority expenditure away from the taxpayer and on to the individual ratepayer. Rather than helping the ratepayer, the Government have made themselves the enemy of the ratepayer by ensuring that they are paying more for less in terms of services.

Mr. Baker: Since 1979 we have succeeded in restraining the rate of growth in local government expenditure to 1 per cent. a year in real terms. In the 1960s and 1970s there was growth of about 3 per cent. a year in real terms. The 18 rate-capped authorities together account for excess spending this year of £550 million.

Mr. Straw: When Mr. John Clout, the leader of Conservative-controlled North Yorkshire county council, complained last month that of the 8·6 per cent. increase in the rates more than half was due to cuts in central Government grants, was he telling the truth?

Mr. Baker: Speaking from memory, I believe that in North Yorkshire there was an increase in grant this year. Several shire counties have suffered a reduction in grant this year, including my own county of Surrey, which has just announced a rate increase of 4·9 per cent.

Water Authorities

17. Mr. Hicks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the response of water authorities to the Government's decision to revise their financial targets in 1985-86; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gow: Mixed. If I should catch your eye tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, I hope to make a statement then.

Mr. Hicks: Can my hon. Friend explain the logic of the Government pursuing a strict anti-inflation policy and then deliberately imposing an increased scale of water charges on business and domestic consumers?

Mr. Gow: I understand my hon. Friend's point, but it is Government policy that a proper rate of return should be earned by assets in the public sector. As to the effect of inflation, a 1 per cent. increase in water charges would add one hundredth of 1 per cent. to the retail prices index. Mercifully, charges for water are a modest part of household budgets. Moreover, water charges are taken fully into account when calculating supplementary benefit, and 3 million households receive help in that way.

Mr. Harris: Will my hon. Friend think again, even at this late stage, as many of us do not see the logic of the Government's policy? What is more, many people outside will be angry when they receive their water rate bills in a couple of weeks' time.

Mr. Gow: I shall do my utmost to persuade my hon. Friend in the debate tomorrow.

Mr. Bermingham: Will the Minister come clean either now or tomorrow and admit that the Government are imposing a tax on users of water, whether private or industrial? There is a tax on gas and electricity for the benefit of the Government's coffers, and water authorities are now being used in exactly the same way.

Mr. Gow: I do not agree that the Government are imposing a tax on water. We are requiring a higher rate of return on assets owned by water authorities. A consequence of that higher rate of return will be higher investment and a reduction in borrowing. The latter is a central purpose of the Government's economic policy.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We must move on, but in the debate tomorrow I shall bear in mind those hon. Members who wished to get in on this important question.

Mr. Winnick: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the point of order arise out of questions?

Mr. Winnick: I cannot pretend that it does. If you cannot accept it now, Mr. Speaker, may I give notice that I intend to raise a point of order with you at the first opportunity?

Gibraltar

3.31 pm

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Sir Geoffrey Howe): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement about the outcome of my meeting yesterday in Geneva with the Spanish Foreign Minister, Sr. Moran, about Gibraltar.

As I foreshadowed in my statement to the House on 28 November, our meeting marked the start of the restoration, after an interval of 15 years, of direct communications and the free movement of persons, vehicles and goods between Gibraltar and Spain. We have also started the negotiations that were envisaged by the Lisbon statement of April 1980. They are aimed at overcoming all of the differences between us on Gibraltar and at promoting co-operation between Gibraltar and Spain on a wide range of matters. In addition, Spaniards in Gibraltar and Gibraltarians in Spain will enjoy European Community rights in advance of Spanish accession to the Community.

Spanish, British and Gibraltarian officials will now meet to deal with several specific areas for practical co-operation. They include aviation, tourism and economic and cultural matters. The first such meeting begins this month. Mr. Moran specifically reaffirmed to me the undertaking set out in the Brussels communiqué that the Spanish Government will take the early actions necessary to allow safe and effective air communications in the region. Specific ideas for this are now under consideration.

Mr. Moran raised the subject of sovereignty at our meeting. He was entitled to do so under the terms of the Lisbon and Brussels statements. He also outlined informally to me some ideas on the subject and said that he will later make formal proposals. However, Mr. Moran underlined the importance that he attaches to the interests and feelings of the Gibraltar people when dealing with this issue. For my part, I made clear that the British Government's commitment to honour the freely and democratically expressed wishes of the Gibraltarian people, which is plainly set out in the preamble to the Gibraltar constitution, stands unchanged.

Sir Joshua Hassan, who has led his people so resolutely over many years of difficulty, participated at my side yesterday as a member of the British delegation. He subsequently described the meeting in Geneva as positive and constructive in every way, and expressed himself fully satisfied that the results are good for Gibraltar. I greatly valued his wise advice. I am sure that the whole House will join me in paying tribute to his courage, steadfastness and statesmanship.

The task ahead is to see that practical co-operation between Gibraltar and Spain develops in a way which will benefit both peoples and that Spain and the United Kingdom continue to manage our differences as befits friends and allies.

In conclusion, I should like to make quite clear to the House that this result is good for Britain, good for Spain and, above all, good for the people of Gibraltar whose wishes we are pledged to respect.

Mr. Denis Healey (Leeds, East): I welcome the statement of the Foreign Secretary and the fact that the frontier is now open. I think that hon. Members on both sides of the House will feel that it is important that the increase in contacts at the human level between Gibraltar and Spain and the close economic and cultural links which the Foreign Secretary foreshadowed should be able to reduce the fears and suspicions which have long tormented relations on both sides.

I am glad that the Foreign Secretary was able to tell us that Sr. Moran recognises the importance of the feelings and interests of the people of Gibraltar on this matter and has therefore made no formal approach on the question of sovereignty at this stage. He must recognise that there is widespread opposition on the rock, and there would be increased opposition if there were any pressure from the Spanish side for early negotiations on this matter. I hope that the Spanish Government also will consider the implications for any negotiations on the rock with regard to their own position in the Moroccan enclaves across the straits.

Nevertheless, I hope that all hon. Members will recognise that the existence of a strong democratic regime in Spain after so many years — a regime which, moreover, will join Britain in the Community in the very near future — increases the importance of developing links at every level between Gibraltar and Spain.

May I ask the Foreign Secretary two specific questions? First, can he tell us yet which civil servant will be responsible for pursuing the course which he has described to us this afternoon? Secondly, has the Prime Minister now any plans for visiting Madrid? The Foreign Secretary will be aware that she is the only Prime Minister of a community country who has not yet visited the capital of Spain.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): She has been everywhere else.

Mr. Healey: I must confess to my hon. Friend that my suggestion was not wholly without concern for assuring that there is no disagreement between the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary on this matter as so unfortunately occurred during the negotiations on Hong Kong.

Finally, I hope that the precedent of better relations with Spain will be followed by seeking better relations with another democratic regime in another hispanic country which also maintains historic claims to sovereignty over a British colony.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his opening remarks. There is no parallel between the case of Gibraltar and that of the Falkland Islands. They are historically, legally and constitutionally quite different. Perhaps the most important difference is that Spain recognises the validity of our title under the treaty of Utrecht whereas Argentina refuses to acknowledge our sovereignty over the Falkland Islands. Spain's attitude to the rights of the inhabitants of Gibraltar is also markedly different. Spain is an ally in NATO and a prospective partner in the European Community and has publicly stated that it intends to pursue its claim by peaceful means. The right hon. Gentleman will appreciate that that is in total contrast with the historical, geographical and constitutional position of the Falkland Islands. Our position in relation to the Falkland Islands remains unchanged.

The discussions between Spain and the United Kingdom will be monitored by civil servants on both sides at suitably senior level, subject to my direction on behalf of the Government.

As for possible visits, at this stage I say only that the agreement reached in Brussels and its implementation from yesterday plainly opens up prospects of visits far more clearly than has been the case thus far.

Sir Peter Blaker (Blackpool, South): I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on the part that he has played in ensuring that the border was finally opened. We hope that tourism will benefit from that, but does he agree that the main economic enterprise in Gibraltar remains the dockyard? Does he agree that it would be most helpful to good relations between Spain and Gibraltar if the Spaniards sent some ships to that yard for repair?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his congratulations. He was right to draw attention to tourism as being perhaps the most important component of economic growth in and around Gibraltar. Nevertheless, the dockyard remains important. I am glad to be able to tell the House that in the first nearly two months of its existence as a commercial yard it has got off to a very good start, that 500 people are now employed there and that the management expects a substantial increase in that number in the months ahead. A significant number of craft have passed through the yard. I am sure that the Spanish Government and, perhaps more important, Spanish commercial interests will appreciate the importance of the point made by my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): I congratulate the Foreign Secretary on a well balanced and fair statement which safeguards the democratic wishes of Gibraltarians and paves the way for better relations with Spain. So why is Mr. Joe Bossano getting so excited?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his congratulations. As he will know, there are circumstances in which Opposition parties do not always take the same view as the Government of the day. I believe that the developments likely to take place in Gibraltar in the months and years ahead are likely to be seen as so much to the advantage of the people of Gibraltar that the understandable anxiety that now exists in Gibraltar —I seek in no way to diminish its significance—will respond to the practical consequences of the steps that we have taken.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): I welcome my right hon. and learned Friend's achievement and that of Sir Joshua Hassan. In telling the Department that the Government stand firm on the commitment to the Gibraltar constitution, will my right hon. and learned Friend stress that in no circumstances will the House of Commons permit any retreat from that position?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have made it quite plain, not just in the Department where it has always been abundantly plain but to the Spanish Foreign Minister and the people of Gibraltar throughout the negotiations, that the commitment set out in the Gibraltar constitution stands without qualification and is of the utmost importance. One of the most important features of the negotiations has been the extent to which that has been wisely and practically acknowledged by Spanish Government spokesmen.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): Does the Foreign Secretary agree that on an important constitutional matter the view of every opposition is important? In view of the narrow margin between the parties in Gibraltar, what consideration was given to the views of Mr. Joe Bossano?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I agree that one should not disregard the view of any opposition in a parliamentary democracy. When one discusses a matter of such importance with a democratically based community such as Gibraltar, it is right to pay attention to the views expressed by the democratically elected Chief Minister. He offered wide and sustained advice throughout the matter, and has been responsible for carrying through the Gibraltar legislature the necessary measures, which he has done. That is the right way to handle such an issue. I am grateful for the support and advice that I have received from Sir Joshua Hassan.

Sir Antony Buck (Colchester, North): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that most Conservative Members will wish to congratulate him on what has been achieved and, even more, on the responsible attitude adopted by Sir Joshua Hassan and many people in Gibraltar. Will my right hon. and learned Friend say a word about the defence implications of the agreement, and confirm that Gibraltar will continue under the new set-up to be an important factor in our defence of that part of the Mediterranean?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for his opening remarks and endorse what he said about Sir Joshua Hassan. The defence component of Gibraltar remains important. One of the points touched on in the Brussels communiqué was the possibility of discussions on military matters with the Spanish Government. That has not arisen yet, and a number of other questions in the NATO context do not arise in the present circumstances.

Mr. John David Taylor (Strangford): Although most hon. Members will welcome the Government's position, which honours the freely and democratically expressed wishes of the Gibraltarians, they must be worried that in the statement the Secretary of State made a distinction between our Government's position and the position of the Spanish Foreign Minister. Will he explain further the distinction that he made when he went out of his way to say that the Spanish Government simply and merely attaches importance to the interests and feelings of the Gibraltar people? That is certainly not recognising their democratic rights.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: It is right to acknowledge the extent to which the Spanish Government, founded, as the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) pointed out, on the basis of a democratic constitution, and democratically elected, recognise the importance of Gibraltar's democratic institutions. Some time ago, Sr Moran observed:

> "If they gave me Gibraltar on a plate against the will of the Gibraltarians it would not be a good deal for Spain."

That is an important recognition of the importance of the wishes and interests of the Gibraltarians. I take the opportunity of paying tribute to Sr Moran's contribution to the negotiations. I repeat that our commitment as set out in the 1969 constitution stands unqualified.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): Clearly the House will wish to congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend and Sr Moran on the positive way in which the talks have begun. Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that clearing the air on this matter will facilitate Spain's entry into the European Community, and also enable it to continue its membership of NATO?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's opening remarks. We attach importance to Spain's continued membership of NATO and its accession to the Community. I hope that the agreements that we reached on this matter will help to sustain both those things. It was also important for us to reach a conclusion on these matters bilaterally between our two countries to establish a co-operative atmosphere and to make it plain that it was not in any sense being agreed upon in the course of securing agreement to Spain's entry to the Community.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): Does the Foreign Secretary agree that congratulations are due both to him and, more important, to the democratic Government in Spain who have acted intelligently throughout the discussions? Is it not clear that in the long run the question of sovereignty must be settled through negotiations with Spain? Is it not also clear that Joe Bossano has much in common with Felipe Gonzalez if we could only get the two people together and discuss the matter in such a way that Gibraltar could be considered as part of the new approach of the Spanish Government towards devolved government in Spain, which is in line with their Socialist policies?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I repeat my tribute to the way in which the Spanish Government, democratically elected as they are, have approached this matter. The fact that the border is now open, and that there is an atmosphere in which good contacts and personal and social relationships are likely to be established, may lead to all sorts of changes of mind on both sides of the border. I cannot predict what course those will take, save to reaffirm our commitment to the wishes of the Gibraltar people as set out in the 1969 constitution.

Mr. John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): My right hon. and learned Friend will know how much I admire his efforts as Foreign Secretary, and how much I oppose the ignorant attacks on the Foreign Office. But ordinary people are puzzled by the talks with Spain about Gibraltar. They say, "If we have no intention of surrendering the sovereignty of Gibraltar to Spain, why have the talks at all?"

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. The answer to his question is that the sovereignty of Gibraltar has been at issue between the Spanish and British Governments for many years. It has overshadowed and made much more difficult the conduct of relations between those Governments. It has created conditions that have made the prospect of social and economic prosperity for Gibraltar much more difficult. The agreement that we have reached is that the topic can be discussed by the two Governments on the firm basis that I have outlined of our continued commitment to respect the wishes of the Gibraltar people. From that can flow nothing but advantage. As I said in my opening statement, it is a good agreement for Britain, for Spain and for the people of Gibraltar.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): With regard to the Foreign Secretary's reply to my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) on the historical differences between Gibraltar and the Falklands, does the Foreign Secretary accept that he is making a serious criticism of his hon. Friends and mine on the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs, who expressed the gravest doubts about the legal and historical background? Does he dismiss the Select Committee? What is his attitude to Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman will have many opportunities to discuss the Falkland Islands, but that subject does not arise from this statement. It would be wrong for me to swap views with the hon. Gentleman now. I raised the subject in answer to a question from the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey). I answered his question by saying that the two matters are completely different.

Mr. Andrew MacKay (Berkshire, East): Does my right hon. and learned Friend realise that his statement today, together with his efforts and those of Sr Moran and Sir Joshua Hassan, will be broadly supported by the great majority of hon. Members? Will he confirm that top of the agenda for the talks will be allowing more flights into Gibraltar as soon as possible.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's opening remarks. As I said in my statement, and as was set out in the Brussels agreement, the Spanish Government reaffirm their commitment to take the early action necessary to ensure the safe and effective use of airspace in the region.

Mr. David Young (Bolton, South-East): Honourable Members on both sides of the House will be grateful if we can reconcile the three conflicting points of view. Before we sink into a swamp of self-congratulation, may I point out that many Gibraltarians believe that they are being sold out the back door economically, if not politically? What will the Foreign Secretary do to consult the official Opposition on this matter? Does he recognise that Spain is again playing on the fact that Gibraltar is still a colony? Would not one of the options be to offer self-government if the aspirations of the Gibraltar people were not satisfied?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: As to consultation with the Opposition, the hon. Gentleman will have noticed that these matters have been the subject of frequent debate in the Gibraltar Legislative Assembly, and that has been the background against which the Chief Minister of Gibraltar has been playing his part in these negotiations.

As to self-government, the treaty of Utrecht, on which our sovereignty is founded, contains in it a provision to the effect that, in the event of the United Kingdom wishing to give up sovereignty, Spain should have first refusal. It has been clear, and was emphasised, for example, by Sir Joshua Hassan in London last Wednesday that the choice for the people of Gibraltar is either to remain under British sovereignty or to move under Spanish sovereignty. There is no third option under the provisions of the treaty. In that context, we emphasise the importance that we attach to the pledge to respect the wishes of the Gibraltar people.

As to the hon. Gentleman's accusation of a sell-out, economically if not politically, the state of affairs in Gibraltar up to now has been nothing but bad for the Gibraltar economy. It has involved an outflow of money across the border of about £150,000 a week, about £16 million in the past two years. As a result of the changes that came into force yesterday, the prospects for economic prosperity for the people of Gibraltar and the region have been substantially improved.

Mr. Mark Wolfson (Sevenoaks): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the future of the Gibraltar economy will increasingly depend on the ability of the Gibraltarians to develop it? To this end, will he give what support he can to the establishment and development of some basic further education in Gibraltar? At this stage, this is very limited, which means that the necessary skills for the future are not being developed?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I take note of that specific point without making any comment about it. My hon. Friend is right in the premise of his question, that the prosperity of Gibraltar will depend on the enterprise of the people of Gibraltar, matched with the courage that they have always shown during the difficult years through which they have just passed.

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): Does Sr. Moran now fully appreciate that the only way for Spain to regain sovereignty over Gibraltar is for her to set out to win the hearts and minds of the people of that colony?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: That has been clearly stressed in the remarks that I quoted about the need for any negotiating process to have respect for the wishes of the people of Gibraltar. I underline that point.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): I would not wish to be unhelpful in the face of considerable diplomatic triumphs, but, like many other hon. Members, I am concerned to establish that the opening of the gate has merely returned the situation to that which pertained for many years, and that it does not represent a step towards ceding Gibraltar to the Spanish. Therefore, will my right hon. and learned Friend remember that many Gibraltarians are able to trace their ancestry back to this country for many generations?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I assure my hon. Friend that I have been mindful throughout of the factors to which he has drawn attention, and that in all these matters we have been concerned not just with finding a conclusion that will promote good relations between Spain and Britain but in paying attention to the interests of the people of Gibraltar. I have no doubt that this agreement is in their interests, and it is underpinned by my repeated emphasis on the continued validity of the preamble to the 1969 constitution.

Mr. Jim Craigen (Glasgow, Maryhill): Having arrived in Gibraltar with a parliamentary delegation on the day that the Brussels communiqué was announced, may I ask the Foreign Secretary whether he will take it from me that there is considerable mistrust of Spanish officialdom in Gibraltar? Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give an assurance that he will do more to reassure the official socialist opposition and the official democratic opposition in Gibraltar that they need not be equally distrustful of the intentions of the Foreign Office?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I take this opportunity to tell the House that there is no question of the Foreign Office adopting a separate position or policy over this matter. The decisions taken by the Foreign Secretary on behalf of Her Majesty's Government are taken not out of any consideration for Foreign Office interests but because we judge them to be in the best interests of Spain and Britain and of the people of Gibraltar. I well understand that, in the light of the experience of the last 15 years, there is bound to be some mistrust of officialdom of the kind that the hon. Member described on the Spanish side of the border. There is mistrust not just of officialdom but elsewhere. One of the benefits of opening the border will be the gradual dissolution of that mistrust and the improvement of the economic prospects of the people of Gibraltar.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): Is it not clear that this is a splendid agreement, because one can now buy whisky in Gibraltar at £3.50 a bottle? Will my right hon. and learned Friend have a word with the Chancellor of the Exchequer in order to find out whether that price can be emulated here?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I hesitate to respond favourably to my hon. Friend's invitation to job back in my previous existence in this House.

Mr. Healey: If the Foreign Secretary rejects the Falklands as a precedent for Gibraltar, does he accept the view of King Juan Carlos of Spain and of his colleague the Spanish Foreign Minister that Hong Kong may provide a useful precedent?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I would counsel the right hon. Gentleman against following that course. He must remember very clearly that British sovereignty over Gibraltar is plainly founded upon the treaty of Utrecht without any limit to its term. That is in total contrast to Hong Kong where 92 per cent. is held on a lease that is due to expire in 1997. I would not encourage the right hon. Gentleman to go down that road.

RAF Molesworth

4.3 pm

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Michael Heseltine): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement about the operation conducted last night at RAF Molesworth to clear the site of trespassers and to fence it.

The then Secretary of State for Defence announced on 17 June 1980 the Government's decision that Molesworth, a disused airfield in Cambridgeshire, had been selected as the second United Kingdom cruise missile base. The normal process of planning consultation was set in hand towards the end of last year against the requirement to begin major construction on the site this autumn if deployment by 1988 is to be achieved.

As the House will be aware, RAF Molesworth, as an unfenced and open site, has been the scene of continued trespass by individuals and groups opposed to its use as a cruise missile base. Their activities have given rise to much local anxiety. The anti-nuclear protest groups have made clear their intention to engage in a systematic programme of deliberate delay and disruption, not excluding unlawful means, in order to prevent its development. It would have been quite wrong to allow such a protest to build up on Ministry of Defence land and to accept that the serious inconvenience to local people would continue.

I therefore directed that the necessary steps should be taken to end this as quickly as possible and with the least likelihood of danger to all concerned. To do so, it was necessary to act in secrecy and with speed in order to prevent the very serious problems which would have arisen from the reinforcement of the protesters that had been threatened. This could have led to a major confrontation with all the risks which that involved to both demonstrators and those responsible for the maintenance of law and order.

The operation began shortly before midnight last night with the arrival of Ministry of Defence police to clear the site of trespassers and to take control of it. The civil police were responsible for policing outside the site itself. At the same time, 1500 Royal Engineers began to fence off the whole site with dannert-type fencing. They are also providing observation platforms and perimeter lighting which will assist the Ministry of Defence police in their continuing task of guarding the site. In addition, members of the Property Services Agency and civil contractors moved heavy equipment on to the site to begin the construction of a permanent weldmesh fence for which planning agreement has already been given.

This House reaffirmed in October 1983 its support for the NATO twin-track decision on intermediate range nuclear forces. The Government very much hope that, now that the Soviet Union has returned to the negotiating table, it will be possible to make progress on the arms control element of that decision. But until progress has been achieved which makes this unnecessary, we shall continue with preparations for the deployment of cruise missiles. That is a decision approved by Parliament. No responsible Secretary of State for Defence, or Government, could countenance such preparations being frustrated by a small, unrepresentative minority within our society.

That is why the action that I have described has been undertaken today. I have myself visited Molesworth this morning in order to pass on the Government's thanks to those concerned. The House will, I know, wish to join me in paying tribute to all those involved in ensuring that this major operation has proceeded so successfully.

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli): The operations about which the statement is made demonstrate again how heavy-handed, how insecure and how insensitive the right hon. Gentleman is when trying to deal with those whose only offence is their wish to protest peacefully against nuclear weapons. We remember the right hon. Gentleman threatening from the Dispatch Box that he would authorise the shooting of unarmed demonstrators. We remember how relentlessly he pursued the prosecution of the hapless Sarah Tisdall. We have read this week, in matters that are sub judice, how he exaggerated the problems of the Ministry of Defence on that occasion. Now we see the right hon. Gentleman doing exactly the same thing again. Clearly he has no understanding of what some of us thought was a civilised and humane way of trying to deal with these problems in Britain.

When the right hon. Gentleman strutted around Molesworth this morning in his flak jacket, did he not realise that he was not evicting some wild, Baader-Meinhof terrorist gang, but that he was evicting 100 British citizens, most of whom are Quakers with a long religious tradition of honourable protest against the weapons of war?

Will the right hon. Gentleman answer three questions? First, how many troops were involved and what regiments did they represent, how many military police were involved and how many civilian police were involved? Secondly, did he personally authorise this ridiculous operation? Thirdly, is he aware that all that he has done has been to sow 100 dragons' teeth? The protest not only will go on but will intensify because of what the right hon. Gentleman did this morning.

Mr. Heseltine: The whole House will have noticed that when what I have done has been to secure the maintenance of law and order and the legitimate rights of my Department to use its own land for its own purposes, the determination that we in this country share to live within the law is wholly repugnant to the Opposition.

If the right hon. Gentleman had taken the least trouble to read the statements of many members of the peace protest groups about the plans they had in mind deliberately to frustrate the Government's intention to develop that base—their widely publicised plans to lie in the path of necessary equipment, to frustrate the contractors, to stop us brick by brick—he would have realised that if I had acted with less dispatch they would have begun to implement those plans and to call up additional resources from all over the country. We could have faced civil disobedience on that site not just for days or weeks but for months.

If the right hon. Gentleman reads what has been clearly stated he will understand that about 1,500 Royal Engineers were used to build a fence. The people who maintained law and order were the Ministry of Defence police and the civil police. However, it would not be appropriate for me to give details of the numbers of policemen involved. If I did that, the only gain would be that it would enable the right hon. Gentleman and his friends to calculate how many more demonstrators they need in order to — [Interruption.] Today we have heard the petty response of a party whose only real cause of complaint is that it has been deprived of one more opportunity to support lawlessness.

Dr. Brian Mawhinney (Peterborough): Does my right hon. Friend realise that his decision has the full support of my constituents in the nearest city to Molesworth and that it has, in particular, the support of the constituents of my next-door neighbour, my hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major), who is today in his customary place on the Treasury Bench? He has vigorously defended his constituents' interests for many months. Does my right hon. Friend accept that his decision, coupled with that of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary to meet extra police costs arising out of demonstrations at Molesworth, has reconfirmed the belief of the people of Cambridgeshire that this Government will provide the necessary national defence, but not at the expense of their local legitimate interests?

Mr. Heseltine: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for both of his questions. Of course I completely support what he has said about the decisions of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary. I am also grateful to my hon. Friend for his words on behalf of his constituents, which I very much appreciate. I am particularly grateful to him—and he will understand if I make the distinction —for what he said on behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major). Throughout the long occupation of parts of the Molesworth site my hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon has been in the most invidious position as a member of the Government. He has continually made representations to me. I have tried to keep him as fully informed as possible, and I am glad that only about six hours after he was involved in the presentation of a petition on behalf of a very large number of his constituents, we were able—I am sorry about the short delay—to act.

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): Does the Secretary of State agree that we should get last night's events into proportion? Does he accept that within a democracy protesters have a perfect right to demonstrate against aspects of Government policy with which they disagree, but that the authorities are equally entitled to outwit them? That is just what happened last night at Molesworth.

Mr. Heseltine: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, as he has made two important points. Every hon. Member recognises that there is a legitimate opportunity for peaceful protest within certain understandable conventions. Indeed, this House is about peaceful protest, and that is one of the great traditions of our democracy. But if a Secretary of State charged with responsibility for maintaining the law in these matters, reads that unless he is careful and gets his plans right he may endanger the very lives not only of male protesters but of women and children, he has a positive duty to take all reasonable steps possible to minimise the force necessary to secure the Government's proper objectives.

Sir Antony Buck (Colchester, North): Is my right hon. Friend aware that Conservative Members very much welcome his statement because of the relief that it will give to law-abiding constituents of my hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major), who is a Whip, and to the constituents of other hon. Members? Does my right hon. Friend agree that we have shown our determination to retain and maintain the credibility of our deterrent posture?

Mr. Heseltine: I am most grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for that point. Now that the arms negotiations are under way, nothing is more evident than that our policy of deterrence has paid off. Those who are concerned with the deployment of cruise missiles should remember that one of their principal arguments against the missiles was that if we went ahead, the Russians would not talk to us and would move out of the negotiating conferences. However, they have actually moved back. Since we took a decision to deploy cruise missiles in this country in 1979, the Soviet Union has increased its deployment of SS20s by more than 250.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): Is the Secretary of State aware that the peace camps in Britain, founded on the Gandhi principles of non-violence, are very highly respected all over the world, that the transfer of British territory to an American President so that he can make war from that base without the consent of the Secretary of State, the Prime Minister or the House of Commons is unacceptable, and that the decision to build a Berlin wall around the camp, together with the right hon. Gentleman's readiness to shoot those who might try to get into the camp, shows that the Government are prepared to use the full apparatus of the state to obliterate opposition to their policies?

Mr. Heseltine: I heard what the right hon. Gentleman said about American bases in this country. If I had an apology to make to the House, it would be that I have so slavishly followed the conventions that he so honourably defended when he was a member of the previous Labour Government. However, I do not feel it necessary to make that apology, because I took the view that the right hon. Gentleman's defence policies were broadly right. I do not understand why, in opposition, he has so extraordinarily abandoned them. Perhaps I can take issue with the right hon. Gentleman on this, as on so many other things. He says that the peace groups are respected throughout the world. That is a matter of judgment. But what is respected about this country throughout the world is our love of law and order and our respect for parliamentary democracy.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): Is my right hon. Friend aware that these pests who have made the lives of the citizens of Huntingdon a misery are certainly not respected by the people of Cambridgeshire or Huntingdon? Is he further aware that our constituents very much welcome the firm and efficient way in which he has carried out this operation? Does my right hon. Friend realise that they greatly admire the dedicated way in which my hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) has fought on their behalf for several months? Finally, is my right hon. Friend aware that he is to be congratulated because the operation was undertaken, remarkably, without any leak from his Department?

Mr. Heseltine: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend, and I agree with everything that he said. However, I have unselfishly to admit that the credit for there being no leak must be extended much more widely than just my Department.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): How much did last night's exercise cost? Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that that exercise was more consistent with a police state than with a democracy in the way in which it was carried out in such secrecy? The right hon. Gentleman said that the protesters at Molesworth represented a minority opinion, but does he not realise that opinion polls have consistently shown that the majority of people are opposed to cruise? The Government were elected by fewer than 50 per cent. of the voters and it is they who are in the minority on this occasion.

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman will realise that the Government have one of the largest parliamentary majorities since the war. The Conservative party made it quite clear that if it was elected to office it would proceed with the deployment of cruise missiles. We very much believe that the Labour party was quite right in 1979 when it took the decision that led to their deployment in this country.

The cost of the exercise last night was probably relatively small because of the large number of service men involved. It was probably the cheapest way of proceeding, because if we had not carried out that operation we might have suffered substantial delays in the construction programme, which would have imposed a larger cost on the Ministry. The hon. Gentleman asked whether our action was not representative of that of police states. I do not know how one can maintain law and order in a parliamentary democracy without asking the police to ensure that it is maintained.

Mr. George Walden (Buckingham): Is my right hon. Friend aware that most, probably all, Conservative Members believe that the protection of defence establishments is an integral part of our defence policy? Will he continue to take whatever action is necessary within our democratic traditions to avoid a repetition of the shambles at Greenham common?

Mr. Heseltine: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for asking those questions and I sympathise with the approach that he adopts in asking them. The shambles imposed on our society is organised by those indulging in the protest movement. Precisely because we live in a parliamentary democracy and follow the proper traditions of that democracy, there is a limit to the scale on which the police can prevent people from indulging in demonstrations of the sort that we have seen. That imposes a terrifying cost, not just financial but social, on large numbers of citizens who profoundly disapprove of what the protests are all about. A balance must be struck, and what guides my Department, as it did last night and on earlier occasions, is that we always try to use the minimum of force compatible with securing our objectives.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Is the Secretary of State aware that what took place was an eastern European type of operation—which illustrated only too well the continued erosion of civil liberties that has taken place under Conservative rule? [Interruption.] The shouts that are coming from Tory Members may be likened to the nods of approval that one would expect in eastern European states for action against protests. Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that, no matter what operation took place last night, the campaign against cruise missiles will continue because we live in a democracy and people who feel so strongly about such matters that they wish to demonstrate will not be stopped?

Mr. Heseltine: The House will think it extraordinary that the hon. Gentleman can be so selective. In talking about what happens as a challenge from the East he conveniently ignores the fact that the East began the deployment of the weapon systems that led to the protests at Molesworth and Greenham common in the first place. If he had a shred of objectivity, he would consider what might happen to people who tried to occupy bases in the Soviet Union in similar circumstances.

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): Will my right hon. Friend agree that CND consistently and deliberately misleads as to the amount of public support it enjoys in Britain? Does he agree that the true level of support was evidenced by a petition for the removal of the camp at Molesworth, which was signed by more than 90 per cent. of the local population within three days; by a poll at St. Ives which went against CND's protest appeal against cruise; and by a petition at Alconbury for the removal of a camp, which was signed by more than 90 per cent. of the local population in a short time? Will my right hon. Friend join in urging CND to cancel its pointless and disruptive Easter march?

Mr. Heseltine: I support my hon. Friend and admire the energy he puts into the articulation of the case. When public opinion is consulted on these matters, it finds the tactics of the protest groups wholly unacceptable. The problem in a democracy such as ours is that a burden is imposed by tiny minorities behaving in a way that is unacceptable to the vast majority of us. My hon. Friend asks whether I am aware that the views of these minorities are unrepresentative. Yes, I am aware of that, and in my constituency at the last election one such person stood against me. The House will be pleased to hear that I won.

Mr. D. E. Thomas (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): Will the Secretary of State accept that the tactics employed by the state are equally unacceptable in a parliamentary democracy? Does he understand that the use of massive force in a paramilitary operation by the Ministry of Defence, using troops against civilian peace protesters, undermines the very quality of democracy that he pretends to support?

Mr. Heseltine: It was an interesting choice that someone with my responsibilities had to face. Had I pursued the logic of that question, I would have given notice and presumably deployed what I would have believed to be an inadequate force, and then we could have had thousands, perhaps tens of thousands, of men, women and children with whom to cope. Presumably at that point the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends would have told me that I should abandon the Government's policies because an even larger and less representative minority was challenging us.

Mr. William Powell (Corby): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the western boundary fence of Molesworth is also the county boundary between Northamptonshire and Cambridgeshire? Will he accept from me the welcome that my constituents in Northamptonshire will give to the action taken by his Department and the civil police during the evening? Is he further aware that my hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) and I have, during the last weeks and months, received a growing volume of protests from our constituents in Northamptonshire and Cambridgeshire about the growth of criminal and antisocial behaviour by the campers at the Molesworth air base? Will my right hon. Friend accept that our constituents will fail to recognise the description of those people, who have now been removed, as Gandhian in their behaviour, as has been claimed for them? Will my right hon. Friend accept that my constituents will welcome his statement that the preparations for Molesworth will continue, because they know that the surest way in which it will be unnecessary to deploy at Molesworth is if we continue with our efforts until such time as agreement is reached at Geneva?

Mr. Heseltine: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for those remarks. I agree wholly with his last point, and I assure him that the interests of the citizens of Northamptonshire were as much in my mind as the interests of the citizens of Cambridgeshire.

Mr. Bob Clay (Sunderland, North): Will the Secretary of State admit that this has been another example of the right hon. Gentleman informing the House that he has carried out his orders from General Bernard Rogers in the Pentagon? Did not last night illustrate again the Government's increasing determination to carry out by force what they cannot do by persuasion? It is clear that the majority of people in Britain are opposed to cruise missiles. Given all the heart-rending stories about the dilemmas and so on that the right hon. Gentleman faced, will he now say whether any warning was given to the men, women and children that they would be moved? [Interruption.] Did they receive eviction notices? If it was not appropriate to issue such notices, why have eviction notices been issued at Greenham common since the peace campers first went there? Is it not a fact that because of the tremendous resistance of the women at Greenham, he is now using the iron fist at Molesworth? The logic of the right hon. Gentleman's argument that he is saving money —[HON. MEMBERS: "Too long."] I am taking no longer than did the hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Powell). If the right hon. Gentleman is arguing that his action will save money in the long term—by nipping the protest in the bud now—the logic of that is that he might as well get the troops out now and round up the lot of us—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]—and achieve what he wants in one go.

Mr. Heseltine: It may come as a severe disappointment to the hon. Gentleman to learn that we went to a great deal of trouble to give proper warning to those involved at the peace camp. The chief constable involved, using words which were designed to ensure that the campers were given the chance to go of their own free will, made it clear that coaches were available to take women and children, that welfare services would be available, in conjunction with the Cambridgeshire county council, and that no pressure to move would be put on until the morning. I believe that he went as far as could seriously have been expected in all the circumstances. Great attention was paid to ensure that that message was delivered to the people occupying the land.

The hon. Gentleman repeats parrot cries about the Pentagon which suit the convenience of his prejudices. It will come as a disappointment to him to hear that I did not discuss the plans of last night either with the Pentagon or with General Rogers, and I have no reason to suppose that they were aware of them in time for them to make any impact whatever on them. The hon. Gentleman talks about persuasion, presumably thinking that we should try to persuade tiny and and unrepresentative groups. We believe that the real challenge of persuasion is to persuade the British electorate to give us a mandate to carry through certain policies.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I draw the attention of the House to the fact that a further statement follows this debate before quite a heavy day. I ask for shorter supplementary questions, which will lead to shorter answers.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): Is my right hon. Friend aware that in the vicinity of the great air bases in my constituency, where by far the largest number of American aircraft and personnel are located, the most popular sign in the windows of the houses of the ordinary people who live nearby is not "Yanks go home" but "No peace camps here"? My right hon. Friend's action has been a clear response to the wishes of the vast majority of ordinary people who have the experience of living alongside the American camps and the peace camps and who have no doubt that they prefer the Americans.

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend puts more eloquently than I can the deep conviction that exists on this matter. Any Government since the war could have asked the Americans to go. They did not, because they knew that we gained immeasurably from the American presence.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that what happened at Molesworth last night will be seen by people as nothing more than an irrational operation that is part of an irrational policy of having first strike nuclear weapons on this soil? Is the right hon. Gentleman telling the House that the question of law and order is for the Minister of Defence and not for the law courts?

Mr. Heseltine: The answer to the first question is no. The answer to the second question is also no.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): In the interests of lowering the risks of confrontation between the demonstrators and the military, will my right hon. Friend urge my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary to bring forward at the earliest possible opportunity the implementation of section 25 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984? I believe that this measure would be widely welcomed by the local constabularies involved.

Mr. Heseltine: I am sure that my hon. Friend will understand if I say that I shall ensure that his views are drawn to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): The Secretary of State has clearly failed to note that the majority of people have, in opinion poll after opinion poll, spoken against cruise missiles. Has the right hon. Gentleman recognised that point? Will he recognise that the majority of thinking people will see the action last night as crass insensitivity at a time when the Geneva talks are continuing? Will the right hon. Gentleman recognise that the majority of people who have protested peacefully and non-violently at Greenham common and elsewhere are doing the only thing they can to show the Government that they wholly oppose the deployment of nuclear weapons?

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Lady is completely wrong. Those people could have stood for election in the constituencies, where the people express a proper democratic view. Many of them stood for election and failed. A large number of them sit on the Opposition Benches, and that is why they were humiliated in the last election.

Mr. Michael Mates (Hampshire, East): Amid all this mock furore from the loony Left, will my right hon. Friend take this opportunity to remind the House of the real success of last night's operation? The real success is the fact that we have revealed again the determination which NATO, with Britain leading, has shown in bringing the Russians to the conference table to discuss disarmament. That is the real success of last night.

Mrs. Clwyd: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall take the point of order after the Minister's answer.

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend the Member for Hampshire, East (Mr. Mates) strikes at the core of the matter. Those who were against the deployment of cruise missiles told us that, if we proceeded, the Russians would not negotiate about arms control. Now that the Russians have come back to negotiate about arms control, those people tell us that, if we continue, the Russians will not negotiate about arms control. Our view is diametrically the opposite—the firmer our deterrent, the more likely it is that the talks will be successful.

Mr. Speaker: What is the point of order?

Mr. Rogers: Am I allowed to state my point of order, or am I being challenged, Mr. Speaker? —[Interruption.] I know that Conservative Members do not have any belief in democracy, so I shall forget all about them. My point of order is——

Mrs. Clwyd: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Rogers: My point of order is—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am trying to help the hon. Member. It might be best if I took the point of order later.

Mr. Rogers: I am trying to control my feelings, Mr. Speaker. I felt that, when I rose to make a legitimate point of order, you were challenging my right to make a point of order. I respect your independence. In that respect, I must admit that I was concerned about the way in which you asked me about the point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member should come to the point.

Mr. Rogers: I shall, Mr. Speaker. As previous Speakers have ruled that it would be wrong for Opposition Members to refer to Conservative Members—whether it is right or wrong—as Fascists or neo-Fascists, is it proper for an hon. Member to refer to other hon. Members who have spoken during this debate as the loony Left?

Mr. Speaker: It might be thought to be a term of endearment.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Does my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State accept that one of the most important outcomes of his action yesterday was the reinforcement of the right of the majority to be heard? Is it not time that the minorities were told—as my right hon. Friend has done on this occasion —that the majority's views must be understood and that their lives should not be continually allowed to be made a misery by these loony people who feel that they have a right to run into the ground the lives of everyone else?

Mr. Heseltine: I do not think that I should adopt the use of the word "loony" as its use appears to be rather sensitive in certain sections of the House. I believe that it is necessary for the parliamentary democratic process to be upheld. That is why we argue in elections, and when we win elections we carry through policies precisely as my hon. Friend suggests.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I say to the hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) that I was not seeking to get a cheap laugh at his expense. I believe that we should seek not to raise the temperature of hon. Members through anything we say in the Chamber. Although I do not think that "loony" is a very unparliamentary word, let us avoid its use this afternoon. Mr. Tam Dalyell. [Interruption.]

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): In view of the comment I heard made by a Conservative Member, I point out that I hope that matters of sub judice and privilege will be referred to in the proper way after a certain case is concluded. The remark was quite audible.

On what date was the Prime Minister consulted about this operation, or was it her idea?

Mr. Heseltine: I took the original decision in November. We began planning procedures within my Department. I informed my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister of my plans some considerable time after that, when I believed that the plans could be fully implemented.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the moves at Molesworth last night were moves not against peaceful demonstrators but against those people who, when they decide to demonstrate, reserve unto themselves the right to break the law, be it civil or criminal? Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is immensely sad to note that not one single voice will be raised this afternoon from within a party which still has some pretensions to office to praise the fact that the rule of law has been upheld?

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend has come to the centre of one of the most depressing features of this Opposition. There was a time when there was a consensus about the maintenance of law and order, but the Labour party seems to be incapable of ever standing up for the rights of the majority or, in fact, for the maintenance of law and order.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): Is the Secretary of State aware that the Opposition are for the defence of Britain and that they believe, along with the vast majority of people—as expressed through opinion polls—that the deployment of cruise missiles will make Britain a more dangerous place in which to live? Is the Secretary of State aware that the people of Britain will contrast very much the building by the Ministry of a 7½ mile long 7 ft high fence of barbed wire with the building by the peace people of a school and a church, which was dedicated by the Bishop of Huntingdon, and the sending to Ethiopia of 20 tonnes of wheat grown by them on that site?

Mr. Heseltine: The British people will understand that if we had not put a fence around that land, the Ministry of Defence land would have been occupied by increasingly large numbers of people determined to act illegally.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): Has my right hon. Friend thought about the strange anomaly of the enthusiasm of Opposition Members for opinion polls? May we expect an opinion poll on capital punishment to be as highly regarded by the Labour party? Following the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls), would it not be right and proper to recognise that the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright), who speaks for the Social Democratic party and presumably for his Liberal allies, did not share the ridiculous view held by Her Majesty's loyal Opposition towards the maintenance of law and order? May I ask that the word loyal be put in inverted commas in Hansard?

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend makes a critical point. If the Labour party had its policies tested by opinion poll, it would virtually never secure a majority on any one of them. It cannot secure a majority in any circumstances.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Does the Secretary of State accept that last night's jackboot-method attack on the peace camp at Molesworth is but another example of the paranoia and increasing brutality of the Government's policy of foisting nuclear weapons on an unwilling population? What steps is he taking to inform the people of Cambridgeshire, Huntingdonshire and the surrounding districts of the increased danger to their livelihoods of a nuclear explosion because of the presence of nuclear weapons on that site? How many of the people living near to the camp could expect to survive a nuclear attack or the explosion of a cruise missile?

Mr. Heseltine: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I would rather tell the truth. That will perhaps be rather more attractive to the citizens of Huntingdonshire who, I think, know as well as I do that the decision to modernise NATO intermediate nuclear weapons was taken in April 1979 by the Labour party then in government.

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): Does not last night's massive use of force demonstrate that the Government are hellbent on the further deployment of cruise missiles, which will be American-owned, controlled and operated? Surely he recognises that further deployment in Europe must damage prospects of progress in the forthcoming United States-Soviet talks on nuclear disarmament?

Mr. Heseltine: I have answered that question. There is no truth in it, and that is why the Soviet Union is back at the negotiating table. This Government are broadly pursuing policies pursued by every Labour Government since the war.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): We have had some splendid revelations today. It took a three-month planning exercise for the Secretary of State to go down in history as the victor of Molesworth common. More British troops were used against 100 British peace campaigners and Quakers at Molesworth common than were used against the Argentines at Goose green. That is the extent of Secretary of State's victory today. If ever a nut used a sledge hammer, it was the Secretary of State on this occasion. Is the Secretary of State aware that with the Geneva talks about to take place, many people throughout the world and in this country believe that we should not be going ahead with any preparations for further deployment of cruise, but that there should be a complete freeze on any deployment until we know the outcome of those talks? When the Labour party is on the Government Benches—[Interruption.]—it will not be long—it will be our policy to rid these islands of cruise, other nuclear weapons and nuclear bases.

Mr. Heseltine: I suppose that it is too much to expect the hon. Gentleman to report accurately what the House has been told. The only people who had contact with the demonstrators were members of the civil or Ministry of Defence police. The Royal Engineers were used to build the fence. To the best of my knowledge—I shall correct this if it is wrong—when I was on the site at about 11 o'clock, no force had been used in connection with moving any demonstrators because they had gone peacefully. One of the reasons why they had gone peacefully was that it was apparent that there was no purpose in them doing anything other than that. If there had been an inadequate presence on that site, they would then have been tempted to resort to the tactics that they had told us they would use — to call up more demonstrators from all over the country. The hon. Gentleman tells us that when the Labour party is in power it will pursue a whole range of non-nuclear policies. He fails to understand that it is because of that threat that it is not in power.

Local Government (Practices and Procedures)

4.45 pm

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Patrick Jenkin): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall make a statement.

In the debate on the Address on 7 November I said that I intended to set up an inquiry into various practices and procedures in local government. Following discussions with the Opposition parties and the local authority associations, I am now in a position to give further information to the House.

The terms of reference for the inquiry will be as follows:

To inquire into practices and procedures governing the conduct of local authority business in Great Britain, with particular reference to:

a. the rights and responsibilities of elected members;

b. the respective roles of elected members and officers; and

c. the need to clarify the limits and conditions governing discretionary spending by local authorities and to make any necessary recommendations for strengthening the democratic process.

Within those terms of reference I am inviting the committee to pay particular attention to the following issues:

ensuring proper accountability for decision-taking to elected members and to the electorate generally; and examining possible ways of strengthening local democracy within the existing structure of local government;

clarifying the status and role of party groups in decision-taking;

ensuring the proper participation and accountability of individual elected members in the decision-taking process;

examining any problems of propriety which may arise from members' conflicts of interest, particularly where officers of one council serve as councillors of another;

considering the merits of the development of full-time councillors; and the related issues of the use of members' allowances and the remuneration of councillors generally; reviewing the system of co-option of non-elected members; studying officers' relationships, particularly in view of their legal and professional obligations, with elected members and political groups;

clarifying the limits and conditions governing discretionary spending, including the use of sections 137 and 142 of the Local Government Act 1972, and sections 83 and 88 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973, for political purposes in local government, or in relation to bodies set up, and largely financed, by local authorities.

Local government franchise, finance and structure will be outside the terms of reference.

In view of the growing public concern about the use made by some local authorities of their discretionary powers to engage in overt political campaigning at public expense, I am asking the committee to submit an early interim report on this question. As far as the report as a whole is concerned, I am asking the committee to aim to report within a year.

It is essential that the inquiry should be both impartial and effective in dealing with these difficult issues. The best way to achieve this is to establish a small committee of people of judgment and ability, headed by a chairman of known integrity. My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and Wales and I therefore propse to appoint a committee of four or five members chosen for the personal contribution which each can make to the wide-ranging subject matter of the inquiry.

I am glad to inform the House that Mr. David Widdicombe, QC, has indicated to me that he would be prepared to accept appointment as chairman of the committee of inquiry. Further appointments to the committee, of which I shall advise the House, will be made shortly.

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): The Secretary of State has just made a very important statement about local government, which plays a crucial role in our plural democratic society. It is important that the matters that he intends to have examined are examined as objectively and impartially as possible. I welcome the fact not only that the right hon. Gentleman consulted Opposition parties, but that he has placed particular emphasis on the need for impartial approaches on these very sensitive matters.

I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman several questions, arising not so much from the terms of reference, which my hon. Friends and I believe to be broadly satisfactory—I understand that that is the view of the local authority associations, too—but from some of the points of detail that he spelt out in the statement. Why did he refer only to conflicts of interest in respect of officers who seek to be elected to councils? There are other conflicts of interest in local government at present and they, too, must be examined, particularly when they involve business and commercial interests.

I hope that in taking account of those matters and appointing members to the inquiry the right hon. Gentleman will ensure that the interests of women in local government are represented on the committee of inquiry——

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Why?

Dr. Cunningham: If the stupid exclamation by the hon. Gentleman is anything to go by, I had better spell out what I think. We very much hope that one of the members of the committee of inquiry will be a woman.

Why does the Secretary of State feel it necessary to have the interim report, especially in view of the time scale? I ask him to assure the House that, if he feels that he must proceed with that—we would prefer him not to — the many more fundamentally important issues involved in his statement will not suffer as a result, and the role and functions of councillors, for example, the legal rights and obligations of officers and the work of local authorities, will not be squeezed out by over-emphasis on the voluntary expenditure of local authorities, the discretionary use of sections 137 and 142. I remind the Secretary of State and the House that when those matters have been tested in the courts, the councils have always been exonerated in their use of such money, perhaps with one exception, which is still sub judice and on which I shall not comment.

I believe that many people involved in local authorities of all political persuasions, whether councillors or officials, will welcome the right hon. Gentleman's assurance that those matters are to be examined, as he described, in an impartial way. If that particularly important aspect of his statement is not adhered to, it is unlikely that there will be a successful outcome.

Mr. Jenkin: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's ready welcome for the inquiry. He said in his speech on the Loyal Address that that was the line he would be likely to take if he were satisfied about impartiality. I think that he has shown that he is.

I shall take the hon. Gentleman's final point first. I was gratefully reassured by my consultations with all the local authority associations. They welcome the inquiry and are fully prepared to co-operate with it. That is a very important matter. The hon. Gentleman also asked some detailed questions, one of which was about the conflicts of business interests. They were examined by the Redcliffe-Maud report, but they are comprehended within the phrase that I used about the individual accountability of councillors. I take note of what the hon. Gentleman said about the desirability of having a woman on the committee. I hope that the decision will be made shortly, but I ask the hon. Gentleman to wait until then.

With regard to the interim report, the hon. Gentleman must recognise that there is and has been rapidly mounting public concern over the misuse by some local authorities of their discretionary spending powers at the same time as——

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Secretary of State is speaking about an impartial inquiry, yet referred to the misuse of public funds. That must prejudice the impartiality of any inquiry.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Secretary of State must take responsibility for what he says, but he was asked a long question and he is now having to answer it.

Mr. Jenkin: Many people regard it as a misuse of public funds. I am prepared to accept that. It is because there are complex legal and political issues that I thought it right to refer the matter to the impartial inquiry. Legal cases demonstrate the complexity of the issues. That is why it is right to ask for an urgent interim report. However, I give the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) the assurance that that will in no way detract from the work of the committee, and I hope that it will report within a year.

The hon. Gentleman is not right to say that none of those matters has yet been resolved. The case of City of Westminster against the Inner London education authority was decided in the High Court. I understand that ILEA has now dropped the idea of appeal, so that judgment stands. However, the Greater London council case is being appealed. I hope very much that all those concerned with the wellbeing of local government will think it right to respond in due course if the committee decides to call for evidence that would be helpful to its members in reaching their conclusion.

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement, which some of us feel has long been due. Will the inquiry examine the problem whereby a local authority can give itself planning permission, thus sitting as judge and jury in its own court? It is a long-term problem, sometimes discharged honourably and sometimes not, and it exercises many people.

Mr. Jenkin: I should like to look at what my hon. Friend said. I had not thought of that problem as being within the purview of the committee, except in so far as it might reflect upon the propriety of the decision and the manner in which it is reached. The question of the details of planning law should be examined in another context.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): On behalf of my party, I join in welcoming the inquiry, the chairman as named and the Secretary of State's courtesy in fulfilling his obligation to consult spokesmen in Opposition parties about the terms of reference and appointments. I endorse the view that for practical reasons a woman on the committee of inquiry would be a good idea. There are women serving in local government, and they have particular needs. They should be taken into account for all sorts of reasons.

This is an important point. I hope that the Secretary of State accepts that consideration on conflicts of interest should be as wide as possible. All sorts of interests should be considered. I have one substantial regret, that the question of the franchise has been excluded. The Secretary of State's former PPS, the hon. Member for Crosby (Mr. Thornton), shares the view of many hon. Members that proportional representation in local government is the best safeguard against abuse by tyrant majorities — not elected majorities, but majorities of councillors — who are tempted through the grey area into indiscretion and malpractice. My hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) and others in Liverpool and elsewhere know full well the implications of such views. Proportional representation in local government, as Bradford demonstrates, would be a much healthier form of local government.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. We have again just heard reference to something that has appeared in the newspapers — allegations made in relation to people in Liverpool which have not been substantiated. No charges or court cases are pending against anybody. Under the circumstances, is it right that hon. Members should raise such matters in that way when we are discussing setting up an inquiry commission into local government?

Mr. Speaker: I must say again that I cannot be responsible for what hon. Members say in this place. If the hon. Gentleman seeks to put a question about his constituency I shall do my best to accommodate him.

Mr. Jenkin: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his welcome for the committee and for the advice that he gave when I consulted him. It would be inappropriate for the question of the franchise to be referred to such a committee. I understand his views but that matter must be for another occasion.

Mr. Michael Forsyth (Stirling): I welcome my right hon. Friend's announcement of an inquiry, but will he act now and act quickly against those authorities, whose actions are nothing less than corrupt, which are allowing extremists in their midst to soak the ratepayers to fund miners, women's committees and every other trendy cause? To give one example, Fife region has spent more than £1 million on funding striking miners. Will my right hon. Friend accept that we welcome a detailed look but we want action against political contributions?

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. We cannot have questions following statements peppered with points of order. I shall call the hon. Gentleman to put his question and perhaps he will include his point of order in it.

Mr. Ewing: I know that you are fed up, Mr. Speaker, but I have an important point of order. You have just given a ruling to my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) about what Members say in the House and their being responsible. Is it in order for hon. Members to use the privilege of the House to make statements about councillors being corrupt? The hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) is using the House to describe councillors as corrupt when he simply does not have the courage to go outside and make the same statement. He knows that those statements are simply untrue.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let us keep moderation in our language. It would be completely out of order to impugn the integrity of any hon. Member in the House and we should be extremely careful about what we say about those outside because they have no right of reply.

Mr. Jenkin: I am well aware of the strong feelings expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) and many people outside the House about some of the payments that have been made by local authorities. They raise complex questions of law and propriety. It would be wise for the House and the Government, before reaching a conclusion on this, to have the impartial advice of a group of men, and perhaps women, of integrity on those difficult matters.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): Will my right hon. Friend accept that my constituency and Teesside as a whole will welcome his announcement, particularly, I imagine, lifelong Labour councillors, who hope that the committee will look into some of the practices on selection and deselection which are taking place in that area at the moment? In particular, I hope that my right hon. Friend will include in the report the activities of Middlesbrough councillors who are able to claim attendance allowances for themselves for so-called surgeries held in their own front room any evening of the week while they are watching television.

Mr. Jenkin: Members' allowances are well within the terms of reference of the inquiry but I have to disappoint my hon. Friend because I doubt whether the activities of local Labour parties in choosing their candidates will be.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Will the Secretary of State give an assurance that he is not proceeding with this inquiry on the presumption that anyone who is mentioned by his hon. Friends is guilty of some sort of corruption? How will the committee go about taking evidence and who will be allowed to give it? As it is clear that some of the matters to be discussed are matters of opinion and judgment rather than simple legality, will the right hon. Gentleman give an assurance that all the evidence provided to the committee of inquiry will be published in full? As the inquiry has obviously been in the right hon. Gentleman's mind for some time, why has he given only the name of the chairman of the inquiry? How shall we be consulted, for example, about who will be the impartial member nominated to represent Scottish interests?

Mr. Jenkin: I have made no assumptions whatever about any activities that may have been referred to in the House during the course of the statement, or outside, where many hon. Members are aware that there has been growing disquiet about a number of activities that have become apparent in local government. That is why we are having the inquiry. It will be for the committee to decide whether and how to call for evidence but the committee is not empowered to compel witnesses to appear. It will be for the committee to decide whether any evidence given to it is published or given in confidence. The hon. Gentleman may make his own inquiries, but there may be a number of people, perhaps serving council officers, who would like to feel that any evidence or help that they may be able to give to the committee would be treated as confidential. But it will be for the committee to decide how to conduct its affairs.

Mr. Christopher Hawkins (High Peak): Is my right hon. Friend aware how welcome the inquiry will be in High Peak and in Derbyshire as a whole? Will he ensure that the inquiry investigates the decision of Derbyshire county council to force schools to overprint school stationery with anti-nuclear slogans?

Mr. Jenkin: That would be a perfectly good piece of evidence on which to seek to apply to the committee.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): The Minister is prejudging the matter.

Mr. Jenkin: I am not prejudging anything at all. I am merely saying that it is a matter on which it will be appropriate to give evidence to the committee.

Mr. Banks: Is the Minister aware that the reason local authorities and the GLC decided this morning to submit evidence to the inquiry is that local government has nothing whatever to hide, which is more than one can say for the Government. This will not be an impartial inquiry in that sense because the Government have already had their mind made up for them by their Back Benchers, as we have seen this afternoon. Will the terms of reference of the inquiry extend to the influence of freemasonry in local government, which we consider to be insidious and dangerous? Will the Secretary of State be accepting nominees for the membership of the committee of inquiry from the local authority associations?

Mr. Jenkin: The question of evidence of outside influences on members would, I should have thought, be germane to the question of the independence and accountability of members of local authorities. I have no doubt that, if there is an opportunity and the hon. Gentleman wishes to present evidence on freemasonry, the committee will welcome that. I consulted all the local authority associations, including the Association of London Authorities and the GLC, and I found unanimity for the view that it would be better not to have any serving councillor or serving officer of any existing local authority on the committee. In considering the membership I shall take close account of that advice. The hon. Gentleman must await the announcement of the further members.

Dr. Keith Hampson (Leeds, North-West): My right hon. Friend's statement is welcome, particularly for people in the metropolitan counties such as west Yorkshire and Leeds, where we are already well on the way to seeing £1 million spent in political propaganda. Will he reassure people in those areas that the interim report will be speedy and that it will be the prime and sole concern of the committee initially and not just part of its general examination of all the other issues as well? We do not want to feel that my right hon. Friend is fudging the issue or that the committee will simply identify abuses. Can he assure us that the committee will produce positive recommendations upon which he will act? People in Leeds and west Yorkshire know that there is abuse.

Mr. Jenkin: It is my intention to ask for an urgent interim report. I assume that the committee will do its very best to fall in with my request. No doubt the committee will receive much evidence on these matters and will wish to take account of it—including evidence of the strength of many people's feelings on the issue.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): To demand from the committee an interim report on one narrow party political point will not help it to stand a chance of being accepted as impartial. Would it not have been better to allow the members of the committee to decide which issues they wished to tackle in an interim report? Secondly, if there is to be an interim report, could it not consider the problems of those many councillors who, as a result of the economic policies of the Government, have been made redundant after giving long service to local government and now find it extremely difficult to receive sympathetic treatment in relation to social security and unemployment benefit because of their duties as councillors? Would not that be a better topic for the interim report than the narrow party political issue that the right hon. Gentleman has dragged in?

Mr. Jenkin: I hear what the hon. Gentleman says. There has been a general welcome both inside and outside the House for my intention to ask the committee to study a matter that is the cause of widespread public concern. No doubt the other matter could be tackled in connection with the question of the remuneration of councillors.

Mr. Barry Henderson (Fife, North-East): Contrary to what was alleged, my hon. Friend the Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) has already widely published a pamphlet listing in detail the abuses to which he has just referred in brief summary. Is my right hon. Friend also aware that the representatives of about 95 per cent. of my constituents will warmly welcome his announcement? Their only anxiety will be to know how long it will be before the abuses about which they are concerned are brought to light by the committee. Can anything be done in the worst cases? Well over £1 million has already been spent by Fife regional council in helping people with jobs to stay on strike, and many unemployed people and pensioners in my constituency feel bitterly that their rates are being abused without discussion or vote in the regional council.

Mr. Jenkin: Those problems fall squarely within the terms of reference of the committee. It would be right to leave them to the committee. I assure my hon. Friend that we shall ask for an urgent interim report.

Mr. Ewing: Can the right hon. Gentleman give us an assurance in relation to the spending referred to under section 88 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act? Can he assure us that the purpose of the inquiry is not to stop such spending altogether but to define the parameters within which it may take place? Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that there is an equal possibility that the inquiry might agree on wider rather than narrower parameters?

Mr. Jenkin: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that there is no intention to ask the committee to consider the abolition of that section. Whether it should be redrafted to resemble the corresponding English section is a matter on which we should await the committee's advice.

Sir John Osborne (Sheffield, Hallam): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the education committee chairman in Sheffield has written to school governors and chairmen of governors, and has embarked on a publicity campaign directed at parents, blaming the Secretary of State for Education for failures in the education system? Would that be a suitable subject for investigation by the Committee?

Mr. Jenkin: The gentleman would be perfectly entitled to express his view as a private citizen, but perhaps he would not be entitled to spend ratepayers' money on so doing. That is the issue that is causing concern and on which the committee will be asked to judge.

Mr. Terry Fields (Liverpool, Broadgreen): Surely the clue to the real purpose of the inquiry lies in the innuendos of the Secretary of State, Conservative Members and the whingeing Liberals? The inquiry is part and parcel of an attack on Labour-controlled authorities, prompted by the campaign that is to ensue in the coming months. Is not the Government's intention to mask the successes in Liverpool, where 200 jobs have been created and 2,268 council houses will have been built by May, while the Government and big business have done nothing? Should we not borrow a doctrine from the British Boxing Board of Control, which would diagnose the Secretary of State as being punch-drunk from last year's hiding and in no condition to take on Liverpool and other areas this year?

Mr. Jenkin: I am afraid that the affairs of the British Boxing Board of Control will not fall within the terms of the inquiry.

Mr. Derek Spencer (Leicester, South): Is my right hon. Friend aware that those of us who served in local government before we came to this place are reassured by the setting-up of the committee? One of the fears engendered by our experience was that there was plenty of evidence that public money was spent on a basis of political partiality. If local government has nothing to hide, it has nothing to fear, and one can expect widespread submissions to the committee from every quarter.

Mr. Jenkin: My hon. and learned Friend's proposition was also put very firmly by all the local authority associations. I found that most reassuring. These matters could very properly be subjects for the inquiry.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): We have witnessed the jackboot methods of the Ministry of Defence in the previous statement. If the Secretary of State for the Environment is to avoid the same charge, can he assure us that the composition of the committee will be truly impartial and generally acceptable to both sides of the House? Will the right hon. Gentleman take this opportunity to pay tribute to the thousands of councillors of both parties throughout the country who give sincere and loyal service well beyond any recompense in terms of expenses and allowances? If the Secretary of State is worried about democracy and about proper financial accounting, surely he should set up an inquiry into the workings of central rather than local government.

Mr. Jenkin: I am entirely at one with the hon. Gentleman in paying tribute to the many councillors who give loyal service far beyond the call of duty. It is a matter of public record that the proposed chairman of the inquiry, Mr. David Widdicombe, stood as a Labour candidate for the constituency of Totnes in his youth. He has authorised me to say that he is not now a member of any political party. I shall certainly keep the questions of impartiality and balance in mind when appointing the other members.

The hon. Gentleman's last question is not relevant except in so far as it bears upon the conduct of business by local authorities.

Mr. Piers Merchant (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his statement. Is he aware that it will be especially welcome to my constituents in Newcastle upon Tyne, who have laboured under the spending abuses of both Tyne and Wear county council and the Newcastle city council? Would it not be appropriate for the inquiry to take evidence connected with the donation of more than £300,000 by the county council in support of the miners' dispute and a similar donation by the Newcastle city council, the operation of the Newcastle city council priority area teams in spending large sums of money on political propaganda, and the noted increase in the past year in spending allowances for members of Tyne and Wear county council?

Mr. Jenkin: All those matters seem to be proper subjects for evidence to the committee. The interim report will be confined to the question of the use of local authority powers to spend ratepayers' money on political propaganda. Many of the other matters suggested by hon. Members on both sides of the House will fall entirely within the committee's terms of reference but would not be subjects for the interim report.

Mr. Hugh Brown (Glasgow, Provan): The Secretary of State has made a very important statement. I make no complaint about the fact that there was no similar statement from the Secretary of State for Scotland. I know that the right hon. Gentleman is here, and I accept the convention, but it is never satisfactory.

What consultations have there been with Scottish interests? The Secretary of State was asked whether the committee would have a Scottish member. Would it not have been better to set up a sub-committee or a separate committee if, in the opinion of the Secretary of State for Scotland, there is a need for such an inquiry?

Mr. Jenkin: I assure the hon. Gentleman that there was full consultation with COSLA by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland. I understand that COSLA is satisfied with the proposed terms of reference. It is within our contemplation that a distinguished Scot might be asked to serve as a member of the committee.

Mr. Robert B. Jones (Hertfordshire, West): Will the terms of reference permit the committee to consider the practice of local authorities that use pre-tender conditions and contract clauses to impose political views? I refer to councils that have barred from their tender lists contractors who have carried out operations at Greenham common and other military installations. Has my right hon. Friend had an opportunity to study Dr. Goodison-Wicke's book entitled "The New Corruption" which charts the enormous growth of such activities in local government? Will all of those issues be considered by the committee?

Mr. Jenkin: Contract conditions are specialised matters and hardly bear on the conduct of council business. I do not think that that would be within the terms of reference. However, it will always be open to anyone to make a suggestion as to how the terms of reference should be widened. Dr. Goodison-Wickes' pamphlet has been read widely in local government. Although it presents a particular view of the problem, it shows some of the grounds for concern that many right hon. Members have expressed.

Mr. John Evans (St. Helens, North): In view of the Government's record of attacks on local government in the past five years and in view of the outrageous statements that Conservative Members have made today, is the Secretary of State beginning to form the opinion that the inquiry can be regarded as impartial only if he ensures that not one member of it has anything to do with the Conservative party?

Mr. Jenkin: I suspect that that might be difficult to achieve but I intend to ensure that the members of the committee are recognised for their impartiality and integrity. I hope that that satisfies the hon. Gentleman. The questions that have been put to me at the Dispatch Box today have served only to reinforce the wisdom of referring these issues to a committee of this type.

Mr. Spencer Batiste (Elmet): Is my right hon. Friend aware that West Yorkshire metropolitan county council, through its leader, recently issued a secret memorandum exclusively to Labour councillors asking them to suggest up to £50,000-worth of spending on road programmes in their wards? Does he agree that that is a legitimate cause for anxiety among many people who regard it as an erosion of the traditional values of local government? Can my right hon. Friend confirm that the terms of reference of the inquiry will be sufficiently wide to enable it to consider this and similar cases?

Mr. Jenkin: I can give my hon. Friend the assurance for which he asks.

Mr. Guy Barnett (Greenwich): The Secretary of State will be aware that, for years, the responsibility borne and the business carried out by leaders and chairmen of committees has grown. Will the committee be competent to re-examine the proposals that were made by the Robinson committee on the possibility of paying leaders and chairmen of committees in view of the substantial responsibilities that some of them now have?

Mr. Jenkin: Yes, Sir.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Perhaps my right hon. Friend could meet at least two of the Opposition's requests by appointing a Scottish woman. That would kill two birds, as it were, with one stone. My right hon. Friend has said that franchise, finance and structure will not be considered by the committee. Structure is being dealt with differently, but can my right hon. Friend confirm that the Government are dealing with the financing of local government urgently? Can he also confirm that any recommendations that arise from the investigation into the financing of local government will appear before, or at least at the same time as, the recommendations of the committee of inquiry, so that the matter might be dealt with comprehensively?

Mr. Jenkin: I assure my hon. Friend that I have nothing but respect for Scottish women, as my mother was one. I also assure my hon. Friend that the finance study that I have asked my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment to undertake are well under way, but it will be some months before we shall be able to embark on public consultation. I see no overriding need for the work of the committee and those studies to proceed in tandem. They are addressed to important but different matters. However, I take my hon. Friend's point.

Mr David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): I especially welcome what the Secretary of State said about protecting people who give information from vindictive retaliatory action. Will he consider two issues that arise out of his decision yesterday to reject the Asda hypermarket application, which the police have announced today that they will investigate? Will he ensure that the committee investigates that matter? Secondly——

Mr. Terry Fields: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Alton: Will the Secretary of State examine issues raised by the "jobs for the boys" policy that is being pursued by councils such as Liverpool, in which political placemen are put in positions of power purely because their political faces fit?

Mr. Terry Fields: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman cannot make a point of order just because another hon. Member has made a provocative statement.

Mr. Terry Fields: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall take the point of order after the Secretary of State's answer.

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): Some of them are crooks.

Mr. Jenkin: The matter that the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) has raised would be quite inappropriate for referral to the committee now. The appointment to councils of paid officials with party affiliations is a matter that the committee could consider, but I would not wish to argue that it would necessarily be appropriate. Many of the changes in the conduct of local authority business reflect fundamental changes in the nature of the business that is done and the nature of the societies in which councils operate. Far be it from me to suggest, by referring many of these issues to the committee, that the changes are necessarily wrong. On the contrary, it might well be that the law could catch up with the way in which many councils wish to conduct their business. In those circumstances, it is right that democratic freedoms, the rights of oppositions and fundamental freedoms should be preserved.

Mr. Terry Fields: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I must object most strongly to the language of the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton). Such language is part and parcel of early-day motion 353 in which the hon. Gentleman impugns the integrity and honesty of people outside who are in no position to defend themselves. The hon. Gentleman talked about "jobs for the boys". We are creating jobs for the boys and girls of Liverpool, which he and his crowd cannot do.

Mr. Speaker: Every hon. Member must take responsibility for what he says in the Chamber. I cannot repeat that too frequently.

Mr. Heffer: Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have been in the House for 21 years now, and important points of order of this type have always been listened to with care by Mr. Speaker. The hon. Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Porter) referred to certain people as crooks. The hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) said that the police are investigating an event in Liverpool. Is it not clear that when the police are investigating a matter it is not right for any hon. Member to make statements in the House impugning anyone who might be involved? It is certainly wrong for hon. Members to refer to people who might be involved, or who are being investigated, as crooks. Only after the investigations, legal action and a decision by the courts can such statements be made. On that basis, I trust that we shall not have any more of this, otherwise the hon. Members concerned should leave the House, make their statements publicly without privilege and face the consequences. I believe that they should withdraw their statements.

Mr. Alton: I leave it to the hon. Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Porter) to make his own statement to the House.

Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. The early-day motion to which the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) referred precedes the statement made by the Merseyside police this afternoon that they intend to investigate the matter. As far as the statements made in that early-day motion are concerned, the deputy leader of the Liverpool city council and a developer who wanted a £20 million development in Liverpool——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That has nothing to do with me. Let us seek moderation in our language in this place. That has always been our tradition. I never heard any accusation or use of the word "crook" referring to any hon. Member. If that happened, I would expect the hon. Member concerned—and I did not hear it—to withdraw the remark.

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I made no mention of any hon. Member. I merely heard one Opposition Member refer to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) as a rat, and while he has certain unattractive——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would not like that either.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): On the basis that every hon. Member should be opposed to corruption wherever it occurs, would the Secretary of State talk to the Leader of the House and his Cabinet colleagues and suggest, as there is continuing disquiet about the behaviour of hon. Members and the behaviour of lobbying organisations that operate in the House, and, to a large extent, finance lunches and dinners in some of the dining rooms of the House, that while it is appropriate for there to be an inquiry into allegations of corruption and malpractice in local government, it would also be proper for the House to prove that, while endorsing the inquiry, we are not living in a glasshouse and throwing stones at other people?

Mr. Jenkin: It may be within the recollection of the hon. Gentleman that such a study of affairs in the House led to the setting up of the Register of Financial Interests to which most hon. Members contribute, even if it is only one way. Obviously this would be quite outside the terms of the inquiry.

Mr. Derek Fatchett (Leeds, Central): Given the extent to which Conservative Members have been prepared this afternoon to throw cheap political jibes and to prejudge the issues, would the Secretary of State reconsider his earlier comment that evidence will be taken in private in certain cases? Surely, if evidence is taken in private, cheap allegations can be made against individual councillors and officers without those councillors and officers having the right to reply to such allegations. All that, I argue, will lead to a judgment on the part of the public and those involved in local government that, far from being an impartial inquiry, the inquiry is already predetermined to come up with one particular decision.

Mr. Jenkin: There is no suggestion that the inquiry is predetermined. As I made clear in what was, perhaps, a rather lengthy answer to the hon. Member for Mossley Hill, there is no presumption whatever that the existing statutory framework is necessarily the right one.

On the question of evidence in private, this must be a matter for the committee. It would not be improper for the committee, if it considered this necessary in order to protect witnesses who might be serving officers or who may have other roles, to be prepared to hear evidence in private. But, of course, the membership of the committee will be a sufficient talisman of its ability to distinguish between what it should take note of and what, if there is no possibility of challenging it, it might do better to ignore.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): Is not the real purpose of the Minister's inquiry to try to prevent the use of sections 137 and 142 of the Local Government 1972 Act by councils such as Leicester which are suffering from the ugliest and highest levels of rate-capping, so that they will no longer be able to inform their electors as to the awful results of the Government's rate-capping legislation? When the Minister says that information is proper but political propaganda is not, is he not defining information as that which he and the Government put out and political propaganda as that which is put out in the same way by their opponents in the honourable traditions of Her Majesty's Opposition?

Mr. Jenkin: All I can say—and I am sure that the hon. and learned Gentleman has studied the recent judgment of Mr. Justice Glidewell—is that this is a distinction that is drawn in the interpretation of section 142. I assure the hon. and learned Gentleman that this is by no means the central purpose of the committee's inquiry. The wide-ranging nature of the comments that have been made in all parts of the House indicates that the committee is, indeed, welcome and that it will have a wide range of issues to which to address itself. Indeed, I think that the members of the committee are in for a rather interesting time.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Does not the Secretary of State accept that since 1979 he and his Government have pursued a vendetta against local government and, in particular, a vendetta against those authorities that have sought to use existing local government legislation to the full to try to ameliorate some of the social and economic conditions in which they are placed?

The statement that he has made this afternoon and the observations of his hon. Friends suggest to me and, I believe, to many people outside the House, that this is not an objective inquiry at all, but a form of attack on those local authorities that are trying to use existing local government legislation to the full.

Does the right hon. Gentleman not further accept that implicit in the terms of reference that he has announced this afternoon is an attempt to curtail local government democracy in the country? I refer him to the section in which he states that there will be an inquiry into the propriety of members of councils being employed by another council. Should he not be considering the difficulties and the lack of democracy suffered by many local authority workers who are denied the right to stand for election to a local authority or to participate in local authority affairs? Finally, has the right hon. Gentleman consulted any trade unions on the matter?

Mr. Jenkin: The purpose of the inquiry and the terms of reference of the inquiry in general were welcomed by the local authority associations of all political persuasions. One issue on which there was no argument by those associations is that it would be right for the committee to examine the growing practice of officers of one authority being councillors of another. The obvious conflicts of interest which could, but do not necessarily, arise are matters that, rightly, should be subjected to such an impartial inquiry.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): Will not the Secretary of State accept that, despite his repeated assurances throughout the statement that it would be an impartial inquiry, the large majority of people who are interested in genuine local government, bearing in mind the Government's track record of the last six years, will view this as an attempt by the Government further to restrict local government? Would it not be far wiser to hold an inquiry into giving genuine freedom, power and finance to local government to meet the needs and requirements of the local communities who elect councillors?

Mr. Jenkin: There is no reason why the committe should not examine the giving of genuine freedom and power to local government. The only matter that I think it should not examine is local government finance, which is the subject of separate studies.

Mr. Bill Michie (Sheffield, Heeley): Will the Secretary of State agree that often, during business in the House, when Parliament considers local government in terms of its democracy, its accountability and its finance, the old proverb springs to mind, "Physician, heal thyself"? Would it not be useful, therefore, if we had that pinned up on the wall as a reminder to ourselves?

Mr. Jenkin: I think that I understand the point that the hon. Gentleman makes. If the affairs of all local authorities were as open and accountable as are the affairs of any Government of whatever party to the House of Commons and to the electorate, there would be fewer grounds for the disquiet that has arisen and for the general welcome that the inquiry has received.

New Zealand (Nuclear Vessels)

5.39 pm

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. As I understand the position, it is not possible to table private notice questions relating to the policies of other Governments. I raise this point because many hon. Members are deeply concerned about the pressures that are being applied to a democratic Commonwealth country, namely, New Zealand, arising from its policy of using port facilities for nuclear vessels.

We have close ties with Commonwealth countries. There are items of furniture in this very Chamber given to us by New Zealand and other Commonwealth countries. Is there any way in which we can express our concern about the pressure being applied against New Zealand, especially by the United States? Could a message be debated and sent from this House?

Finally, as this concerns a Commonwealth country, will the Table Office be able to accept questions on it?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has more or less answered his own point of order. He is an experienced Member and there are many ways in which matters of this kind can be raised. There is, however, no ministerial responsibility for anything that the New Zealand Government may do.

People's Right to Fuel

5.40 pm

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to prevent disconnections of domestic fuel supply in cases of hardship; to implement a statutory code of practice for dealing with such cases; to introduce a fuel allowance scheme to help eradicate fuel poverty; and for related purposes.

This is my third attempt to introduce a Bill of this nature. I shall not dwell on the aspects of disconnection and threatened disconnection, save to say that last year the domestic fuel supply of 120,000 households was disconnected when most of the people involved were already suffering hardship. The Bill would make it an offence to carry out such disconnections without a court order. Those cases show that the present voluntary code is not working. The Bill therefore seeks to introduce a statutory code of practice.

I shall address most of my remarks today to the third aspect—the introduction of a comprehensive system of fuel allowances tied to housing benefit. Understandably, a great deal of public attention and controversy has recently centred on the DHSS regulations for payment of the severe weather extra heating allowance. Indeed, the controversy was such as to provoke the Minister for Social Security to come out with the Newtonian admission in the House that the regulations were "weird and wonderful". They are so weird and wonderful that people in the north and in Scotland, where the weather is coldest, are excluded from extra payments while people in the south and parts of the midlands where it is not so cold are included.

It is worth pointing out that the rules in question are internal to the DHSS and have never been approved by Parliament. If everyone is sitting comfortably, I shall explain just how weird and wonderful they are. If X is the 24-hour mean atmospheric temperature in degrees Celsius, subtract X from 15·5 for each day of the week, add up the seven answers and call the total Y. That gives the number of degree days. If Y is greater than or equal to Z, where Z is the DHSS trigger point, you get your money. If Y is less than Z, you do not get your money. Hands up all those who understand that. It seems that Members of Parliament find it impossible to understand. If Members of Parliament do not understand the formula themselves, they certainly have a brass neck expecting the public outside to understand or accept it.

When I taught mathematics I used to try to teach from examples rather than merely speaking in the abstract. I shall therefore give some examples of the way in which the trigger mechanism works. The trigger point varies from place to place. I have tried to obtain support for the Bill from both sides of the House, so I shall not seek to score party points by choosing one Labour and one Conservative area. Instead, I shall take my own constituency of Falkirk, West and compare it with that of the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen), a non-party leader who occasionally sits beside me. The trigger point for Falkirk is 122 degree days. For Plymouth where the climate is warmer it is only 105 degree days. In other words, if the temperature in Plymouth remained at half a degree above freezing point for a week the extra allowance would be paid. In Falkirk, it would have to remain at about 2 deg below freezing point all week for the extra allowance to be payable. The assumption seems to be that the people in Falkirk are thick skinned. In fact, they are very warm-hearted people, although that is no thanks to the Government's cold-hearted policies.

It may be argued that my example is hypothetical because temperature is not constant but varies from day to day and from one time of the day to another. In an area such as Falkirk the temperature at the coldest time of the day would probably have to fall as low as minus 25 deg Celsius before people qualified for the extra allowance. A further anomaly is that for the purpose of the allowance the temperature is measured not in Falkirk but at the meteorological station 45 miles away at Leuchars, where the weather could be quite different.

The Bill seeks to introduce a scheme based on climatic differences. I have broken my own tradition and sought all-party support. I normally just ask my hon. Friends. Last year the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson) introduced a Bill covering just one aspect of this matter. My Bill is more comprehensive. The hon. Member for Dundee, East asked me to sponsor his Bill on that occasion and he has reciprocated by sponsoring my Bill.

I also invited the Leader of the House to sponsor the Bill, and he very kindly replied that he would consider my request, but he wrote to me recently saying that on second thoughts he had decided to turn down my invitation. I am sorry about that, as the Scottish Conservatives are reported to have passed a resolution last weekend demanding an end to the disparity that I have described. It is perhaps a measure of the lack of interest on the part of Scottish Tory Members that not one of them is present, although I invited several of them to sponsor the Bill. Indeed, I received what I thought was a sympathetic response from one of them. To save him embarrassment, I shall not give his name, but he once held very high rank, he is a well known lawyer, well respected in Scottish legal circles, and a close friend of the Prime Minister. He said that he would listen to my speech before making up his mind and then signal to me if he was prepared to sponsor the Bill. Unfortunately, he is not even here to listen to my speech.

The Glasgow Herald today reported that the Solicitor-General

"felt it extraordinary that while Braemar had been the the coldest place in Britain one night the 'trigger' point for payment had not been met because the temperature recording station was at Dyce, Aberdeen."

The report also states:

"Mr. Fraser, in his letter to Mrs. Thatcher, said that the present scheme could be so flawed it might have to be wholly reconsidered under the Department of Energy review."

As a member of the Government, he should have known that it is not the Department of Energy but the DHSS that is supposed to be reviewing the matter.

I have heard rumours that the Government intend to scrap the heating allowance altogether. That would be an absolute travesty of justice, not only for the people of Scotland, but for people in all parts of the United Kingdom. It would be better to introduce a comprehensive system of fuel allowances with a regional element based on climatic differences. I do not have time to go into the details of the scheme now, but under the terms of the Bill the detailed regulations would be subject to parliamentary scrutiny.

At present hundreds of thousands of people are suffering from hypothermia, or the threat of it. Many of them are old-age pensioners. In some cases it would not be an exaggeration to say that they are not merely suffering but dying from hypothermia. Therefore, the House must respond to their needs constructively. My Bill is an attempt to introduce a comprehensive charter to eradicate fuel poverty, and I therefore ask the House to support it.

Question put and agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Who will prepare and bring in the Bill?

Mr. Canavan: Mr. Kevin Barron, Mr. Dennis Skinner, Mr. Gordon Brown, Mr. Robert Parry, Mr. David Winnick, Mr. William McKelvey, Mr. Gordon Wilson, Mr. Jim Craigen, Mr. Eddie Loyden, Mr. Bob McTaggart, and myself, and I have still space for one Tory Member, if he wants to signal me that he wants to sponsor my Bill.

PEOPLE'S RIGHT TO FUEL

Mr. Dennis Canavan accordingly presented a Bill to prevent disconnections of domestic fuel supply in cases of hardship; to implement a statutory code of practice for dealing with such cases; to introduce a fuel allowance scheme to help eradicate fuel poverty; and for related purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 22 February and to be printed. [Bill 76.]

Local Government (Rates)

5.52 pm

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. As the Chairman of the Select Committee on Statutory Instruments, the Committee asked me to express its concern at the unusual speed with which the order has been brought forward for debate today. I believe that it was laid in the House only last Wednesday, which has placed the Scrutiny Committee in considerable difficulties.

Under Standing Order No. 104(9) we are obliged to draw any instrument to the special attention of the House. If we want to do that we must afford the Government Department involved the opportunity first to furnish us with a written memorandum and, if necessary, to give oral evidence. You will appreciate that as the Government laid the order only on Wednesday, it is extremely difficult for us to scrutinise it, ask for witnesses, and oral or written evidence. I appreciate that under the Standing Orders of the House the Government are not required to ensure that an instrument has been to the Scrutiny Committee before it is brought to the House, but the custom and practice have always been to attempt to do that unless there is an extreme reason of urgency why they cannot give the Scrutiny Committee reasonable time to carry out its functions.

Can you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, or Mr. Speaker, look into the matter to see whether it was urgent, what attempts the Government made to ensure that the Scrutiny Committee had the opportunity to hear witnesses and to take written statements if it wanted, and why it was necessary to introduce it in such a way as to break the traditional convention that the Scrutiny Committee is given adequate time to consider an order? That is especially important in view of the controversial nature of much that is contained in the order.

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Patrick Jenkin): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I may be able to help the hon. Gentleman. I wish to preface my remarks by saying that the whole House appreciates the work done by the hon. Gentleman, as Chairman of the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments, and those who serve with him. The House is indebted to them.

I am aware that some members of the Committee expressed concern about the timing of the debate after the meeting of the Joint Committee. The arrangement of business is a matter for agreement through the usual channels and subject to correction. I am not aware that the Opposition expressed concern about this issue. However, it is not unusual for important business to follow swiftly after Joint Committee consideration. I assure the hon. Gentleman that had the Joint Committee raised an important query about the validity of the draft order, business would have been rearranged. However, in this case the Committee had no doubts. Although the timing may be unusual, I do not think that it is in any way improper and, therefore, I think that the business may proceed.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It seemed unfortunate for the Secretary of State to imply that because I happen to be a member of the Opposition, I am a party to the business of the House regarding this matter. I raised the point as the Chairman of the Select Committee on behalf of all the members of that Committee. It must be the duty of the Whips on both sides of the House to ensure that traditional procedures are observed as far as possible.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): I cannot help the hon. Gentleman very much on that. He has had the opportunity to put his case, it has been heard by the House, and there has been a further point of order from the Secretary of State. Both he and the right hon. Gentleman have dealt with the point. Their remarks were addressed more to the usual channels than to the Chair. The hon. Gentleman will realise that it is not possible for the Chair to assist him in this matter. However, he has had an opportunity to put his point on the record, and I am sure that it has been heard on both sides of the House.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) makes a valid point. He is not party to any agreement that is reached through official channels. Regardless of the fact that we cannot alter the position today, it would be appropriate that if in future there is a departure from normal conventions in relation to timing, at least the Chairman of the Select Committee on Statutory Instruments should be informed and given an opportunity to consult his colleagues on whether they wish to make representations to the leaderships of both sides of the House. Will that be considered in future?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hope that the exchange has assisted the House. This is not a matter over which the Chair has any definitive authority.

5.58 pm

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I beg to move,

That the draft Rate Limitation (Prescribed Maximum) (Precepts) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 30th January, be approved.

The order is the first of two that will come before the House under section 4 of the Rates Act 1984. It is a stage in the rate-capping process, and the House is asked to approve the maximum rate or precept limits for each of the authorities selected for rate capping. This order covers the four precepting authorities, and my present intention is to table the order covering the rating authorities that have not agreed their limits in a few days. I certainly take note of the point you made, Mr. Deputy Speaker, about the question of timing.

The House knows that the Government's case is that the purpose of rate capping is to protect ratepayers from the impact of high rates caused by high spending. All the authorities designated last July have budgeted this year to spend both more than 4 per cent. above their targets and more than 20 per cent. above their GREs. The order covers the Greater London council, the Inner London education authority, the Merseyside county council and the South Yorkshire county council. I shall say a word about each in turn.

The GLC has doubled its spending in three years. It has more than doubled its precept since the Socialists took control of county hall in 1981. It spends as if there were no tomorrow, and I suppose that for the GLC, there is no tomorrow. Its £10 million advertising campaign has become a national scandal. This year, it is recruiting 1,700 extra staff, and last week GLC councillors—I quote from The Standard of 1 February—were

[Mr. Patrick Jenkin]

"deluged with 125 separate spending plans together as thick as five telephone directories. Most had been delivered to their homes (at more expense no doubt) only the night before. Others were actually trundled in while the meeting was going on. Small wonder," writes The Standard,

"that even a Labour councillor complained that he had not had time even to look at the proposals and could not vote for them."

In the face of that evidence, how can the GLC argue that the precept limit in the order is impossible?

The Inner London education authority is unique, not only in its constitution but in its unrivalled extravagance as an education authority. During the past three years, its school population has fallen by 10 per cent., but its spending has increased by almost a third to more than £900 million. Compared with other authorities, ILEA now spends per pupil 29 per cent. more than Manchester, 31 per cent. more than Sheffield and 54 per cent. more than Bradford. Those familiar with Bradford will know that it has a large immigrant population.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): Will the Secretary of State turn his mind to the Z scores of deprivation produced by his Department, which show that those who live in the Inner London education authority area are far more deprived than the populations of any other cities? Will he also confirm that Her Majesty's inspectors of schools have never substantially criticised the organisation, operation or standards of ILEA? Indeed, when a special survey of the authority was carried out by Her Majesty's inspectorate of schools, it endorsed the progress being made by that authority.

Mr. Jenkin: If the hon. Gentleman catches your eye later, Mr. Deputy Speaker, he will be able to make those points. The fact is that ILEA's spending per pupil is extravagant compared with other inner-city areas that have high incidence of deprivation, large ethnic minority populations and many children whose mother tongue is not English.

I remind the hon. Gentleman that until ILEA was stopped by the court, it was spending no less than £750,000 on a blatant political advertising campaign. I wonder whether my hon. Friends who represent London constituencies noticed a recent advertisement in The Guardian for a personal assistant to the leader of ILEA? That person must have

"Political sensitivity and a supportive understanding of the objectives of the majority party (Labour)."

What will be the cost of this person's salary to be paid by inner London ratepayers? The answer is £17,598 a year.

Since 1978-79, Merseyside county council has increased its spending——

Mr. Guy Barnett (Greenwich) rose——

Mr. Jenkin: I shall not give way. This is a short debate, and the hon. Gentleman may have an opportunity to catch your eye later, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Merseyside county council has increased its spending by almost 150 per cent. since 1978-79. That is faster than any of the five Merseyside district councils, including Liverpool. It is the worst spending record of any of the six metropolitan counties. Its annual transport deficit is no less than £82 million, and during the past three years, Merseyside's precept has increased by more than 50 per cent. Yet Merseyside has decided to help to fund Liverpool's first novelist in residence. The council has just given a £1,500 grant to the makers of a record album attacking the police. The council gave its staff the day off with pay to strike against abolition—the strike did more to generate support for abolition than anything else the council had done.

South Yorkshire council has increased its spending since 1978-79 by 132 per cent., which is more than any of the four district councils in its area. Recently, it gave £100,000 to the miners. It has decided to put nuclear-free-zone signs on 21 primary routes through the county at a cost of £100 per sign. It subsidises public transport to the tune of no less than £73·5 million a year. Buses cost the passenger transport executive £1·92 per passenger mile, but the passengers pay less than a quarter of that sum. The hapless ratepayers must pay the difference.

Those are the councils which claim to be starved of money for their essentials, yet the examples that I have quoted show them to be wildly extravagant. Why should the hundreds of responsible councils suffer for the extravagance of the few? Many councils, Labour as well as Conservative, budget to stay within the guidelines, and those four should do the same.

Before I discuss the individual precept limits, I should remind the House of the stages in the process that have already happened. On 24 July last year, I listed the 18 authorities to be capped and announced their maximum expenditure levels. Under the Rates Act they could appeal against those expenditure limits and ask that they be increased. As the House knows, the Labour party's national executive committe decided on a policy which it described as "non-compliance". As a result, not one Labour-controlled authority availed itself of the appeal procedure. I extended the time and gave the clearest sign, both inside and outside the House, that the professed reasons for not appealing were misconceived. But still not one authority appealed——

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): Including Portsmouth.

Mr. Jenkin: Portsmouth is now prepared to accept the rate limit that has been set and will budget within it.

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): In view of what the Secretary of State said about redetermination, and especially his reference to Portsmouth, perhaps I could remind the House of what the Conservative leader of Portsmouth city council, Mr. Ian Gibson, said about applications for redetermination in the Municipal Journal of 3 August last year:

"The thing about redetermination is that it could come with strings attached that my council could not possibly accept."

"My council" is a Conservative council. That is the reality of redetermination.

Mr. Jenkin: The truth is that Portsmouth city council quickly came to the conclusion that it did not need to apply for redetermination. Councillor Gibson assured me the other day that the council will make a budget fully in line with, and conceivably below, the rate limit that has been set.

On 11 December, I announced the rate support grant settlement and, basing myself on those expenditure levels, I announced the rate and precept limits to the House. Again, the Rates Act provides a right of appeal. Any authority that wishes to challenge its limit can come in and argue for a higher limit. None of the four precepting authorities named in the order has done so.

However, in recent months non-compliance has taken a curious form. Substantial quantities of paper arrived on the desks of my officials, through various routes, setting out, often in considerable detail, many of the facts and figures that those authorities wished me to consider in reaching decisions on their rate limits. Indeed, the information flowed in so thick and fast that when I met a deputation on Monday from 17 rate-capped and nine other Labour-controlled authorities, the pile of information on the table in front of me stood over six inches high. If that is non-compliance, so be it. Around that table were sitting some of the real non-compliers, who had put in no information because they had followed the national executive committee's instruction. I gained the impression that they felt a little let down by what their colleagues had done.

That brings me to the individual precept limits set out in the schedule to the order. The GLC's precept limit of 36·52p is what I proposed on 11 December. It corresponds to a spend of about £785 million, assuming a modest drawdown of balances. Compared with the GLC's proposed budget of more than £860 million, the result of passing the order will be that next year's GLC precept will be about 7p less than it would otherwise have been. Of course, if we add the London Regional Transport levy, the amount that ratepayers will pay will be higher than this year's precept—[HON. MEMBERS: "Ah!"] It is no good hon. Members saying "Ah". Everyone knows that this year the GLC manipulated its precept downwards by drawing over £200 million from balances while increasing its spending by over £100 million. Because of this manipulation, there would have had to be a big increase in the joint precept of the GLC and ILEA anyway next year. Without rate capping, the fact remains—it cannot be seriously challenged — that from next April, Londoners would have had to pay 7p more in the pound than will be the case.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): The right hon. Gentleman referred to "modest reserves". What reserves has he calculated that the GLC has to draw on? Why, after three requests from the GLC for him to give the information on how he arrives at that reserve, has he still refused to reply?

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman knows that, under the Act, I am entitled, if I do not have all the detailed figures, to make assumptions. There would have been no need for me to make any assumptions if all the authorities had followed the procedures laid down in the Act and provided the information for which they were asked. It has been open to them to have discussions with me and my officials about expenditure levels and rate limits. I have dealt as even-handedly as I can between authorities in calculating limits, but in setting those limits I have to take account of the individual circumstances and the differences between authorities.

I have made assumptions only where information has not been provided or is not available about authorities' individual circumstances. I have sought to compare reserves with statistical average levels for the class of authorities and have also allowed for possibly inadequate reserves in 1985-86 in those cases where local authorities have made substantial use of funds this year, 1984-85, so depleting their reserves. I point out to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) that the councils not giving us information could have worked both ways. By not using the statutory procedures, the authorities, and the GLC is one, may have concealed contingencies built into their budgets.

Mr. Tony Banks: The GLC has not.

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman may say that, but it may have shortfalls in spending. I know that the GLC has been trying to get rid of money as fast as it can, but this could happen. I have had to make assumptions, and those assumptions may well have been in favour of the authority. The effect will be to make the limits more generous than they appear. The percentage cuts of which the authorities are making much are unreal because they include large allowances for planned growth.

The ILEA precept is a different story. In December, I proposed a precept limit of 74·19p. The limit of the order is now 3·06p higher, at 77·25p. The reason for the increase is straightforward. ILEA has been helpful in supplying information. Part of this consisted of a breakdown of its reserves. It appeared that part of those reserves—those contained in its building and renewals fund — represented money from the sale of capital assets. By law, such money is not available for use to support revenue spending.

Now that I have the detailed figures, I have made an allowance for this factor and I have made a number of other adjustments in the light of ILEA's information. Accordingly, ILEA's precept has been raised to 77.25p. This still represents a reduction of nearly 3p compared with this year's ILEA precept of 80p. Only a few moments ago, I received a further letter from the chairman of ILEA, and this is being considered.

The 3.06p uplift does not allow ILEA to spend any more money. It is still based on an expenditure level of £900 million. What has changed is how much of that spending can be financed from precept and how much from reserves. I hope that if any of the rate-capped authorities believe that the same consideration might apply to them, they will note that it was information given to us from ILEA that led to a modest easing of the precept limit. In the absence of rate capping, ILEA was proposing to spend not £900 million but £957 million. This would have required a precept not of 77.25p but of 83.1p.

Let us take the GLC and ILEA precepts together, and apply that to a typical, two-storey terraced house in Tower Hamlets, with a rateable value of £211—quite a humble house. The ratepayers of that house will next year save £32 from what they would otherwise have had to pay. Without rate capping, they would have had to pay £32 more, on the budgets that both the GLC and ILEA say that they would have introduced without rate capping.

I shall give another example, of a small corner shop in Lambeth, with a rateable value of £350. There, next year the ratepayer will pay no less than £52 less than he would have paid without rate capping. When further savings are added because of rate capping in some boroughs, I think that ratepayers will see quite clearly that rate capping is at last coming to their rescue.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): In that case, will the right hon. Gentleman tell the House what the ratepayers with children in Inner London will say when they have to pay more for school meals and when school facilities and the quality of education go down as a result of this decision?

Mr. Jenkin: They will think much the same as the parents in any other area who have been paying higher prices for school meals for years. The level of payment for school meals in ILEA, given all the available concessions, has become a scandal. It is possible for ILEA to do something about that, but that is up to it. I am merely setting the upper limit, and it will have to decide how it will live with the limit.

There is a different story on Merseyside. Here, the precept limit of 82.86p, though no change from what I proposed in December, represents a 27 per cent. increase on this year's precept. There is a clear reason for that. This year, Merseyside is planning to draw down special funds so that its precept is much less than would be necessary to support its spending this year if it had to be financed by ratepayers. The information that I then had suggested that the council would not be able to do this again next year. Even a reduced level of spending would have to be financed almost wholly from the precept. Therefore, in any event, the precept will have to be higher. Again, after carefully considering the further information that Merseyside county council gave me—non-compliance again—I decided to confirm the limit that I originally proposed.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): It may seem to the right hon. Gentleman that he is benefiting Merseyside by allowing it to increase its rate precept to 82·5p in the pound, which is a 27 per cent. increase on last year. The right hon. Gentleman is presumably trying to protect ratepayers against increases. Is he interested in value for money? By asking Merseyside council to reduce its budget by £23 million, which is 10 per cent. of the budget, he is asking the ratepayers to pay 27 per cent. more for 10 per cent. less.

Mr. Jenkin: Both sides will get a great deal more value for money from what the council spends. The hon. Gentleman is anticipating my next point.

Compared with a £249 million budget, which Merseyside says that it would have introduced in the absence of rate capping, this precept, although a 27 per cent. increase on last year, is 50p in the pound less that it would otherwise have been. That is what Merseysiders would have had to pay if there had not been rate capping.

I can take an example from the constituency of the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts), of a typical semi-detached house in Bootle with a rateable value of £250. There will be a saving for the owner of that house of about £125 compared with what he would have had to pay in the absence of rate capping. I ask the House to contrast what will happen to that ratepayer in Bootle with what will happen to a similar ratepayer in Liverpool, whose rates will not be capped. I think that the ratepayers in Bootle may well consider themselves to be mighty lucky.

Mr. John Powley (Norwich, South): I am interested in what my right hon. Friend is saying about how much the domestic ratepayer will save, but will he bear in mind that a large proportion of rates is paid by commercial and industrial ratepayers, who get no relief according to their ability to pay? It is that sector as much as any other that needs relief from the high-spending authorities.

Mr. Jenkin: That is why I quoted the corner shop in Lambeth as an example of a saving of £1 a week.

Finally, there is south Yorkshire. In December I proposed 81·32p, a reduction on this year's precept of just over 2 per cent. South Yorkshire sent me a certain amount of information, but I concluded that it was not such as to lead me to change my proposal. South Yorkshire was proposing to spend £206 million next year. Thanks to rate capping, south Yorkshire's precept will be about 35p in the pound below what it would have been, saving the ratepayer in a typical three-bedroomed semi in Barnsley or Sheffield about £63. That is on a rateable value of £180.

Those are the precept limits for the four precepting authorities. If the House approves the order they will have over a month in which to decide on their budgets and declare their precepts which, to be legal, must not be higher than the figures in the order.

Mr. Barnett: Will the right hon. Gentleman explain upon what basis the limit of a precept has been fixed in each case?

Mr. Jenkin: The Act obliges me to take account of the spending level, the amount of the rate support grant and the availability of reserves. I was given a great many figures by these authorities, but I still had to make assumptions, and I explained to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) the basis upon which they were made.

Mr. Barnett: Will the right hon. Gentleman publish the calculations in each case?

Mr. Jenkin: The Act requires me to make assumptions. I have said that if an authority asked for an alternative level, I should be prepared at that point to discuss the assumptions with the authority, but as none has done so I was entitled to make the assumptions that I did.

Dr. Cunningham: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Jenkin: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will allow me to finish what I have to say on this point. In answer to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West I said that one of the factors that we had in mind was what would be the appropriate average level of reserves for authorities in that class. The Inner London education authority and the Greater London council are each in a class of their own. Therefore we had to make assumptions on the best information available. If an authority wished to challenge those assumptions, it should have made an alternative proposal which could have been discussed.

Dr. Cunningham: How can the right hon. Gentleman ask the House to approve this order with its so crucial consequences for four elected authorities while at the same time he denies to the House the fundamental information upon which he has made his calculations? Is not the House of Commons entitled to know the assumptions that have been made?

Mr. Jenkin: The Act is quite clear. It entitles me to make assumptions. And the procedure is quite clear. I have made it clear on many occasions, both individually to the authorities and in public, that if any of these four authorities had come forward with another proposal it could have sat down with me and my officials and gone through the figures. As it was, not one of them chose to do so. Therefore these levels are before the House.

Predictably, the capped authorities prophesy all sorts of doom and disaster. Yes, they will have to make savings, as others have done already. Nevertheless, having considered the matter with some care, and bearing in mind the GLC's grossly inflated budgets, the very modest level of savings being sought from ILEA and the huge subsidies to transport in south Merseyside and Yorkshire, I am in no doubt, and the House should be in no doubt, that all four authorities can budget to spend sensibly on services while remaining within the limits in the order.

All four authorities were represented in the deputation which came to see me on Monday. Let me tell the House what that deputation asked for. Although this House had voted on 15 January to accept the rate support grant settlement for next year, as set out in the report, the deputation asked in effect that I should cast it aside; that I should abandon targets and hold back; that I should make some huge but unspecified increase in the amount of rate support grant; that I should abandon the Rates Act which was passed by the House last year; and that, apparently in return for all this, the 26 authorities represented round the table would be good enough to join me in some commission of inquiry. They said nothing about cutting out growth or about trimming their spending. Indeed, the figures they tabled at the meeting assumed continuing growth in spending.

I doubt whether the House was therefore surprised to read in Tuesday's press that I had been unable to accede to those requests. But of course it is worse. I do not suppose that there was a single person in that room in 2 Marsham street on Monday who thought that those proposals were seriously intended. On the contrary——

Mr. Tony Banks: Why not?

Mr. Jenkin: I shall answer the question "Why not?" Every one of those council leaders was there for quite different reasons, which had been spelt out with admirable clarity in a two-page report that had been presented to them three weeks earlier by Councillor David Blunkett of Sheffield, the leader of the deputation. It has come to be known as the Blunkett report.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East) rose——

Mr. Jenkin: Perhaps my hon. Friend will allow me to deal with this point. They wanted to be able to say that when I laid this order before the House today I would be unable to claim that the capped authorities simply refused to meet me at all or that they were unwilling to put their case collectively. They also wanted to "ensure that at the councils' budget meetings in March elected members cannot be accused of failing to challenge the Secretary of State face to face in this way prior to considering the kind of tactics, potentially illegal or otherwise, being considered by the councils concerned".

The Opposition might be interested to hear that the Blunkett report went on to say that it was their aim "to prevent the break-up of groups arguing about whether or not we should meet Jenkin."

Finally, it was their aim to dislocate the Department of the Environment's parliamentary timetable.

Rarely can a deputation have been launched with such shoddy and transparent humbug. Rate capping will not only curb the spending of the most extravagant over-spenders. It will protect the ratepayers in those areas. And as I said in our rate support grant debate last month, it will allow me to set fairer targets for the much larger number of prudent, low-spending councils which for too long have had to suffer for the extravagance of the few.

For all these reasons I ask the House to approve this draft order.

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): The House is asked today to approve an order through which the Conservative Government will impose a maximum rate on four democratically elected local authorities. We are being asked to take an unprecedented step to impose further central control over the lives of more than 9·5 million people in Merseyside, south Yorkshire and London.

In spite of repeated assurances since taking office in 1979, Tory Ministers are now face to face with the reality of the abysmal mess that they have created in local government during the last six years. In 1980, the present Secretary of State for Defence promised that the Government would not fix the level of an authority's rates. He said:

"Those decisions remain with the authority." — [Official Report, 5 February 1980; Vol. 978, c. 251.]

The present Secretary of State for Employment made a similar promise. When he was Minister for Local Government and Environmental Services he said:

"It is not suggested that it"—

the needs assessment—

"prescribes a specific level to which an authority ought to spend . . . I want to make it quite clear that that was not the purpose. We are seeking to find the fairest way to distribute public money to local authorities . . . " — [Official Report, Standing Committee D, 1 April 1980; c. 941.]

The right hon. Gentleman also said:

"My Department will not be in the business of saying how much each authority should spend, where it should or should not make cuts or on what it should spend money. . . Local authorities are autonomous . . . but the ultimate decision on rating and on the volume of expenditure of local authorities is a matter for the councillors themselves." — [Official Report, Standing Committee D, 27 March 1980; c. 840-41.]

That is the sort of promise that the House has been given by Conservative Ministers since they came to office. Now all of that is being swept aside by the Secretary of State's proposals.

As policy failures have embarrassingly mounted, the Government have simply ploughed deeper into the rights of local councils — [Interruption.] Does the hon. Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Porter) wish to intervene or does he just want to waffle on from a sedentary position? As policy failures have embarrassingly mounted, the Government have ploughed deeper into the rights of local councils, casting aside promises in the way that I have described, ignoring all evidence, defying good administrative experience and refusing to learn the lessons — and that from a Government who are allegedly committed to freedom, choice, accountability and the better use of public money.

Market forces are apparently no longer in vogue, at least in the Secretary of State's Department. Massive intervention on a widening scale is the reality. Whitehall-imposed decisions are his practice. The second-guessing of every council in Britain by civil servants is the norm, and chaos is the result. Even The Economist was recently moved to describe the Government's approach to local council finance as "lunatic." Need we say more?

Tory Ministers have legislated themselves and local government into a legal quagmire and they know it. As councillor Roger Parker Jervis, the Tory leader of Buckinghamshire, said, councils have been "legislated into a corner" by this Government. The truth is that the Conservative party no longer has any clear philosophy of local government or well-based body of coherent thought about its role or contribution in a plural democratic society. It has no consistent principles in its approach and no thoughts about a stable, productive relationship between the centre, national Government, and local government. Indeed, in stumbling into the real crisis that exists, successive Ministers have displayed contempt and imcompetence towards local administration on a quite staggering scale.

I say quite bluntly that the order has no place in the House of Commons. The House is not equipped or competent to fix the rate of any local authority in Britain, let alone that of four altogether, in one brief debate. In our view, Government have no right to these powers either, and are similarly and singularly unfit to use them with any proper understanding of the consequences. The budget of Merseyside county council is £180 million, of south Yorkshire £172 million, of ILEA over £900 million and of the GLC over £900 million. Yet Parliament is asked to discuss, understand and approve in three hours the consequences of reducing those budgets by more than £200 million. It is a preposterous proposition and the House is singularly unfit to decide upon it.

Of course the request is absurd. We do not have the information. We do not even have all the information that the Secretary of State possesses. As he has just made clear, he refuses even to be candid with the House about the assumptions that he is making. In reality, we are being asked to rubber-stamp an imposed control, regardless of the consequences for the education of children in London, for bus services in south Yorkshire, for police and fire services in the metropolitan counties and for the quality of public services for millions of people.

The Rates Act is an enabling Act, and a general powers measure that allows Tory Ministers to bypass the ballot box and to decide in Whitehall on the quality and level of services provided in the towns, cities and counties of Britain. The order makes the accountability of elected council members to their communities an irrelevance. It destroys the relationship, based upon universal suffrage, through which voters have always been able to hold their elected councillors to account. Nothing positive or worthwhile will emerge from the application of these powers which, judging by today's detailed story on the front page of The Guardian, are about to be extended to the total control of local councils' own money from their own capital receipts.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: At Question Time the hon. Gentleman will have heard my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State deny absolutely and categorically the suggestion embodied in the two headlines involved in the story in The Guardian. There is no foundation for it at all. No such proposal is on the table. As the hon. Gentleman knows, we are discussing with the local authority associations, as I promised, what changes will be necessary in the capital control system in order to reconcile their legitimate aims with the Treasury's legitimate aim of keeping control over public expenditure. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not pursue that point.

Dr. Cunningham: I heard the Under-Secretary of State and I have listened carefully to what the Secretary of State has said. They have both denied the headline, but they have not denied the detail of the story at all. They have admitted that the matter is under consideration, and that causes me considerable concern. On the subject of promises, I shall tell the right hon. Gentleman what one of his Cabinet colleagues, the Secretary of State for Employment, said. I quote from the Local Government Chronicle. The right hon. Gentleman was talking about local government finance and said:

> "It will certainly not involve central Government telling local government what to spend . . . nor will it mean cash limits with a statutory ceiling on rate increases."

The reality is that we have had all these promises before, and they are simply hollow. Moreover, they have been cynically cast aside by, among others, the Secretary of State.

Mr. Martin M. Brandon-Bravo (Nottingham, South): The hon. Gentleman used the phrase, "their own capital receipts." Is it not true that many of those capital receipts were originally subsidised from central funds, sometimes by as much as 65 per cent.? How does that make them the local authorities' own capital receipts?

Dr. Cunningham: The hon. Gentleman should read the words of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment who, in making his statement in December, and in the emergency debate the following day, was at least moved to concede that it is the councils' own money. If on nothing else, I agree with the Secretary of State on that point.

The Government are forcing local councils to be lenders and, on an increasing scale, using councils' own money to buttress the political aims and objectives of Government policy. That is another grotesque abuse of power, and one that will be totally destructive of local accountability. Just as the water industry is to be used as a tax collector for central Government, regardless of that industry's economies, and as with the gas and electricity industries, local government's financial control and freedom over its own money is to be removed. In pursuit of a manifestly failed economic policy, which is leading this country deeper into unemployment and despair, this Government choose scapegoats on all sides. Local government is a favourite target, but not one credible economic argument has been, or can be, advanced in favour of total control of councils' expenditure generated from their own resources.

The right hon. Gentleman made a number of claims about reductions in rates. As usual, he had nothing to say about the fact that it is widely recognised that the real reason why rates have increased by 141 per cent. since 1979 is because of Conservative policies, in particular the systematic reduction of rate support grant.

He also had nothing to say about the impact of the order on the quality and availability of services to the almost 10 million people who will be affected by it. He chose singularly to ignore the fact, in speaking of the authorities, that, despite his criticism of them, their local communities had voted for Labour administrations, and in some cases had consistently done so. The right hon. Gentleman is asking the House to bypass the political decisions of those communities.

Rates have gone up dramatically as a result of Government policy. All local authority associations say so and the Audit Commission says so in its report. Tory councillors say it, as do national newspapers such as the Financial Times, The Guardian and The Times. Only the right hon. Gentleman, his ministerial colleagues and a few trusty Back Bench supporters try to deny it.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Will the hon. Gentleman agree that there are only low turn-outs in the areas about which he has been talking? Only a small number of people pay rates, the number of votes cast in those areas is not high and consequently the voting numbers are not representative of the local communities. The hon. Gentleman cannot say, therefore, that the voting figures reveal the kind of services and spending that he is advocating. People want a reduction in rates and a reduction in services as well.

Dr. Cunningham: I remind the hon. Gentleman that in our democracy we have a universal franchise; everyone is entitled to a vote. More households in Britain pay rates than pay taxes. I assume that the logic of the hon. Gentleman's argument is that if people do not pay they should not vote, a concept which we fundamentally reject and which has no place in a democratic society.

Neither the Act nor the order will enable the Government to give any significant or meaningful help to Tory councils, which Ministers have persistently promised to do, and the right hon. Gentleman made that promise again today. The recent rate support grant report laid bare the hollowness of that promise. Nor will the Act mean any significant advantages for industry and commerce, as the Department's consultants recently reported.

After its leak to The Guardian, I was sent a copy of a report commissioned by the Department entitled "The Effect of Rates on the Location of Employment". It cost £50,000 of the taxpayers' money to produce; its 100 pages cost £500 a page. It concludes that there is no foundation for the Government's argument that rates have caused the loss of jobs. Three years ago my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) produced a paper on the subject. It covered three pages, as against the 100 pages of this document, and my hon. Friend's paper was presented to the right hon. Gentleman free of charge. It gave him the information that is now given at a cost of £50,000.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): I have had a communication from the south Tees business community. They, not the accountants or the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), create jobs and wealth, and I will send a copy to the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham). It shows that, as a direct result of this year's imposition of rates in Cleveland, the business community estimates the loss of a further 8,000 jobs in that area.

Dr. Cunningham: Surveys done in the past—many were done at the time of the passage of the Rates Act—concluded that rates formed a small percentage of business costs. I have not seen any evidence, from the Government or the Tory party, to contradict that information.

Mr. Holt rose——

Dr. Cunningham: I will not give way. I must move on.

The Secretary of State also ignored his powers in section 5 of the Act to set an interim limit while the negotiations to which he referred took place. Why did he do that? He announced his intention on 11 December 1984, with the deadline of 15 January 1985, a hopeless timetable, given the two-week holiday period in between.

To add confusion and to cloak his intentions, the Secretary of State has persistently refused to tell the councils or Parliament what assumptions he has made about councils' finances in fixing their rates. What is being hidden? The right hon. Gentleman's political bias as well as his inconsistency are being disguised, and I again challenge him to explain why the House of Commons, in being asked to approve this order, and the councils affected, are being denied this crucial information.

I shall give way to the right hon. Gentleman if he will give an explanation. Of course he cannot, and he will not, because he is afraid that the House will understand why he has made the assumptions that we believe he has. He is afraid to put his fairness, or lack of it, to the test.

I learn today, most disturbingly, from the Labour leader of Haringey borough council, Councillor George Meehan, that Conservative councillors in the borough have told him that they have been told of the assumptions made by the right hon. Gentleman in respect of Haringey borough council. That can only be described as contemptible, especially since, as everyone knows, the Labour party is in control of and responsible for the affairs of that borough. It is yet another way in which the right hon. Gentleman is seeking to bypass the democratic wishes of the people of the borough.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Either Councillor Meehan or the hon. Gentleman has misunderstood the position. I have said nothing to the Conservative members of Haringey which would justify the hon. Gentleman's statement. What I have said—what I said the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks)—is that one of the factors which we have had in mind is to compare the reserves of an authority with the average level of reserves of authorities of that class, and that would seem a reasonable exercise.

Many of the authorities have told us their reserves and have given us many of the figures that go to make up the reserves. Where they have not, we have had to make assumptions. It would have been perfectly proper for Councillor Meehan or anybody else to have come to us and said, "We think that this is too tight. It can only be raised. The Act does not allow us to reduce the rate limit, only to raise it." Anybody could have come and discussed that issue with my officials and the whole thing could have been gone into. They chose not to do that. I am entitled to say, therefore, that the limit is acceptable to them.

Dr. Cunningham: If this is all so innocent, why will not the right hon. Gentleman publish the assumptions? There has been no convincing answer. We have received correspondence about the matter, it has been raised on the Floor of the House and repeated requests have been made, but the right hon. Gentleman has given no explanation which is satisfactory to the House and the councils concerned. As to what I have said about George Meehan—he is not only a political colleague but a friend—I specifically had the assertion checked before I raised the matter in the House. Councillor Meehan authorised me to say what I am saying. I do not say this lightly, without authority or frivolously. The action to which I referred cannot contribute to the happy or speedy resolution of these difficulties.

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman has made his point. There is no truth in any suggestion that I have made available details of the assumptions. It would have been improper for officials to have had meetings of that sort with minority members of the council. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will withdraw any suggestion that my officials have behaved improperly.

Dr. Cunningham: The argument about the application of these rate limits rests not just on the right hon. Gentleman's assumptions but on the use of grant-related expenditure as one of the two crucial tests before authorities are designated under the Act. Grant-related expenditure assessments have been rejected as an objective test by all local authority associations. None of them, including associations under Conservative political control, accepts that test. Yet ministerial decisions are based on dubious calculations and outdated information. In a report published in 1984 entitled "The Impact on Local Authorities' Economy, Efficiency and Effectiveness of the Block Grant Distribution System" the Audit Commission said:

"The existence of so many unresolved questions after four years experience of operating the Block Grant system also casts doubt upon the use of GREs for any purpose other than grant distribution. And it is evident that complexity has not, so far, produced a general perception of equity."

The report went on:

"Unfortunately, the information used to calculate both the needs for local authority services and the availability of local resources is open to serious question."

That is the independent and considered view of the Audit Commission about one of the two principal tests on which the Secretary of State has based his decision to impose this order on the four authorities.

The order will place huge strains on the budgets of the authorities affected. There will be expenditure cuts for Merseyside of more than £44 million, for south Yorkshire of almost £28 million, for the Greater London council of almost £75 million and for the Inner London education authority of £57 million. I have received a copy of the letter sent to the Secretary of State today by the leader of ILEA, Frances Morrell, who leaves him in no doubt that there are serious questions to be asked about even the right hon. Gentleman's new limit for that authority and the limit's impact on the quality and scope of education in London.

All these cuts are made on the basis of the decision of the Secretary of State which, in turn, rests on a shambles of incoherent and failing Government policies. The arguments for the order are false and racked with contradictions. The performance of Ministers in dealing with local council policy is incompetent, dishonest and deplorable. The House should reject the Government's case.

Sir John Osborn (Sheffield, Hallam): I assure the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) that rates are driving businesses out of Sheffield and have been a perpetual cause of increasing unemployment. If the hon. Gentleman thinks differently, I assure him that many industrial leaders deplore the fact that I, as the only Conservative Member of Parliament in the region, have not been able to stop this drain and to persuade my hon. Friends to do something about it before today.

Dr. Cunningham: Given the hon. Gentleman's long experience in the industry, he must know, as I know from my association with the industry, that the devastation of the steel industry as a result of the Government's policies has been the principal factor that has driven business from Sheffield.

Sir John Osborn: I shall now revert to the debate. If the hon. Gentleman would like me to talk about steel, I shall. I am afraid that if I do, not many hon. Members would have much chance of dealing with the subject of the debate. I shall therefore refrain from talking about steel.

The order arises from the Rates Act 1984. The order is, in fact, the Act put into practice, and that is happening none too soon for householders and those who run industries, commerce and businesses in the city and south Yorkshire. Today's debate covers familiar ground.

Ms. Harriet Harman (Peckham): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir John Osborn: The hon. Lady should bear in mind the fact that if I am interrupted, I shall spend between 15 and 20 minutes on my feet and may prevent other hon. Members from speaking. I give way.

Ms. Harman: On the point about commercial rates, is it not the case that the link between unemployment rising and rates has not been proven? Does the hon. Gentleman not recognise that in low rate areas the rents on those commercial properties increase and, therefore, at the end of the day the amount spent on rents or rates is about the same. The money going into rates is at least ploughed back into the local community for services and jobs. When the money goes in increased business rents, it goes goodness knows where and therefore is not ploughed back in. Does the hon. Gentleman not accept that his argument about unemployment and rates is totally spurious?

Sir John Osborn: The hon. Lady should let me continue with my speech.

As the hon. Member for Copeland knows, the last Labour Government were concerned about the level of spending in south Yorkshire and Sheffield before 1979. I attended many meetings involving local councillors who were worried about what would happen under a Labour Secretary of State for the Environment. Since 1979, this Government have tried hard to control the increase in local authority expenditure grants. The targets and penalties have been designed to encourage moderation, and many authorities have co-operated.

We are dealing with those authorities that have resisted. For those few authorities encouragement has had to become compulsion. Those councils, and south Yorkshire especially, have only themselves to blame. They have tried to portray my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in an uncompromising light by saying that they have not had sufficient time to make their case. The hon. Member for Copeland made that point. What rubbish! The high-spending councils have had too long to make their case. They have been making their case since 1979. The Government have a clear mandate to control the level of public spending. Local authority expenditure is about £33 billion, or a quarter of all public spending. Local authorities employ roughly one tenth of the total work force. It is daft to think that local authority spending is exempt. The hon. Member for Copeland, councillors and others think that their mandate has been invalidated by the control from Government that the order provides. Those arguments are based on the claims of local democracy.

There we move to the heart of the matter which was mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester,

East (Mr. Bruinvels)—the link between the ballot box and the rating system has worn thin. Of every £1 spent by local councils on local services, less than 25p in the £1 is provided by householders. Slightly more than 25p comes from businesses and other non-domestic ratepayers and about half comes from taxpayers. That means that, in a city such as Sheffield, one out of every two households, or roughly one in four of those entitled to vote, pay full rates. Those who pay do not vote while those who vote do not pay. That is taxation without representations. What sort of a mandate is that?

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: It is not a mandate.

Sir John Osborn: Quite right, it is not a mandate. In previous debates I have said that I should prefer some form of rate reform, but consensus on that has not been possible. Something must be done now, and I therefore welcome the present measure.

In the Daily Telegraph last week Anthony Lejeune said:

"The weakest point in the moral armour of modern democracy is that citizens can vote money for themselves out of the pockets of other citizens and are encouraged by politicians to do so. The most notorious current example is the unscrupulous use of the rating system by Left-wing local authorities."

At last something is being done to limit the damage that they cause.

Sheffield has suffered harshly in recent years at the hands of the city council and the South Yorkshire county council. Domestic rates in Sheffield have risen by 245 per cent. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment said that rates have risen by 132 per cent. in Yorkshire over the past six years. District and county councils have recklessly, deliberately and profligately ignored every request to limit their spending. Commerce and industry must welcome the introduction of rate-capping. They have seen the disastrous effects at first hand, and a survey by Sheffield chamber of commerce shows that 48 per cent. of the firms that cut their work force during the previous two years laid part of the blame on rates.

Sheffield has a tradition of heavy industry, and the rate burden is exceptionally heavy. The result is viciously circular. As businesses close, residents leave to avoid the high rates, and the declining rate base hits those left behind even harder.

It is no good pretending that those are not the effects of high rates. They are, and it would be an irresponsible Government who did nothing about it. Predictably, authorities designated to have their rates limited have produced scare stories of how that will decimate local services, and I referred to education earlier this afternoon. What an admission of poor management. South Yorkshire has been set a limit that requires the council to absorb the cost of inflation in next year's budget. Many a company in south Yorkshire and elsewhere would have been happy with such moderate cutting proposals during the recent recession, and I speak with some personal experience of the matter.

South Yorkshire will still be left to spend large sums of money—£178 million. In south Yorkshire the local authorities have spending targets which I calculate amount to £660 million for 1985-86. That is over £500 per head of population. That is solely local authority spending. It is rubbish to claim that such sums will result in the destruction of services and the neglect of statutory duties. If my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State or the Minister for Local Government disagree with my figures, I hope that they will put the record straight. Last year, south Yorkshire county council spent over £90 million subsidising transport and recouped a bare £20 million in income as the Secretary of State said.

Is it unrealistic to suggest that there is room for improvement there? Spending on transport revenue support in south Yorkshire amounts to more than £45 per head. That is almost double the average for metropolitan counties. The total cost per head for the provision of all services is about £158 while the class average is £20 per head less. Even after rate capping the council will have plenty to spend.

As is widely acknowledged, the rating system is far from perfect and a review of all local authorities, finance is welcome. Today's measures are regrettably necessary. They will make the system a great deal less imperfect.

The Labour-controlled Sheffield city council and South Yorkshire county council have briefed Members of Parliament of all parties about their position. When Socialist councillors have been present at those meetings — the House must bear in mind that I am the only Conservative Member of Parliament at these meetings— they have interpreted the briefings as advocating that public expenditure, in itself, must be good.

As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has said, local authorities have spent money on nuclear-free zones and funds to striking miners. How can we be sure that they have gone to the families rather than to the pickets? They have financed CND conferences, and an anti-apartheid headquarters. They have politically appointed staff in town and county halls. These matters also involve Sheffield district council because it is a collecting agency.

My right hon. Friend's statement about an inquiry on abuse must be welcome. The reference to industry and commerce not backing the Government must relate to the rate support grant. I have a copy of a letter sent to my right hon. Friend from the Sheffield chamber of commerce. South Yorkshire and Sheffield have special problems related mainly to regional development. The level of GRE needed to cover a population that is aging because the young are moving out is a problem, but industry and commerce must work closely with county hall and the town hall. It is part of the process of living with local government as they find it. They must eliminate retribution if possible but above all they must attempt to make bad local government for industry and commerce better.

The Sheffield chamber of commerce—I have been a member of the council for some 30 years—does not want a militant confrontation involving county hall, town hall and the Government. That is why I should back it in seeking any negotiations with councillors.

Since the April tragedy at county hall in Barnsley many of the councillors, including the chairman of the police committee, George Moores, have been sponsored or closely connected with mining and the mining communities and objectivity has been lacking during the miners' dispute. They must surely have learnt that violence begets violence. The tragedy of the coal strike illustrates that.

I hope that moderation and common sense will prevail in relations between Government and local government. I appeal to South Yorkshire county councillors and the district councillors to act sensibly and work with the Government rather than to continue to show defiance that they have shown for the past 10 years.

My right hon. Friend referred to the Blunkett letter. I have seen press releases suggesting that as leader of the Sheffield city council he may think differently from what I have hoped. I hope that the permanent officials and the councillors will accept the guidelines laid down by my right hon. Friend. I know that Conservative councillors on the county and district councils in south Yorkshire, including their leaders, County Councillor Irvine Patnick and Sheffield councillor David Heslop gave my right hon. Friends their full backing. They have advised me that, if anything, the measures come too late; they cannot come too soon. My right hon. Friend has the support of Conservatives in the area I represent.

7.9 pm

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): When I hear Ministers speak from the Conservative Front Bench it increasingly reminds me of when I first became a city councillor in Liverpool, and was put on the children"s committee. At that time, the council was run by the Conservative party, and the lady who became our chairperson was opposed to central heating in the children's homes on the grounds that it was not good for them. Also, we decided to get some bicycles for the children, and we actually got that through. Then the lady said, "But don't forget that they must be second hand."

That is the penny-pinching, miserable attitude that the Conservatives have towards local government, but at least at that time we had the opportunity of determining how much we spent. We had the opportunity of explaining to the general public at the election what had happened and why they should get rid of Conservatives and put Labour people on the council. The local people took the decision. They had the right to decide. However, with this Government that right is, slowly but surely, stage by stage, being taken away from the people. We have the rate-capping procedures as well as the forthcoming abolition of all the metropolitan authorities, only because they are Labour authorities doing a good job for the people they represent.

The Secretary of State made great play of the extravagant overspending by the Merseyside county authority. He said that one of the dreadful things that it was doing was supporting what was called the "resident author" and giving money for a record against the police. He hinted that a certain amount of money had gone to support the miners. With regard to the police, one person who was constantly opposed to what the police were doing on Merseyside was Sir Kenneth Thompson, the old Conservative leader of the council. I read more letters in the local papers complaining about the authoritarian development of the police written by Sir Kenneth Thompson, than I have ever seen from any Labour man in my life. That was interesting. Even if a few bob is going towards a record, it could not possibly be in the same category as the opposition to what was happening in the police from Sir Kenneth Thompson.

The amount of money that might go into those peripheral things is very small. They are the things that Ministers pick out, use and exaggerate. No doubt there were Tories on the Nottingham city council who, many years ago, opposed a grant for Torvill and Dean, yet because of that grant they become gold medallists in ice skating. Time after time we can give examples of such grants having been tremendously helpful to individuals and the nation, but Conservative Members would never understand that.

I should like to mention some of the problems that have arisen, for example on rate support grant. I have a table showing the changes in rate support grant for the Merseyside council over the past decade. In 1975-76, the Government grant was 66·5 per cent., and the ratepayers' contribution was 33·5 per cent.; in 1980-81 the Government grant was 61 per cent. and the ratepayers' contribution 39 per cent.; in 1984-85, the Government grant was 51·9 per cent. and the ratepayers' contribution 48·1 per cent.; and in 1985-86 the Government grant is 48·7 per cent. and the ratepayers' contribution 51·3 per cent. That is the truth about what is happening. When the Government talk about rates going up, they do not explain that they have gone up because the Government grant—the rate support grant—has gone down. Therefore, the local authorities have been faced with the prospect of cutting their services or giving the people a decent service and having to put the rates up. Then they are called extravagant overspenders. These are the wicked people——

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heffer: I shall not give way. I shall speak for only 10 minutes because many hon. Members want to participate——

Mr. Bruinvels: But the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mr. Parry) has gone to sleep.

Mr. Heffer: Even if my hon. Friend has gone to sleep, his contribution to the debate will be much greater than the hon. Gentleman's.

I should like to bring out what is really happening and the effect of the Government's proposals on Merseyside. I understand that the maximum precept that the county can raise is £219 million. The council's estimate for maintaining existing services is £242 million. Therefore, there is a gap of £23 million. The county council believes that the Government have got the figures wrong. I shall not argue at length because these are technical arguments, and hon. Friends who are members of the county council can argue that case better then I can. However, on the basis of the present situation, with the Government's decision and the £23 million gap, it is important to understand what would happen to vital and important services on Merseyside.

First, the county authority would need to reduce the amount available for the police by £5 million. In real terms, because of the financial relationship with the Department of the Environment, that amount would be £10 million. That could mean at least 700 to 800 policemen and women not receiving any payment. In the area crime is rising, drug usage is on the increase. A recent survey that we quoted in the House last week shows that policing in poorer areas is worse than it is in better-off areas, and the poor are getting a raw deal from the police service on Merseyside. The police are overstretched. More foot patrols are needed. It is absolutely absurd that the concil should be faced with that position.

Expenditure on the fire services would have to be reduced by £2·5 million. Expenditure on road maintenance would go down by £4 million. Anyone who goes around Merseyside now knows that the roads have deteriorated terribly over the past few years. They are getting worse because even now the money is not there as it should be. There would be a reduction of £1 million in expenditure on waste disposal.

The Secretary of State spoke at length about the passenger transport subsidy. There would be a reduction in that of £8 million.

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): So there should be.

Mr. Heffer: The hon. Gentleman, who represents Bebbington in Merseyside, is actually saying that the people of Merseyside should pay much higher fares than at present. He is saying, "Put the burden on the shoulders of those who can least afford it because they are the people who use the public transport." For my part, I believe that it is important that the ordinary people be given the opportunity of using public transport at a reasonable cost.

It is estimated that if the £23 million reduction were achieved it could lead to about 3,000 redundancies among the personnel of Merseyside council, and that is in an area with one of the highest levels of unemployment in Britain.

I do not know whether Conservative Members ever go beyond Watford. One or two may, but those who do not should go to areas such as Merseyside. I can tell the House why we do not have the problem of a Tory Member of Parliament. Unfortunately, Sheffield still does, but Liverpool does not. We have a semi-Tory in the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton), who is not present at the moment, but we have no Tories because Liverpool has suffered under the Tory party over the years and it is fed up with them.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels rose——

Mr. Heffer: I shall not give way and I have explained why.

The Secretary of State is right to say that the Merseyside council can increase the precept by 27 per cent. Nobody argues with that. But if it does, I am told by the county authorities that it would lose about £29 million from Government sources. That would mean a cut of £23 million for services over the period. It is in a catch 22 situation.

I hope that all hon. Members, including Conservative Members, who are concerned about local democracy and about stopping the trend towards increasingly centralised government, will come with us into the Lobby tonight and support my right hon. Friends on the Front Bench.

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): The alliance Members will be voting against the order tonight, not because we necessarily endorse the spending levels or priorities of the authorities named in the order, but because we are opposed to the principle of rate capping. We argue now, as we argued during the progress of the Rates Bill, that it is inappropriate for Parliament to set the rate or precept of an elected local authority. That is the job of the elected councillors. If Members of Parliament take unto themselves the responsibility for fixing rates, there is no point in continuing to have elected local councillors in our town and county halls.

Nor do I accept that civilisation as we know it will be threatened if some local authorities spend more than the Government believe to be appropriate. Some local authorities have always spent more than the average and some have come to grief with their electors at the subsequent election. The level of rate that is charged by a local authority to its ratepayers is a matter between itself and the local ratepayers. If they do not like it, they will react through the ballot box in the traditional way.

It may well be that some Conservative Members will say that the current system of local government finance is not sufficiently accountable. There is some strength in that argument, but the response should be to make the system more accountable rather than to create some big brother in Westminster and Whitehall to lean over the shoulders of councillors and to second-guess their decisions.

Nor is it true, as was argued during the passage of the Rates Bill, that capping the high-spending authorities will automatically release resources for the traditional low-spending counties and other authorities which have stuck to the Government guidelines. If one doubted that, one has only to consider those cries of pain and bewilderment from representatives of the shire counties during the recent debate on the rate support grant. That underlines the fact that the low spenders in the shires continue to be held to low spending, despite the introduction of rate capping.

The second ground on which we shall oppose the order is that there are doubts about the basis of the precept limits in the order. For example, the original maximum precept allowed for ILEA in December 1984 was 74·19p and £44 million was to be taken from the ILEA reserves. The order raises the maximum precept to 77·25p and only £9 million is to be taken from reserves. The Secretary of State was good enough in his introduction to explain some of the reasons for that alteration, but we still do not have any disclosure of the assumptions surrounding the £9 million to be taken from the ILEA reserves. The same is true in relation to the GLC where £71 million is assumed to be available in its reserves for current spending. Again, there is no supporting evidence for that decision.

It is not good enough for the Secretary of State to tell the House that that sort of issue is between himself as Secretary of State and the councils concerned. The House is being asked to approve the maximum precepts in the order. We are being asked to make a judgment. I cannot understand how we can be expected to make a judgment without the available evidence being given to us of the sort of assumptions which the Secretary of State has made in relation to those reserves. We are being offered a straight take-it-or-leave-it decision. We are being asked to rubber-stamp the figures in the order. That brings the House into disrepute and it bears out the predictions and forecasts that some of us made in Committee on the Rates Bill.

Against that background, it is sad and regrettable that the designated authorities have not strenuously and vigorously argued their needs to the Secretary of State. I am not suggesting that they should have sought formal redetermination. I understand the risks that are involved in that course. But they should have taken the opportunity to argue their case with the Secretary of State and to demonstrate the flaws in the figures which he has put forward. That is a matter of regret because they have let down the people that they represent in not taking that opportunity.

One of the sad things about the whole business is the sense in which both sides — Ministers and local councillors—seem to be more concerned with scoring points off each other and legally wrong-footing each other than about the future of the services which are under discussion. It is a case not just of extracting the maximum political gain but of safeguarding services which are vital to a great many people that we represent.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): Does my hon. Friend agree that cities such as Liverpool are being turned into "Confrontation Streets" with the longest-running soap operas and farces in local government? People are being used as pawns in a power game that is being played out over their heads. That means that in the long term ratepayers will be disadvantaged. It is sad that the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) is not present to hear that point.

Mr. Cartwright: It would be unwise to involve myself too far in the internal politics of Liverpool. They are obviously dangerous politics and certainly bitter. I shall only say that the threat to refuse to levy a precept on the part of the authorities concerned is a threat to gamble with other people's jobs and services. That is a dangerous thing to do. If the gamble fails, many people will be without a job and will not have the vital services on which they depend. The money at some point or other will simply run out if no precept is levied.

One of the most worrying aspects about the way in which the rate-capping operation is being conducted is the fact that all rate-capped authorities will face the damaging impact of sudden cuts. For example, ILEA is being asked to cut about £66 million off its budget. If that cut were phased over a period, it might be possible so to organise it that damage to top priority services was limited. Instead, cuts will have to be made suddenly, in a hurry, and there will be no opportunity to look across the various spending areas and to try to protect the high priority services. When cuts have to be made in a hurry, they fall on whatever can be cut at speed, irrespective of priority. An education authority is likely to make cuts in books and equipment, not to fill staff vacancies wherever they occur, and to cut discretionary student awards.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman claims that those are the results of the way in which rate capping is being run. Does he not agree that ILEA has known its expenditure limits since last July? If it had taken a realistic view of the outcome of the ensuing process, it could perfectly well have made its dispositions months before it had to draw up a budget. We are not asking for a substantial cut in its present level of spending. The difficulties described by the hon. Gentleman are to be laid fairly and squarely at the door of the present majority party on ILEA.

Mr. Cartwright: The authorities concerned should certainly have argued their case with the Government. I would certainly take issue with those authorities which, far from trying to take account of reality, have simply planned to jack up their expenditure higher still. That will make the impact even greater, the cuts will have to be even sharper and the brakes will have to be slammed on at the last minute. I believe, however, that suddenly imposed cuts are inefficient, wasteful and harmful to the services.

There is another risk of chaos and of a dangerous impact on the services. It will arise if the precepting authorities accept the maximum precept, and levy a precept on that basis, but are then unable or unwilling to face the necessity for the consequent spending cuts. Some authorities simply will not face that necessity. Others may not be able to do so, because of the political realities of the council chamber. There will then be a risk that spending commitments will not be reduced to meet the resources available. At some point during the year the money will run out and there will be chaos. The Secretary of State has not yet faced that risk. I am interested to hear how he believes that those who are dependent on local authority services can be protected against it.

A question mark now hangs over the edifice of local government finance erected in the past four years—the complex bureaucratic business of grant-related expenditure, targets, penalties, holdback, clawback and, finally, rate capping. As the Audit Commission pointed out, the complex paraphernalia does not save money. Indeed, there is evidence that it wastes money. The Cambridge university report makes it clear that the Government's aim of reducing rates does not have the impact on employment that they have claimed. The complex operations—the bureaucratic spider's web of controls on democratic local authorities—are not delivering the goods. The sooner we get rid of this complex, ramshackle and wasteful system, the better for local government.

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): I am delighted to follow the reasonable gentleman from the Social Democratic party, the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright). The order shows that, unfortunately, reasonable people do not necessarily exist in all the local authorities. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) has vacated his place after making a gesture by attending part of the debate. I have the advantage of having been here at the beginning, having listened to most of it and having remained awake for most of it, despite occasional temptations to the contrary.

The purpose of the debate depresses me. Such a discussion should be taking place in the town halls of Liverpool, Sheffield, Manchester, London and elsewhere. I have always advocated the existence of autonomous local authorities, rightly and proudly independent of whatever party happens to occupy Westminster. Unfortunately, that desire has not yet come to fruition. When I hear the hon. Member for Walton talking about local democracy, I wonder whether he approves of the mandate system in Liverpool whereby Labour councillors are told to vote in a certain way regardless of the arguments. That is not democracy. If the right hon. Gentleman had stayed to listen to the debate he might have been able to clarify his view on the question whether such a practice is democratic.

Under the present method of local government finance the taxpayer, via central Government, has become the major contributor to the expenditure of local authorities. There is an unarguable case for saying, therefore, that central Government should have a not inconsiderable voice in deciding how much local authorities can spend. In happier days I was the chairman of a local authority committee with considerable spending power. Central Government's voice—as it happens, it was a Labour Government — was exercised by persuasion and suggestion, and in the end common sense prevailed. Ultimately, the local authority accepted the right and indeed the duty of Government to deal with the interests of their overall economic strategy — in which local authority spending plays such a large part—and of the taxpayer. It never entered my mind to question the right and duty of central Government. Over the past few years, the accepted practice has been challenged. That has happened—I hate to say this—not so much for financial as for political reasons. The Act behind the order has become a disagreeable necessity. No Conservative — certainly no Conservative with a local authority background — would have wished that to happen. However, the measures have become clearly necessary and they have my support. No Government of any colour would welcome such a turn of events, but all Governments have a clear duty to ensure that their calculation of a proper total of local authority spending is adhered to.

The authorities with which we are dealing have chosen, first, to ignore their clear constitutional relationship with central Government and, secondly, to spend ratepayers' and taxpayers' money with the gay abandon of the financial alcoholic. None could be worse than the peculiar Socialists who control in their own fairyland the finances of the soon-to-depart, wholly unlamented, Merseyside county council.

The pronouncements of the Merseyside county council are less overtly dramatic than those of the GLC and the London boroughs who continue to astonish the nation. However, they are no less dangerous for that. The principal reason for the high level of spending by the Merseyside county council, which some Opposition Members consider to be a matter for great pride, is the revenue support for bus and rail services. There is an argument for subsidising those activities, but in 1984-85 the council spent £44 per head of population on support for buses and trains, over and above what it paid for free travel for pensioners. Expenditure on those services was 80 per cent. above the average of the metropolitan counties. The council has adopted a policy of taxing the ratepayers, many of whom — including many of my own constituents — are not at all well off, in order to subsidise the users of public transport, who may or may not be well off, and also to provide plenty of jobs for members of the Transport and General Workers Union. In that year, the council also spent £80,000 on propaganda which will, it hopes, prevent its abolition.

Those of us who live on Merseyside have seen the extravagant posters that show the fire service going down a plughole invented by the Government, the police going down a plughole invented by the Government, everything going down a plughole invented by the Government. It is utter nonsense.

Mr. Wareing: There are 50,000 unemployed.

Mr. Porter: That is not the point. I have mentioned the subsidies given to transport and I listened to the figures that the hon. Member for Walton gave. Even he must realise that there can be counter-balancing operations within a legal precept for Merseyside county council which would enable services to be provided at a reasonable cost without local people noticing that there had been any change. I am inspired by the people of Merseyside who treat the publicity campaign of the council with a proper and studied indifference.

Mr. Alton: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that perhaps most disreputable of all is the implication that has been given to pensioners on Merseyside that, as a result of abolition of that council, they will lose their bus passes? Does he agree that that has caused considerable distress and disquiet?

Mr. Porter: I am obliged to the hon. Gentleman for that reminder. That is fairly typical of the publicity being promoted by the hon. Member for Walton and his friends. It is utterly untrue. Such issues will be a matter for the district councils to deal with when they succeed the county council. Whatever the rights and wrongs of the activities of the county council, how can it be right to spend nearly £1 million on such publicity material? The money should be spent on things that are of much more use to the people whom the council purports to represent.

People who live in the Merseyside county council area will welcome the order, as will Wirral district council. We would also welcome a decision from the Government about the methods of finance for local authorities to make those that spend accountable to local opinion and voting power. I heartily support the order and I hope that it will be only an interim step in progress towards a new and highly desirable local democratic system. In the meantime, I am happy to support the Government putting some form of straitjacket around the politically and financially mentally disturbed who, at present, are a burden on my constituents.

Mr. Bill Michie (Sheffield, Heeley): I have listened to the whole of the debate and to the exchanges on the statement that preceded it. I am worried that, because of the three-hour limit on the debate, some of my right hon. and hon. Friends will not have an opportunity to put the case for their areas.

I should like to dissociate myself from what the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Sir J. Osborn) said. He makes his own minority speech and often gets the facts wrong because he is still not aware of what is happening in areas such as Sheffield and south Yorkshire. Unlike me, he has never been on the city council. I have been a member for 15 years and remain one. However, I admit that he has experience of the steel industry, as he was a manager for many years. That company was running down long before the rates issue was thought of.

South Yorkshire county council and Sheffield city council have suffered drastically because of the reduction in grants and because of penalties in the past few years. Such reductions affect everything and even run contrary to many of the projects which the Government have encouraged. Sheffield city council is one of the 23 programme areas and we have six partnership authorities where deprivation is considered to be especially severe. All those authorities get annual allocations of money from the Department of the Environment to fund schemes that have an impact on conditions in their inner areas. The House is probably aware that 75 per cent. of the allocation is met by the Government and the remaining 25 per cent. must be picked up by the local authorities.

The problem is that, because grant has not increased in the past few years, the council is penalised on the 25 per cent. that it must pay. If Sheffield had taken more of the grant from the Government, it would be outside the trap. It is being penalised only because it has used less grant. The same is true of south Yorkshire. It is a pity that the hon. Member for Hallam is not here as he is a member of the chamber of commerce in Sheffield and I should like to quote a letter that it wrote. It said:

"It is a matter of continuing concern that expenditure both on the Urban Programme itself and on 'time expired' projects are subject to Block Grant penalties. This appears to us inconsistent with the Government's objectives in promoting the Urban Programme, and we shall again be making representation to the Government to try to have this anomaly ended."

That is not the comment of a rabid Left-wing organisation, but it recognises the discrepancies.

For the county council, the block grant system, complete with expenditure targets and grant penalties, was introduced in 1981-82. In each year since then, the council's block grant entitlement has been cut. The proportion of the council's spending which is supported by the Government has fallen from 58·8 per cent. in 1980-81 —the year when the new system was introduced—to 48·7 per cent. in 1985-86. That represents a reduction of £56 million in the council grant and means an extra 13p on the rate precept for 1985-86. That burden must be carried by the ratepayers, the very people whom the Government claim to be helping.

Opposition Members are proud of and will defend the services provided by local authority work forces. Too much is said about local authorities featherbedding their staff. I have much experience in these matters and believe that the work force does a tremendous job under enormous strain. We defend their right to give their best. We will defend the right of plumbers and joiners to get on with the job instead of having to look over their shoulders to see whether their job will be there at the end of the year. We will defend social workers who should be looking to their clients rather than looking over their shoulders to see whether an old folks' home that they are trying to get somebody in is about to be closed. Teachers should be concentrating on their classes and not worrying about whether expenditure is being cut so much that they must buy their own chalk and their pupils' parents must buy books — one of the recommendations of the hon. Member for Hallam. He said that in five or 10 years' time parents and kids will have to pay for their own books, such is his affection for the bad old days. He got his come-uppance from his supporters in Hallam on that.

I must correct my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) who said that bus fares were subsidised to help poor people. In south Yorkshire, poor and rich people use the bus service and defend the council's policy of subsidising it. They do not regard the council as extravagant but as providing a service that is worth maintaining. It protects the environment and the value of land that can be used for other developments. It is nonsense to suggest that the rich are subsidising the poor. The subsidy is enjoyed and supported by all. It is value for money.

I should like to conclude by quoting not a political party but John Banham, the head of the Audit Commission for local authorities in England and Wales. He said that Sheffield was one of the best-run authorities in the country in terms of providing value for money. He continued:

"There is no question that there is a great deal that other cities have to learn from this place."

He felt so strongly about this point that at a press conference—not behind doors or in any attempt to hide it—he said:

". . . poor distribution of rate support grant meant that industrial northern cities like Sheffield were not getting the contribution from central government that they needed."

The argument is not about whether there should be efficiency drives in local government. I just wish that we had one in central government—that would be a turn-up for the book. We are arguing about the rights of duly elected local authorities to run their cities in the way in which their citizens want them to be run. We are arguing that unless they are given that right, and unless a proper assessment is made of their real needs—that has never been forthcoming from the Government — there will always be problems, the ratepayers will suffer and those in need will suffer even more.

Mr. Guy Barnett (Greenwich): In opening the debate, the Secretary of State claimed that the order that he was placing before the House was designed to protect the ratepayer. I do not propose to dilate on that for long. It is arguable that that is his main responsibility, particularly when central Government expenditure under this Government is very much open to criticism. Perhaps he should look at his own housekeeping rather than interfere in the housekeeping of local authorities that are also directly elected. If he considers that it is his responsibility to protect the ratepayer, as he clearly does, he has another responsibility that he must take on board and which he never admitted in his speech.

I wish to speak on behalf of the Inner London education authority. In that connection, the Secretary of State never mentioned the responsibility that he must take on board, if he believes that it is his responsibility to protect the ratepayer, to safeguard the education of the children of London. That responsibility he has not admitted in the House.

It is important for the House to recognise, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), the severe damage that the Government have done to the relationship between local and central Government. It is interesting to record that at the Conservative party local government conference in 1979 the Prime Minister said:

"Good Government rests on a partnership between Whitehall and Town Hall."

I agree with her. I believe that that is something for which the last Labour Government were attempting to make provision. We worked hard to this end in the Department of the Environment, and I am proud of the relationship that existed between local and central Government. One reason for its success was that in those days the system of multiple regression analysis admitted in the way in which the grant was determined that local government had an authority as well as central Government.

Relationships between local and central Government will always be difficult or in need of careful co-operation, as the Prime Minister remarked in her speech in 1979. It will be difficult, for two reasons. The first is that local and central Government are both directly elected. The second —and this is the important point—is that they both have an authority. Central Government have a general responsibility for the economic policy of the country, but local authorities are responsible for running services.

The only body in inner London that has a responsibility for running education is the Inner London education authority. It is charged by law to do that job and to determine the education needs of London.

My impression in listening to the Secretary of State and to some of the remarks that emanate from the Department of Education and Science is that they do not know or understand the problems with which ILEA has to cope. The grant-related expenditure system that the Government have invented to decide how much local authorities should be allowed to spend does not take account of the factors in inner London which, by any standard, must greatly increase the cost of running education in inner London.

For example, there are no fewer than 147 mother tongues in inner London. That can be described both as a problem for ILEA—and it is a considerable one—and as a great opportunity. If the children in London with their many different backgrounds and languages are educated in their mother tongue and in English, in years to come this might grant to London an enormous advantage. It could be an international city with a considerable proportion of its citizens genuinely billingual. No account is taken of this in the Government's assessment of expenditure.

No account is taken of the fact that London has many old school buildings. Half of London's secondary schools are old buildings which are expensive to heat and to maintain. There are also higher land and building costs of one kind and another. The population density in inner London is another factor that is ignored in the grant-related expenditure assessment. In addition, there are many children in inner London whose parents are on supplementary benefit. Those examples demonstrate the extra costs that are borne by ILEA.

Unless the Government understand the factors that contribute to the relatively high budget that is necessary in inner London, they will be capable of doing serious damage to education in inner London.

There is a good deal of evidence of the cumulative effect of multiple deprivation. Bearing in mind—and this is based on the figures of the Department of the Environment—that seven out of the 10 most deprived local authorities in the country are in inner London, one realises the serious problems faced by ILEA. In some recent research, an examination of the children in schools as opposed to the population of all age groups demonstrated the high measure of deprivation. A single-purpose authority like ILEA is therefore coping with probably greater problems than even it may recognise.

These factors must be taken into account. The Government are going down a dangerous road. If they attempt to impose a rate cap or precept cap on ILEA, they could do immense damage to education in inner London because of their relative measure of ignorance of the extent of the problems with which ILEA has to cope.

Mr. Dobson: Would my hon. Friend agree that it is somewhat ironic, following the publication of the Hargreaves report, which was sponsored by ILEA and commended by the Secretary of State for Education and Science, that the Secretary of State for the Environment should now be making sure that ILEA will not have the resources to implement the report to improve standards in secondary schools in inner London?

Mr. Barnett: I agree with my hon. Friend. I welcome the Secretary of State's reaction to that report. It is one of many examples, including Her Majesty's inspector's report, showing the high regard in which ILEA is held by officials in the Department of Education and Science, although it is charged with extravagance and every possible sin by the Department of the Environment.

For those reasons, I believe that the Government's proposal today is dangerous and irresponsible. I deeply regret the steps being taken and the collapse in relationships between central and local government that has characterised the Government's period of office.

7.59 pm

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): I agree very much with the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Barnett) about the change in relationships between central and local government. When I was first elected a councillor in the London borough of Brent 22 years ago I could make an appointment with the town clerk and see him within two or three days if he was free. Every member of the council, irrespective of political persuasion, sought to carry out his duties with a dignity that no longer exists. In those circumstances, it is inevitable that there has been a breakdown in relationships, and it is very much a political breakdown. The Labour party is pleased that it has succeeded and that the relationships that previously existed have broken down. I speak from more than 20 years' experience in many local authorities, having served on a London borough council for 10 years, led a district authority in the south and later served on a shire authority. I now represent an area in the north-east with Labour-controlled county and district authorities. I can thus see very clearly the differences in attitude and in the way in which local government is conducted.

In the north of England rates are comparatively higher than in the south, with the result that job opportunities are far greater in the home counties than in the north-east. The Opposition have argued that there is no correlation between rates and jobs, but the Teesside Small Business Club——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not tempt the House to go beyond the terms of the order, which relates to the Merseyside and South Yorkshire metropolitan councils, the Greater London council and the Inner London education authority. A large number of hon. Members from those areas wish to speak on matters covered by the order.

Mr. Holt: I am fully aware of that, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My charge against the Government is that the order does not go far enough. The Cleveland business community wants to know why Cleveland has not been rate-capped and included in the order. [HON. MEMBERS: "Wait till next year."] By next year the Conservatives will have taken control of Cleveland. Only this week they put forward a very sensible amendment to the budget to reduce the rate increase from £2·10 to £1·80. That kind of change——

Mr. Dobson: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Surely the hon. Gentleman is out of order in discussing rates in Cleveland and inviting rate capping for that authority. That is in no way germane to the matters under discussion. Numerous Opposition Members have left the Chamber because they see little prospect of getting into the debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is ingenious of the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) to try to argue that his authority should have been included in the order, but if that argument were accepted we should finish up discussing a very large number of authorities. I hope that hon.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker]

Members will confine their comments to matters covered by the order — the Merseyside and South Yorkshire metropolitan councils, the GLC and ILEA.

Mr. Holt: I accept that, as yet, there is nothing in the order about Cleveland, but the general tenor of the debate so far has concerned the relationship of central Government and local government per se. It therefore seems not unreasonable to draw upon practical examples from Cleveland——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With respect to the hon. Gentleman, those matters were fully discussed when we considered the Rates Bill of 1984. The hon. Gentleman's comments would have been most appropriate then, but I very much doubt whether they fit into the subject of today's debate.

Mr. Holt: With great respect, Mr. Deputy Speaker, the report in The Guardian to which the Opposition have referred was not confined to the four local authorities covered by the order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House is not discussing any newspaper report. It is discussing a statutory instrument — the draft Rate Limitation (Prescribed Maximum) (Precepts) Order 1985. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will address himself to that or resume his seat.

Mr. Holt: With great respect, Mr. Deputy Speaker, Mr. Speaker himself was here when the Opposition raised the subject of the relationship between jobs and rates and the report that appeared in The Guardian. I wish to counter the argument advanced before you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, took the Chair. The business community in Cleveland would have liked rate capping to apply in that area so that the imminent loss of jobs could be avoided. It would be wholly irresponsible of me not to speak on behalf of the Cleveland business community while the order is still before the House in case I manage to persuade my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government to consider rate-capping Cleveland. The House will be interested to hear of the situations that have arisen in that Socialist Utopia, but before going off on that I wish to show that the result of this year's rate increases in my county——

Mr. Straw: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I know that you wish the debate to range as widely as possible and you have been generous to my hon. Friends, but it is surely out of order to speak about the rates in Cleveland.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do not want the debate to range as widely as possible. I want it to be about the order before the House. I hope that the hon. Member for Langbaurgh will either address himself to the order or resume his seat and allow an hon. Member who intends to follow the rules of procedure to take part in the debate.

Mr. Holt: The Labour party is obviously frightened to hear what I have to say. I will talk about Brent instead. I hope that I shall not be ruled out of order if I talk about a local authority within the London area. May I have your ruling on that, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has not yet given me anything on which to rule. I assume that if he discusses Brent in the context of the order his comments will be in order, but I shall have to wait and hear what he has to say.

Mr. Holt: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Brent is very much affected by GLC actions. As a result of the change to Conservative control this year, Brent will not have a rate increase on top of the GLC precept——

Mr. Dobson: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The rates levied by the Brent authority, whether Tory, Labour or Bob's your uncle, are not the subject of the order before us today.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) is right. I hope that the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) will address himself to the order or give way and enable another hon. Member to speak.

Mr. Michie: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. To help the situation, should we not be kind and give the hon. Gentleman two minutes because he has obviously brought the wrong speech?

Mr. Holt: The ratepayers of Brent, whether they are precepted by the local authority or the GLC, will have to pay the rates. The sum that they will have to pay is less because they are now in a Conservative-controlled borough. The order, which rate-caps the GLC, will assist them, and businesses in the Brent area will be infinitely better off than under the previous authority. That change of political control is without any diminution of services although, I admit, there may be no contribution to the London Lesbian Line or the Women's Police Bus Co-operative. I regret that when the Labour and Liberal parties in Brent got together they produced a poster for a dance, which shows two men dancing together. Perhaps that is what the Labour and Liberal parties want to do with each other.

The order is the first step along what I hope will be a long line of sensible measures introduced by the Government, which will follow the example set in this order, which provides for four local authorities to be rate capped, and rightly so. I look forward to the day when I can speak properly about the fact that Cleveland authority should be rate-capped. However, I shall be denied that pleasure because it will go Conservative in May and as a result will not be rate-capped.

8.11 pm

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): The attack now being made on many metropolitan counties, including Merseyside county council, is not based on rational criteria. The Secretary of State's argument that ratepayers on Merseyside need protection is a new one for Secretaries of State for the Environment in this Government. The real reason why ratepayers in Merseyside have suffered during the past few years is because since 1981 the rate support grant to Merseyside county council has been reduced by £74 million. But the council has lost much more than that, because the Government introduced their mystical GRE assessment, which was condemned by the Audit Commission, which the Government appointed. The Government have made targets of a purely hypothetical kind, which have been set by civil servants in Marsham street, whose knowledge of the northern parts of our country, especially of Merseyside, must be extremely slight—about as minute as the Prime Minister's and the Chancellor of the Exchequer's knowledge of modern economics.

The result of those mythical assessments and hypothetical targets has been penalties to the tune of £76 million being imposed on Merseyside county council since 1981. Under successive Secretaries of State for the Environment since 1981 total grant loss has been £150 million — almost the average total annual budget of Merseyside. Incidentally, 1981 was the year when Labour became the majority party on the county council.

The Secretary of State said that Merseyside county council was spending heavily. Following the Toxteth riots in Liverpool in 1981, one of his predecessors, the present Secretary of State for Defence, addressed the Conservative party conference at Blackpool and pointed out that the problems that gave rise to the riots could be dealt with only by increased public expenditure. That is precisely what Merseyside county council has attempted to do. It has injected millions of pounds into the area to create jobs, and to save and generate small business enterprises.

As a Merseyside county councillor I do not apologise for spending more than £40 million in the years since the Labour party came to office to generate 8,000 new jobs in the local economy. I do not apologise for a penny that was spent in the take-up campaign to ensure that more money was injected into the economy by telling people what their social security rights were. I do not apologise for the campaign being conducted for better pay for the low paid. We should campaign for more money to be injected into the economy. The cost-effectiveness of our policies on Merseyside in creating small business enterprises has been far greater than the regional policy of successive Governments.

The precept for Merseyside for the current year is 65p in the pound. The gauleiters in Marsham street are telling the county council that it should impose 82·8p in the pound. As I pointed out, that is a 27 per cent. increase. The Secretary of State has not addressed himself to the fact that if the artificial target of £219 million, which he set, is adhered to by Merseyside county council, there will be a 10 per cent. cut in the budget. That budget covers only current developments, not new ones. It pays for what is, and not for what many people believe should be. The Secretary of State asks for a 10 per cent. cut but a 27 per cent. increase in the rate precept. Where then is the famous Tory argument about the need for value for money?

My hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) pointed out that 700 policemen may have to be dismissed to meet that cut. It is ironic that last year the Home Office approved £100 million expenditure by Merseyside police authority and was willing to provide the 50 per cent. grant to maintain and improve policing standards in an area which needs more adequate policing. But the Department of the Environment said, "We approve only £88 million. If you spend £100 million, which the Home Office has approved, and for which it will supply a grant, you will be £12 million overspent." To meet that overspend, it cost the county council an additional £18 million.

The hon. Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Porter), who is no longer present—he has probably returned to finish what he was doing before he strolled into the Chamber — was alarmed at the sums being spent on public transport. He read from the central office brief, which I have — it is not only Labour councillors who allow documents to go astray. The document says that ratepayers are being taxed heavily to subsidise the buses. What the document does not say is that after 1981—the policy was found to be correct in a case before the High Court when the county council was prosecuted by General Universal Stores — for the first time in more than 12 years, there was an increase in passenger usage of the buses on Merseyside. In the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mr. Parry) and in parts of my constituency, 75 per cent. of the population do not have the use of a private motor vehicle. Indeed, many are recipients of DHSS benefits.

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): Does my hon. Friend recall the way in which the large stores in the city reacted commendably when increased trade was brought about the greater mobility of people caused by the metropolitan county council adopting a "fares fair" policy?

Mr. Wareing: I am obliged to my hon. Friend for that intervention. The stores committee, which opposed our transport policy in 1981, is now our firmest ally on this issue, and it wants the cheap fares policy to continue.

Mr. Robert Parry (Liverpool, Riverside): Recently the stores committee made it clear that if there was a heavy increase in rates in Liverpool, many hundreds of jobs would disappear.

Mr. Wareing: That committee is learning the real reason why rates have increased. The blame lies at the door of the gauleiters in Marsham street, not at the door of the councillors of any party that has been in control in Liverpool. I would like to be a fly on the wall when the Secretary of State meets the Conservative group on Merseyside county council next Friday. I am sure that those councillors realise that, despite political differences —there are some politically sensitive areas in LIverpool — the order will not deal with the real problems of Merseyside. The Secretary of State should consider more disregards.

If the council cuts the fire service budget by 10 per cent., four fire stations on Merseyside will have to close. There is the possibility that 3,000 jobs will be lost in an area of great deprivation. There was a time when the Tory party chided the Labour party for believing that the man in Whitehall knew best. But we have gone full circle. Merseyside has many social needs, a great problem with drug abuse—Merseyside police have only eight officers in their drug abuse squad — a declining port industry, and more than 50,000 people who have been out of work for well over a year. Where do the civil servants in Marsham street put those factors when they are making their calculations? They are completely ignored.

The Government believe in public expenditure cuts, and that is the real exercise here. By 1986-87, local authorities will have a shortfall of £2·3 billion if they are to maintain their existing services. The Secretary of State should talk to his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence, who was Secretary of State for the Environment at the time of the Toxteth riots, and ask him how he gets money from the Cabinet. When the Trident programme was introduced, we were told that it would cost £4·3 billion, but last week, taking the exchange rate of June last year, we were told that the cost would be about £10 billion. Everyone knows that it will cost at least £12 billion. The Government can find money for Trident, but they cannot find money to deal with the social problems of the area that I represent. But the people of Merseyside will not work with a pistol at their heads. They will defy the Minister, and he will have to negotiate with them, as there will have to be negotiations to solve the problems of other areas.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): This rate-capping order is a further step towards centralised and authoritarian Government, and towards the destruction of local government democracy and accountability. Scarcely a week goes by without the House becoming more and more enmeshed in the day-to-day affairs of local government. At present, things are relatively easy for the Government, because they are merely setting up the machinery of control. The real problems will arise when that machinery is operated. In the not-too-distant future, hon. Members on both sides of the House will be so sick of being asked to decide about local government minutiae that there will be a major revolt against the Government.

The Government have clearly abandoned their previous promises to take Whitehall off the back of local government and to replace the domestic rating system. The Government and the Secretary of State stress the economic case for ever-increasing control over local authorities, but their real motivation is a political one, based on party political malice. Rate capping and the abolition of the GLC and the metropolitan county councils arise directly from the intolerant, bigoted and dictatorial attitude of the Prime Minister. To her, all opposition is anathema. To her —she said this in her Carlton house speech—there is no difference between Left-wing Labour councillors and international terrorists. That was an insult to all democratically elected local councillors.

The Prime Minister lives in a world of dangerous self-deception and increasing fanaticism. To her, everything is either right or wrong, and she is always right. To strengthen that self-deception, she surrounds herself with political eunuchs who lack principles, honesty and self-respect.

The Secretary of State talked about high spending in Labour-controlled London boroughs, but he should be honest enough to tell the House and the country that about £3,000 million has been removed from London's rate support grant between 1980-81 and 1985-86. The reduction from 60 per cent. to 48·7 per cent. in central Government support for local government since 1978-79 represents a massive switch from national taxation to local taxation. The Government are also using nationalised industries to charge artificially high prices to extract taxation from ordinary people.

Labour-controlled local authorities have tried to defend themselves against the legalised robbery of the withdrawal of rate support grant. But the Government say that those authorities are spendthrifts, and they talk about extravagance. My hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) hit the nail on the head when he mentioned Trident. Its cost has increased from an estimated £4,500 million in July 1980 to about £11,000 million in January 1985. What would the Secretary of State have said if a local authority had got its capital expenditure programme so wrong that it more than doubled during five years? His hon. Friends would have been jumping up and down blaming incompetent financial management in local government. The incompetent financial management is not there, but in central Government.

The Government say that the local government overspend of about £770 million imperils their economic strategy. That is a bit of a joke, because we do not believe that the Government have any economic strategy. That £770 million represents less than 1 per cent. of total public expenditure. If only the Government could get their central financial programmes accurate to less than 1 per cent. of a margin of error, they would have something on which to applaud themselves. However, they are wildly overspending in terms of their capital and revenue programmes. Then they have the cheek to turn around to Labour-controlled local authorities trying to defend themselves from central cuts and call them extravagant and spendthrift.

Overspend is a matter of opinion rather than an economic tool. The GLC, which has always been described by the Secretary of State as an overspender, found that, because of a sleight of hand in accounting, its target was increased by 63 per cent. from last year to this year. Therefore, at a stroke, a massive amount of so-called overspending was written off by the Government.

The Minister made another point that was echoed by Tory Members, which was that high rates destroy jobs, and Treasury Ministers regularly parrot that. The hacks of Fleet street in Tory rags such as The Sun, the Daily Mail and the Daily Express continue to write about it all the time, but the fact is that it is simply not true. The London Chamber of Commerce, for example, in a report that it produced in June 1983, found that rates ranked last of seven costs identified as important by London firms. It found that rates came after labour costs, payroll taxes, bank charges, other taxes, rents and transport.

As the Secretary of State knows, we have now seen a copy of the report commissioned by the Department of the Environment from the University of Cambridge. It is a most exhaustive report examining the correlation between rates and jobs. It examined every district in England and Wales, and found that there was no connection between rates and jobs.

Mr. Holt: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I realise that this puts you personally in a difficult position. However, earlier, when I was speaking on this point, your predecessor in the Chair, the Chairman of Ways and Means, ruled that I was out of order in seeking to refer to the report that the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) is now referring to. If it was out of order for me to do so, it must be out of order for him.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): The Chair is indivisible in these matters. It is important that we keep within the rules of order.

Mr. Banks: I could not agree more, Sir Paul.

However, the Government gave as their justification for their rate-capping order and the precept limitation order on ILEA and the GLC the impact of high rates, as they see it, on jobs. This report, commissioned by the Department of the Environment, shows that there is no such correlation. Therefore, the report should be made widely available to hon. Members. I want to hear the Secretary of State try to refute the large report that his Department commissioned, and that destroys one of the major points of the Government's case for rate-capping and this precept order.

The Government's policies are responsible for the gross overspending in the economy and for the destruction of jobs, and not the rates, town halls or county halls. It is about time that the Secretary of State got honest, and started to admit this fact to the House.

The GLC's expenditure limit is to be £785 million, with a precept limit of 36·52p. Will the Secretary of State provide the House with information on how he calculated that precept limit? As far as we can work out, either he or a bunch of his civil servants plucked it out of the air. They assumed GLC reserves of £71 million. Where did the Secretary of State get that figure? That is not a figure that the GLC can recognise. Speaking as a member of the GLC, I do not think that it has reserves like that. The Secretary of State then says that if we tell him what our reserves are he will tell us what he will do about it. The GLC members have said that, before they are prepared to have talks with the Secretary of State, he should tell us how he arrived at the figure of £71 million for the reserves. What does he define as reserves? The answer to that might give us a clue as to how he arrived at the figure.

I ask the Secretary of State to address himself in particular to the issue of non-uniform rates. The GLC's statutory responsibilities vary in different parts of London. For example, it is responsible for magistrates courts only in the outer London area. Accordingly, the precept varies and in practice there are five separate precepting areas within the Greater London area. The Secretary of State has provided no information on the way that the maximum precept of 36·52p in the pound is to be interpreted within the separate accounts of the council, which it is required by statute to maintain for each of the precepting areas.

In a letter of 14 January, the Department of the Environment expressed the view that it would be lawful to levy a precept in excess of the prescribed maximum in some precepting areas. The Rate Limitation (Non-Uniform Rates and Precepts Limits) Order 1985, laid before the House on 23 January, confirms this position. However, the GLC's provisional legal advice, provided by Roger Henderson, QC, suggests that no precept should exceed the maximum, and that the statutory instrument may be ultra vires. I hope that when he replies, the Minister for Local Government will tell us the position of the GLC and the application of non-uniform rates within the Greater London area.

What will happen if ILEA stays within its existing budget? Will the Secretary of State be taking over ILEA? These are the practicalities of the order. The Government are bogging themselves down in a morass of local government finance, and they will live to regret the day.

8.37 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I declare an interest, which I share with some other hon. Members, in that I pay rates to two of the four named authorities—ILEA and the GLC. As the Secretary of State reminded me earlier, under these orders, I stand to benefit personally. I shall have a third benefit if he goes ahead with rate capping for my borough, and Southwark is also prevented from levying the rate it would wish to. However, that does not change my view that rate capping is unprincipled and that redetermination of rate limits would have been the wrong way forward.

What we are witnessing tonight on these four authorities is the second part of a pincer movement. The first part was the reduction of their rate support grant. Having reduced what they received, the second part is reducing what they can require people to pay to them. The authorities are caught from both ends, and the money is not made up in other ways or by money from other sources. They will be short of money.

The Secretary of State knows that I do not hold any brief for the most substantial part of local government finance coming from the taxpayer. I do not believe that, just because the rate support grant was at 60 per cent., that should always be the level. Local government expenditure should, where it can be, be raised and spent locally.

Encapsulated in this order, however, is a tale of arbitrariness, full of assumptions, and of removing accountability. I criticise the arbitrariness, the assumptions and the removal of accountability.

The Secretary of State has never explained the arbitrariness of the choice of the 18 authorities, four precepting and 14 others, that he has chosen to be rate-capped. He has never explained why only those authorities with an expenditure of 4 per cent. above target, itself arbitrary, and 20 per cent. above GREAs, themselves arbitrary, should be the group chosen. There is an artificial cut-off point. We all know that, if he had altered the criteria slightly, more Tory authorities would have been included and there would have been another grouping based on an equally arbitrary basis.

One of the results of this arbitrariness affects ILEA in particular. Its budgetary year runs for 12 months from September. Although it will be rate-capped for the coming financial year, its funds are committed for the current academic year. Therefore, what is now a 6 per cent. cut becomes in reality a 10 per cent. cut for ILEA in the coming year.

There are also many assumptions that the Government can be shown to have got wrong. One is the Government's understanding of the effect of rates on businesses. In terms of the psychology of the business man, high rates do matter, but the reality is that they are not nearly so severe a penalty or imposition as the Government always claim. Another of the Government's assumptions, about waste and about the advantages of their system of financing, was disproved by the report of the Audit Commission last August. That report was much heralded but brushed under the carpet as soon as it came out with the wrong conclusions.

We need to know what assumptions are made about the reserves when the facts have not been made available. Southwark is proposed to be rate-capped. When we debate that proposal before long, will the Secretary of State assume that a reserve is available in Southwark which can be brought into his calculations? The Secretary of State's announcement in December did not make a specific assumption about this authority. We need to know the figures; otherwise I make the same criticism of the Government as I make of the Labour group on Southwark council: that they do not produce options for the opposition or the public to consider to enable them to judge whether or not there are reserves and whether or not they can get to, or near to, the rate-capping limit. We cannot legislate and make orders simply upon assumptions. Departments and Governments work on facts and those facts ought to be before the House.

[Mr. Simon Hughes]

It is important to recognise and to proclaim the fact that this order will take away accountability. Under the Rates Act the Government set up a consultation process. The imposition of rate capping is coming before the end of the consultation process, which shows that the consultation process is a sham. Unless the Secretary of State tells the House what the assumptions are, there will be rumours like the one about Haringey repeated earlier today, with certain Members asserting that assumptions of one sort or another have been made while the Secretary of State is saying that that is not the case. The Government have taken the town hall to Whitehall. We are spending much more time debating local government matters because that is what the Government want. Therefore, the Government must make available what they criticise local councils for not making available.

It was a tragedy that when the order was introduced there was no mention of services by the Government. That is what rates are about. The Government seem to ignore arguments about services. That is not to say that the ruling Labour groups in certain councils do not frequently distort them. They do. Liberals believe that it will be impossible, without reducing services, to get down to the proposed limits. If this is the case, I should like to know whether the Minister is prepared to listen to authorities such as mine in Southwark. Southwark should be able to prove to the Secretary of State that it is prepared to make savings, although it cannot reach the Secretary of State's targets.

All the Liberal and alliance groups in rate-capped authorities have said that they want to talk to the Government. We believe that negotiation will be in the interests of our constituents and will provide an opportunity to protect services. Negotiation is better than no talk at all. The Labour party has let down the people in the areas that it represents. If it insists upon spending money upon controversial matters—for instance, upon arts services festivals in London—and does not provide money for home helps and for basic services, it will find that that is not what people are asking for. The people in London, south Yorkshire and Merseyside say that those authorities waste money. If, after cutting out unnecessary expenditure, it can be shown that the money available is insufficient, we can then make a good case to the Government.

The Government have asked us to go down a road that leads ultimately to disaster. Every time the Government impose their will upon local government, local government seeks ways round the law. There will be more abuse. The result of more abuse will be even more Government intervention. The result of more intervention is even more abuse. Local democracy is then demeaned and does not serve the people it is intended to serve. The result is a battle between central Government misusing its position to interfere and Labour authorities often exploiting people simply for political, retaliatory purposes. That is not in the interests of the people of this country. That is not what democracy is about. That is why these orders are bad and unacceptable. We shall vote against them. I hope that the Government will soon be persuaded that to cap rates is to go down a foolish, misguided and, in the end, an economically unjustifiable path, and that they are not serving anybody by going down it.

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): Reference has been made by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) and by the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) to Liverpool. During an inquiry by academics from Liverpool university and elsewhere there was clear evidence that many of the problems facing Liverpool were the result of eight to 10 years of Liberal party control. The hon. Member for Mossley Hill has had the audacity to refer to the confrontation in Liverpool. The hon. Gentleman ought to remember that it was while his party was in office that Liverpool suffered so greatly over housing developments and in many other ways. It was the Labour party in Liverpool that inherited the mess left by the Liberal party, which at the end of the day was acting in concert with the Conservative party.

Figures against the case put forward by the Secretary of State have been mentioned by my hon. Friends the Members for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) and for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing). I do not intend to repeat what my hon. Friends have said. However, it is very important to look at what I consider to be the kernel of the problem for local authorities and at the reason why we are debating this order.

Like some other hon. Members, I was a city councillor and a member of Merseyside county council. Indeed, I was a member of both of those bodies during the transitional period. I knew a great deal about what was going on then. But in all truthfulness and honesty I must say that I did not welcome with open arms the reorganisation that was brought about by the Tory Government and which created the second-tier authorities. At the time there was a lot of concern about the overlapping and duplication that would occur between the two tiers. Thus, I do not speak as one who was totally committed then to the metropolitan counties.

The local government reorganisation did not do what was needed. It did not assess the changes taking place in terms of community needs and matters involving the environment, housing and so on. Those changes went virtually unheeded by the reorganisation in the early 1970s. However, the metropolitan counties have been innovative. As my hon. Friend the Member for West Derby pointed out, Merseyside county council recognised that the Government's policies were creating mass unemployment, and as it had resources at its disposal, it created organisations that were capable of training people and that created jobs for the unemployed. Since then, the metropolitan counties have been innovative and have not gone on doing the same thing for decade after decade and generation after generation. They have not acted as if they were caught up in impervious rings that they were unable to get out of, but have recognised the need to tackle the changing problems facing them.

Local authorities did very little about minority groups or about the unemployed. Some of the greatest criticism came from the Liberals in Liverpool, when the metropolitan county accepted the need for it to do something about the unemployed on Merseyside. Despite all the Liberals' criticisms and snide remarks about the unemployed centre, that centre now houses many community groups and is cited as a tremendous example of what can be done by local authorities.

It is wrong to argue that local authorities must be rigid in their activities. Many new problems are emerging and local authorities must adjust themselves to them and must consider whether their expenditure meets the needs of the people. Thus, although the reorganisation was far from perfect and did not relate to the changing conditions of the people, I recognise that a new generation of councillors has tackled many problems that were neglected for too long.

The Secretary of State's arbitrary decision means that authorities such as Merseyside will be unable to continue to help to deal with the deprivation that has resulted directly from the Government's policy. Some argue that authorities such as Merseyside are responsible for the confrontation, but it was the Government who threw down the gauntlet to local authorities and who interfered with their democracy. It is the Government who have created confrontation and not the local authorities. The Government constantly interfere directly. A supposedly non-interventionist Government have done more intervening in the rights of local authorities than any Government before them.

In that sense, local authorities will feel the full effect of the decision that is to be taken tonight. Local authority unions and ratepayers recognise more and more the role that the Government are playing in destroying local democracy. They now understand that to defend it they must join those who were elected to represent them to resist the Government's excesses.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): I, too, declare an interest in that I am a ratepayer of the GLC, ILEA and of the London borough of Lambeth. Thus, the Secretary of State is about to perform a triple on my rates, having forced them up considerably during the past four years by cutting out most of those authorities' RSG.

The order has been brought to the House with undue and unnecessary haste, and with the House being denied crucial information that is in the Secretary of State's possession about the way in which he has exercised his discretion and judgment. The order should be rejected on those grounds alone.

My hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett), in his capacity as Chairman of the Scrutiny Committee, pointed out to Mr. Speaker this afternoon that his Committee was deeply concerned about the short notice that it had been given to scrutinise this measure. Those observations are all the more powerful since they come from a Committee which contains a majority of Conservative Members but which has discharged its responsibilities to the House in a non-partisan way.

In his defence, the Secretary of State has pleaded that the maximum rate for the precepting authorities has to come into force by 15 February. He is gravely misleading the House. By his own Act, he gave himself powers under section 5 to set an interim maximum where, in any circumstances, no final maxima had been prescribed by the relevant date. In commending that clause, as it then was, to the Committee, the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave), said:

"Clause 5(1) provides that stopgap—an interim maximum which allows an authority to levy a rate while negotiations continue." — [Official Report, Standing Committee G, 28 February 1984; c. 813.]

Yes, it is unfortunate that negotiations about rate limits have only recently commenced, but the fault for that lies fairly and squarely with the Secretary of State. It was he who forced into the Act conditions attaching to the redetermination procedure so potentially onerous that no authority could conceivably have used that appeal mechanism, as we warned in Committee last year, and as he well knows.

Then there is the crucial question of information that is central to the order but which the Secretary of State has denied to the House. He made a series of assumptions about, among other things, the reserves available to the authorities. He sought repeatedly to reassure the Committee upstairs and the House last year that all his decisions would be subject to the fullest possible scrutiny by Parliament. How can that scrutiny be exercised without the information upon which his decisions are based being made available to the House?

In no way does it lie in the right hon. Gentleman's mouth to complain that the authorities have not provided him with information. Indeed, the Secretary of State said this afternoon that information flowed into the Department thick and fast, and he added that all the authorities had provided a great many figures. It is outrageous and unacceptable that the House, and not just the authorities, should be denied the central information on which the Government are making orders such as this.

The Secretary of State has sought to justify draconian controls over local government by reference to the Government's economic policy. There is no justification for that, as I spelt out in the rate support grant debate on 16 January. Let us be clear that, stripped bare, these provisions are nothing more than a crude attempt to stitch up Labour authorities which are seeking to defend jobs and services against the ravages of unemployment caused by the Government. The order is an abuse of power.

The Secretary of State claims that the authorities were fairly selected by reference to what he has, in the past, described as the "robust" and "objective" tests of GREA, as he told the Standing Committee on 21 February 1983 —[Interruption.] I am glad to see the Minister of State blowing in incredulity at the thought that his right hon. Friend would have used such words. If the Secretary of State believes that these measures are robust and objective, he should talk to the Minister of State, for only three weeks ago that Minister made it crystal clear that he thinks no such thing either about GREA or target. Indeed, he described the system as well nigh incomprehensible, as exceptionally difficult to explain and as byzantine in its complexity. Any system that is incomprehensible and byzantine cannot possibly be robust and objective, for to be that it would have to be fair and be seen to be fair.

In the rate support grant debate, many Conservative Members complained bitterly about the nonsense of GREA. The crucial defect in the Secretary of State's case is that GREA is being used for a purpose for which it was never intended, as my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) spelt out.

If GREA were an objective test, one must ask why the City of London has not been rate-capped when its expenditure is three times above GREA compared with any other authority, at 263 per cent. The Minister will answer that, although the City of London's expenditure is 263 per cent. above its GREA, the city does not meet the other test for rate capping, that of target. But target is supposed to relate to an authority's cash growth in expenditure, and the City of London's cash growth in expenditure has also, since 1978-79, been the highest of any authority in the land, at 274 per cent., way above that of the much abused GLC.

Nothing illustrates better the thoroughly arbitrary and disreputable way in which the Secretary of State has fixed and fitted up these tests than to compare the treatment of the GLC with that of the City of London. The City's target has been fiddled so that it escapes rate capping. The GLC's target has been fiddled so that it is heavily penalised and is now rate-capped.

If the Secretary of State does not accept that, perhaps he will explain how, as one of the many costs that he has had to pay to make rate capping work, he has this year, at a stroke, increased the GLC's target by 64 per cent. over last year.

The four rate-capped authorities we discuss today have increased their expenditure by more than the average for all authorities. It is inherent in any system of local democracy that some authorities will spend more than the average and that some will spend less. No freedom is exercisable without diversity. But of the four authorities, only one, the GLC, has increased its expenditure since 1981-82 by more than central Government have increased their expenditure on, for example, defence.

For the GLC, Merseyside and South Yorkshire, a large part of their expenditure increase has been on public transport. That expenditure has proved overwhelmingly popular, as the Government know now that they have taken control of LRT, and, despite the lunancies, illegalities and irrationalities of the Secretary of State for Transport, have had broadly to maintain the Fares Fair policy. This expenditure has also been efficient in economic terms. The Department of Transport's study showed that, for every £1 in subsidy, the local economies benefited by £1·20.

Part of the increase in expenditure by South Yorkshire and Merseyside has been on the police, at the behest of the Home Office. If these provisions go through, Merseyside may have to cut its expenditure on its police force by over £5 million, to a level that could not be achieved as the chief constable of Merseyside, Mr. Kenneth Oxford, said a few weeks ago. The Merseyside fire service would have to be cut by £2·5 million, despite the fact that Merseyside is one of the most risky fire areas. The ability of the fire service to meet its statutory obligations would be critically impaired.

"without severe emasculation of the police service",

The other significant part of the increase in expenditure by these three authorities is seen in the employment policies. We applaud those policies. All three of the authorities are working in areas of massive economic deprivation and high levels of unemployment. They have been able, not least through constructive partnership with the private sector, to create and secure jobs and to reduce the terrifying levels of unemployment. If these programmes are cut, jobs will go and unemployment will rise. Is that what the Secretary of State wants? I believe that the answer is certainly yes.

I declare a further interest because I am a parent of a child at an ILEA school. From 1971 to 1974 I was the Islington borough representative on that authority. ILEA has higher unit costs than other authorities, but that is the product of providing a higher level of service and providing many services for people who work in London, but whose homes are in the lower rated shire areas, and is the product of the additional costs, which cannot be avoided, of running a service in a capital city.

The Government recognise those factors when they consider financing the Metropolitan police. Even though there are more police officers in London than in comparable areas outside London—we recognise that—the Government must explain why it costs 40 per cent. more to employ a police officer in London and £800 more for the Metropolitan police to buy a police vehicle than it costs outside London. Why does it cost £5,500 to clear up each crime within London, but only £1,500 to clear up each crime in metropolitan areas outside London?

The Government understand these additional costs in relation to the Metropolitan police, but they are blind to the extra costs of the capital city in relation to ILEA. ILEA has a fine record. It is one of only six authorities regarded by HMI as having a proper standard. If ILEA were required to spend as these rate limits suggest, a great many jobs in the service would be at risk and the quality of the education provided for all our children could well suffer.

The Secretary of State made the preposterous claim that he was doing all this to bring down rate levels and to improve expenditure in the non-rate-capped areas. When will the Secretary of State understand that the system he has created is so barmy that, if rate capping works to bring down expenditure in the rate-capped areas, rates will have to increase in the non-rate-capped areas? How many more times do we have to tell the Secretary of State about this? He has spelt this out in parliamentary answers. Does he not read those answers? Does he not understand that if all the authorities did what he told them and all spent at GREA, rates in Berkshire would have to go up by 20 per cent. and rates in Essex would have to go up by 25 per cent?

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: That is silly.

Mr. Straw: Will the right hon. Gentleman tell me why it is silly? The Secretary of State says that he knows that no authority will do this. I assume that means that GREA is a nonsense of an exercise. Is that the point? Of course that is true.

Mr. Jenkin: It is stupid.

Mr. Straw: The right hon. Gentleman says that it is stupid. He gave me the answer. It may be true that his policy will not work overnight and do what he wants it to do so that all authorities can spend at GREA. The right hon. Gentleman told the House that the idea was that the policy should work towards all authorities spending at GREA. In that case, at the very least, rates in Essex would not be forced up by 30 per cent. They would be forced up by 15 per cent. The Secretary of State must understand the simple arithmetic of this system — "overspending" by Labour authorities has protected jobs and services and the ratepayers not only in those Labour areas but in the lower-rated Tory areas. Such is the madness and utter lunacy of the system created by the right hon. Gentleman.

I have two concluding points. The first is about the crucial connection between rates and jobs. When will the Secretary of State and the Minister of State have completed their evaluation of the Cambridge report? It is a final report, and they no doubt knew about its contents before it was submitted to them. [Interruption.] Do they want a copy?

The Minister for Local Government (Mr. Kenneth Baker): Put it in the Library.

Mr. Straw: I am not allowed to put things in the Library. We have had that problem before. Only Ministers can deposit documents in the Library.

When will the Secretary of State publish the report, which concludes:

"the analyses provide no evidence that either the level of rates or the increase in rates affects the distribution of employment between local authority areas."?

It continues:

"If the failure to detect a widespread and general impact of rates on the location of jobs reflects the absence of such a link, there are important implications for public policy. In particular, the findings suggest that local authorities that have above average levels of rates, or that levy above average rate increases, are probably not damaging their local economies."

It suggests that it is highly probable that additional expenditure out of rates in the higher rated areas is increasing employment.

If the order is carried, it will do nothing for the Government's economic policy; it will severely damage the lives of people in some of our worst-off areas; and it will force up unemployment and replace the democratic will of those communities by centralised dictation. It must be rejected by the House.

9.11 pm

The Minister for Local Government (Mr. Kenneth Baker): The House will be pleased to know that the debate does not have to go on until 10 o'clock. The arrangement is that I speak for about 10 or 15 minutes.

This is the first occasion that the House has had a chance to debate the first order under the Rates Act 1984. I found myself agreeing with the phrase used by my hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Porter) when he said that he looked upon the order as a disagreeable necessity. No Government go readily into the business of rate capping.

The hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) talked about the strained relationship that exists between central and local government and how it has changed over the past four or five years. It has not changed solely because we have been in office. Underlying forces have been at work for a long time. One fundamental change is that we have succeeded in putting the handbrake on local authority expenditure. In the 1960s and 1970s it was growing at about 3 per cent. a year. Since 1979, it has grown at about 1 per cent. per year. I would be the first to recognise that that imposes a great strain upon the relationship between local and central government.

Dr. Cunningham: Even if that were a valid argument in respect of that part of local government expenditure provided by the Exchequer—one can see and concede the arguments for a cash limit on that expenditure at some point — what is the relevance of all that to local government expenditure from its own resources?

Mr. Baker: It arises because successive Governments, not just ours, have been worried by the totality of local government expenditure and the sources from which local government can finance it.

We are bringing in this order today, and we shall be bringing in an order for the lower-tier authorities in about a fortnight, because the overspending of the 18 rate-capped authorities together represents £632 million against target. That is a massive sum of money. Since 1979, those 18 authorities have increased their expenditure from £1·3 billion to £3·1 billion. That is a massive, threefold increase, and infinitely higher than the rate of inflation.

The four authorities covered by the order are overspending against targets some £523 million when we are asking local authorities to exercise restraint, and most of them are doing so. Some 85 per cent. of the local authorities are spending at target or close to it.

I should like to refer to the meeting that took place earlier this week, when a group of rate-capped authorities came to see the Secretary of State and myself. There were not just rate-capped authorities — 26 authorities were there in all, led by Councillor Blunkett. It was a self-appointed caucus. There was nobody in the delegation from those significant authorities controlled by Labour — Birmingham, Newcastle, Coventry or Gateshead — and there were no representatives from the shire counties. One had to ask oneself whom those people represented. They represented just themselves.

The rate-capped authorities were there, plus another nine. If we negotiated with them as a group, we would betray the other 387 authorities that are working broadly or precisely within the system—[HON. MEMBERS: "Why did the Government have the meeting?"] Because we are reasonable people. Those representatives asked to see us and we said that we would meet them. If we had not met them, the Opposition Front Bench would say, "Why are you so pigheaded, obdurate and obstinate in not seeing them?" Of course my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State or I are willing to see them, but they cannot be expected to enter into negotiations with the Government as representing the broad mass of local authorities.

We made it clear to Councillor Blunkett, the leader of Sheffield, that we would not be blackmailed into providing more finance. That was the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Sir J. Osborn) asked me to reconfirm. That meeting on Monday this week was not the first round of a 15-round contest. Uppermost in our minds have been the interests of the domestic and commercial ratepayers who have suffered considerably through a blizzard of increased rate demands over a period of years.

Mr. Heffer: The Minister will agree that the various authorities put forward a series of very important proposals, to which the Secretary of State referred. Why were they just pushed aside without any serious consideration?

Mr. Baker: I shall tell the hon. Gentleman why. Councillor Blunkett was asking us whether we would suspend the operation of the rate support grant system, which is separate from the order that we are discussing. He asked us to suspend the Rates Act and to recalculate the entire rate support grant system. He asked for a cooling-off period.

The 18 rate-capped authorities had from 24 July last year — the date on which my right hon. Friend announced the expenditure levels for those 18 authorities — roughly until Christmas to discuss with the Government, if they wanted to, whether those expenditure levels were adequate. They chose not to do so. All right. That was their choice, but by not coming to discuss the matter with my right hon. Friend, they denied themselves the opportunity of discussing whether the expenditure level for their areas was appropriate for next year. When the rate limits were announced——

Mr. Barnett: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Baker: I should like to proceed.

[Mr. Baker]

On 11 December my right hon. Friend announced the rate limits. Again, the authorities had an opportunity to come and see us. When the statement was made, we made it clear that they had until 15 January. We extended the date until the end of January. We have followed an open-door policy. We have said that we would be prepared to meet them, and that the meetings would be only on an individual basis. However, when the authorities asked whether we would see a collective delegation, we said yes. In view of what I have said and in view of the time that the authorities have had since 24 July to discuss the matter with the Government, all that I can say is that they have been warming up for that cooling-off period for 30 weeks.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I hope that the Minister will come to the conclusion that the whole point of the meeting was to cover up the divisions in the Labour party between those who believe that they can make some savings and those who believe that they should not do so. Whatever the merits of the authorities meeting the Secretary of State, that was the reason for the meeting, and those people are to blame for its failure.

Mr. Baker: I could not have put it better. Sometimes the alliance is right, as it is on this occasion. The purpose of the exercise was political brinkmanship and to cover up the clear divisions between the individual authorities. Some wanted to settle and some were prepared to move into illegality.

Mr. Michie: I do not want the House to be misled by the claim that no local authorities have communicated. I do not have the information in front of me, but I remember that the chief executive of Sheffield wrote to the Secretary of State about the anomalies of the block grant as opposed to the urban programme and its problems. The Audit Commission also brought to the Government's attention the anomalies in GREA, and so forth. The problems have been presented to the Government and the Minister is well aware of them without being reminded of them every five minutes.

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman is a county councillor in south Yorkshire. We have had one letter from south Yorkshire, virtually declining to give us any information. I believe that we have had a little more information from Sheffield, but I shall have to check. We have told the authorities to provide us with the information which, under the Act, the onus is upon them to provide. Indeed, some of the authorities did. When we met the delegation on Monday we had on the desk in front of us the piles of information that we had received from ILEA and the GLC.

Mr. Barnett: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way. He says that the authorities have had since last July, and in theory he is correct. But does he not understand that it would be inappropriate for the authorities to make an approach to him until they have made their budgets or their estimates as to their expenditure for 1985-86? Is he not also aware — surely he is — that they now have a statutory responsibility to consult in their areas before setting that budget? Therefore, it is important that they know what they are talking about before they make any approach to the Secretary of State.

Mr. Baker: The timing of consultation is specifically provided for in the Rates Act, although I cannot remember in which section. There was no reason why the authorities should not come to talk about expenditure levels way back in the summer and autumn if they had wanted to. They chose not to for political reasons.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) asked me what the effect of rate capping would be upon local communities and their services. I can only say that if authorities had started last year, after the announcement of the expenditure levels, to live within those levels, they would not now be facing some of the problems that they are having to face. He said that he was worried that the authorities had not come in. That means that the decisions that will have to be taken now will be more serious and grave than they would otherwise have been.

Again, it is depressing that, far from trying to live within the expenditure levels that we have set, the 18 rate-capped authorities have subsequently published their own budgets showing an increase of some £424 million over and above the expenditure levels. That is a cumulative act of considerable irresponsibility. Those authorities are building up expectations that no Government could possibly meet. For example, the GLC has just published a budget that increases its revenue expenditure next year by £100 million and its capital expenditure by some £300 million. For an authority that has only 12 months to survive and operate——

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Mr. Baker: —that is to dance on the deck of the Titanic.

Mr. Tony Banks: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Baker: No, I have given way several times.

Several hon. Members, especially hon. Members from the Merseyside area, have said that services will be slashed. The authorities should have addressed the problem a year ago. We are asking authorities only to cut expenditure according to the cost of inflation, by about 4·5 or 5 per cent. The authorities budget up and then say that they have to cut from the higher budget. There are many examples of authorities that have cut their expenditure effectively.

Mr. Wareing: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Baker: Many authorities have been able to make such cuts. My hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) mentioned Brent. That authority, which is under mixed control, though led by the Conservatives at the moment, has cut £20 million without cutting a single member of staff.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Baker: With great respect, I have given way many times, and the hon. Gentleman has not spoken in the debate.

I should like to remind the House of the extent to which we are protecting the ratepayers in these proposals. Under the precept limit in the order, the precept for the GLC is 36·5p. The precept in the GLC budget will be 43p—an increase of 18 per cent. The ILEA's precept in the order is 77·25p. The budget that ILEA has issued implies 83p —7 per cent. more.

In Merseyside, the figures are much better—I mean much higher—[Interruption.] The figures are better in the sense that they are even more irrational and show that the council is living in a dream world. The precept in the order is 82·86p. If the ratepayers of Merseyside were not protected by the order, they would have to pay 130·5p —57 per cent. more. The ratepayers of south Yorkshire would have to pay some 43 per cent. more.

The precepting authorities have spent extravagantly. The GLC has probably been the most extravagant. In the past 12 months, the GLC has taken on some 1,490 extra members of staff. It has indulged in a huge advertising campaign costing some £10 million.

The hon. Member for Woolwich fears that authorities that will not levy the precept approved by Parliament will be gambling with people's livelihoods and, in some cases, lives. I agree with him. I hope that the Labour councillors in the authorities under discussion will, during the next month, agree a legal precept. That was the advice that they were given by the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham). I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on his courage in giving that advice. It was the advice given by the leader of the Labour party at the Labour local government conference last weekend. That was the right advice. The right hon. Gentleman and the hon. Gentleman want no hand in condoning the illegality that some of the wilder leaders of the extreme Left in Labour councils advocate. I hope that their wise advice will be followed. Having seen the Labour party dragged down by Mr. Scargill, they want to ensure that it is not clubbed to death by Councillor Hatton, Councillor Livingstone and Councillor Knight. I hope that, now that Parliament is about to approve the precepts, the various councils will act and pass them into law during the next few weeks.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Rate Limitation (Prescribed Maximum) (Precepts) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 30th January, be approved.

Orders of the Day

Hong Kong Bill

Considered in Committee

[SIR PAUL DEAN in the Chair]

Clause 1

ENDING OF BRITISH SOVEREIGNTY AND JURISDICTION OVER HONG KONG

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

9.43 pm

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): This is the crucial clause as it gives effect to the transfer of sovereignty from 1 July 1997. It is therefore appropriate at this stage to ask the Government a number of questions which have been outstanding since Second Reading.

We had a very long, full and illuminating debate on Second Reading, and I see from the press that many people in Hong Kong have read our proceedings and, through the press and other channels, have offered many views on the subjects with which we dealt on that occasion. Nevertheless, a number of loose ends remain that are not covered in the amendments.

Contrary to some of the views expressed in the colony, this is not a minority subject in the British House of Commons. Throughout the many debates in the past 18 months, the interest in Hong Kong, its people and its future has been outstanding. During that period, 73 Members contributed on at least one occasion in debates and questions on the subject. That is a fair record by any standard. A number of Members have spoken on several occasions while others have sat patiently throughout the debates but failed to catch the eye of the Chair. This has reflected the genuine and continuing interest and concern of the House for the people on the other side of the world whose future we are now debating.

At the outset, I express our gratitude to the Government for the time that has been allowed between the Second Reading and Committee stages. The decision to postpone Second Reading for 10 days was taken in response to a request from the Opposition. It has provided a valuable opportunity for hon. Members and people in Hong Kong to study the issues and come forward with considered views on them. I see from the local press in Hong Kong that the gratitude that we are expressing tonight is reflected in Hong Kong.

I examined the information provided to us about press comment, and must express gratitude to those who provided us with that information, including Mr. Colvin Haye, his assistants and the Hong Kong Government Office. They have provided full background information which allows us to see the views, not all of which are uncritical, of the Hong Kong Government, and to reach better decisions about the views that we have adopted.

9.45 pm

I can also fairly reflect the gratitude of individual Hong Kong people. I single out Mr. and Mrs. Y. W. Fong, who wrote to me on the back of a commemorative postcard—a first day cover of the official signing of the joint declaration. The hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) has had his attendances at the debate marked in the same way. Many other people have written interesting comments, which will be useful when we debate the technical clauses.

I wish to ask the Government many questions about the transfer of sovereignty. This may be the last chance to ask questions and hear the Government's view for some time. I shall deal with the question of an annual report to Parliament. During the period to 1997, when sovereignty is handed over, detailed discussions will have to take place about the handover. Some of them will take place in the joint liaison group, but many will take place in the Legislative and Executive Council in Hong Kong. There is no adequate way for hon. Members to gain information about what is going on unless it is provided in an ordered form. The best way to provide information would be for the Government to provide Parliament with an annual report of progress.

During the last debate, many hon. Members were disappointed in the attitude of Ministers towards the idea of an annual report and of regular or semi-regular views on the issue. I hope that since then the Minister has had a chance to reflect, and that the Government will realise that we are not making a partisan point, but that it is a genuine desire of all parliamentarians to know precisely what is going on during that important period.

I have consistently said to representatives from Hong Kong, individuals who have written and the media that we believe that party politics should not play a major part in this issue. Obviously the purpose of the Opposition is to question the Government and to ensure that they are on their toes. However, there will be at least three British Governments before Hong Kong finally becomes part of the People's Republic of China, and we are almost certain that they will include Labour Administrations. It is therefore extremely important that all potential Governments are well briefed on what is going on behind the scenes and know how much progress is being made. We must know what progress will be made on the drafting of the basic law, which, although it is a matter for the Government of the People's Republic of China, is crucial to the people of Hong Kong. There will also be questions about the progress towards the new nationality that we shall be debating later this evening.

All those matters will be relevant to the transfer of sovereignty, and hon. Members have a right to know about them. The only alternative to the Government providing the information in an ordered form is to rely on the British and Hong Kong press. They will be the only ones to tell us what is happening and whether the progress is popular in the colony. I hope that the Minister can tell us whether we shall have such systematic feedback in the months ahead.

Secondly, if there is to be an annual report, or even in the absence of one, will Parliament have regular opportunities to debate progress towards the transfer of sovereignty? I hope that the Minister has changed his mind since Second Reading, and that he will say that, for example, a Select Committee will investigate the many issues that arise in the intervening period.

The third point on which I seek illumination is the drafting of the basic law. That will be part of the joint agreement with the People's Republic. Yet, as we know, the people of Hong Kong have an overwhelming interest in that law, and we are still not clear whether the consultation that the Chinese have promised with the people of Hong Kong will be formal or informal. Will committees be set up that represent directly the people of Hong Kong, or will there be less tangible consultation?

The only agency that can provide such information to the House is the Government. It would be helpful to know this evening whether the Government are in a better position now than they were two weeks ago to tell us whether the consultation will include local people or whether it will mirror the rather vague, albeit important, statements that have been made by the Chinese about the necessity for consulting people in Hong Kong.

Fourthly, in the period until sovereignty is handed over, the future prosperity and stability of Hong Kong will depend upon international acceptance of Hong Kong's unique status. We are still not clear about what will happen with the GATT and MFA agreements. The House will wish to know what progress the Government have made and how they intend to ensure that the enterprise on which Hong Kong's prosperity is based will continue. From press comment in Hong Kong during the past few months, this would appear to be a matter of acute and personal interest there.

We must also ask questions about the progress towards more domestic institutions in Hong Kong. The Hong Kong Government have expressed their views, and decisions will soon have to be taken. A review has been fixed for 1987, and major decisions about the pace of change will have to be taken then. But a commentary from the Government, who still have overall responsibility for the structure of institutions in Hong Kong, would help hon. Members who are deeply interested in the introduction of more representative institutions there.

The methods by which the House of Commons debates such a Bill are foreign to many people, not just in Hong Kong but elsewhere outside the House, and some of our procedures seem archaic and bizarre and are easily open to misunderstanding. I hope that people outside the House, especially those who listen so acutely in Hong Kong to every word that we say, will recognise that the scrutiny that we are giving to this Bill reflects a proper concern for the anxieties of the people of Hong Kong for their future, and our continuing concern.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): I agree with almost everything that the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) has said. We have done all we can to serve the people of Hong Kong to the best of our ability. I hope that it is not presumptuous to say to the hon. Gentleman that the fact that the House has been almost unanimous on this issue may not excite comment from those who look to this building only when it is in a state of apparent conflict. However, in terms of doing a serious job to the best of our ability, the way that we have tried to handle this issue is the best way to handle it on behalf of the people of Hong Kong, whose future we are trying to protect as best we can, within the somewhat limited means at our disposal.

I do not wish to break the spirit of bipartisanship, but the hon. Member for Hamilton referred to the possibility of there being another Labour Government before 1997, which is a matter best left to the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) to work out. I mention this because it illustrates the impossibility of any Parliament, even if it is not democratic, giving guarantees about the future, because politics and guarantees are bad bedfellows. All that we can do is what we believe to be in the best interests of all concerned.

Clause 1 deals primarily with the sovereignty issue, and there is no point in repeating all that has already been said. At this stage, there is advantage to be had by leaving a certain amount of fluidity in the Bill, certainly in respect of the nationality aspects that we shall be discussing later. I make one point in response to what the hon. Member for Hamilton said about there being some substantial time —I am sure that he is right—before we come to debate Hong Kong again. However, I am sure that he, like the rest of us, did not want to imply that by passing this Bill we wash our hands of Hong Kong and lose interest in it. We should not seek to imply either that the House will not debate, discuss, or even, if necessary, legislate from time to time on the rights of individual citizens in Hong Kong.

In this clause we are dealing with sovereignty, and it is right that this should be settled once and for all, beyond peradventure, which is what the clause does. I support it. I hope that the hon. Member for Hamilton will agree that we should let it be known to all concerned—I am sure that the Government share this view—that if, as time goes by, changes need to be made in detailed aspects of the legislation, nothing that we do tonight will slam the door irrevocably on making changes in detail that may affect the rights of individual Hong Kong citizens.

Mr. Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): I shall be brief because we should not try to have another Second Reading debate on each clause stand part debate.

I am happy to follow the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley), who has given a good deal of time and emotional effort to the problems of Hong Kong for some time, despite the fact that, as he said, this has led to him being criticised somewhat. From the beginning, he was on the right lines, and we should salute the fact that he was so, despite the fact that when he originally expressed his views they were not universally accepted. Secondly, I am very happy to support, as did the hon. Member for Christchurch, what the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) said. He will appreciate that the House is no longer simply bipartisan. I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) said that it was multipartisan.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): Bipartite.

Mr. Johnston: Bipartite?

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): Cinquepartite.

Mr. Johnston: That is far too clever for me.

Mr. Powell: Count up to five—five parties.

Mr. Johnston: It is a great pleasure to have the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) not only agreeing with me but doubling the number.

I have only two points to make. First, I support what the hon. Member for Hamilton said about the annual report——

It being Ten o'clock, THE CHAIRMAN left the Chair to report Progress and ask leave to sit again.

Committee report Progress.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That at this day's sitting, the Hong Kong Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour. — [Mr. Neubert.]

Hong Kong Bill

Again considered in Committee.

Question again proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Russell Johnston: I support what the hon. Member for Hamilton said about an annual report. The view of the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) was not very clear on Second Reading. He spent a little time pooh-poohing the value of annual debates upon the Armed Forces. The Minister, who is sitting looking somewhat delphic on the Front Bench, suggested that this was an artificial exercise and that the Government, being open minded and willing to listen to argument at any time, would be only too delighted, if there were a great problem, to have a debate almost immediately. That suggestion was received by Opposition Members with a certain amount of dubiety. That dubiety has persisted. There is virtue in a regular examination of how matters are proceeding. Therefore, I hope that the Minister will reconsider the matter and will agree that a regular report to the House would be of value. I do not mean that there should be a regular report in written form, but that there should be the opportunity to have a regular debate. This House produces a great deal of material in written form which is never debated, and because it is never debated it is never read.

My second point again supports what was said by the hon. Member for Hamilton. We hope that the Minister will take this opportunity to tell the House, if he can, how he envisages the basic law will evolve. That is of fundamental importance. The clause relates to the transfer of sovereignty. We are willing to transfer sovereignty if certain conditions are met. The agreement related to the meeting of conditions. This will result in a considerable diminution, in one sense, of the outright absorption of Hong Kong by the People's Republic of China. That reflects great credit upon the People's Republic of China. However, it means that we shall have a continuing interest in how the law in Hong Kong evolves over the next 13 years. If the Minister is able to say a little more than he was able to say last time about how this will be possible, the House will be grateful.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): I shall not detain the Committee for long on clause 1 stand part, but one major point needs to be made. When we hand over sovereignty in 1997 in accordance with the agreement, we will be handing over not only territory and people but also a system of government. It worries me considerably that, despite the two Green Papers issued by the Hong Kong Government, we have not sufficiently evolved the constitution of Hong Kong. In the true colonial tradition, the governor of Hong Kong has absolute power under the present arrangements there. The great merit of that system is that he is subject to the Foreign Secretary who is, of course, responsible to the House. The governor can be removed, and is removed every so often as appointments lapse and new people are appointed.

When sovereignty is handed over, that situation will no longer obtain. I know that people in Hong Kong have serious misgivings about adopting an entirely democratic or parliamentary system that is based on the British model. There are many reasons why that may not be the most appropriate model for continuing the government of Hong Kong. However, I do not believe that the Government of Hong Kong have begun seriously to consider several fundamental issues, such as the way in which the Executive will be kept under control and ruled by a democratically elected assembly. At present it is proposed that the democracy should depend on a very low level of almost district or tenantry government as the only elected body, which then appoints members to ever more senior bodies until the Legislature is reached. But that is far too narrow a democratic base upon which to work, and from which to constrain the executive power now held by the governor and his officials.

Sir Paul Bryan (Boothferry): Is my hon. Friend saying that the Hong Kong people are worried about the period between now and 1997 or about the period after 1997?

Mr. Wells: The quick answer is both. The problem is how to evolve the new institutions in the period up to 1997, and thereafter to know how they are to work once Parliament's power is removed. The question is how are they to be evolved in a way that suits Hong Kong, the Chinese people and the way in which their traditions suggest that they can be ruled. Over the years, one problem has been the difficulty of arriving at a political settlement within China that was acceptable to its people. Consequently, there have been many disastrous wars and civil wars in China that have held back its development.

Therefore, in the next 13 years we face a difficult problem in trying to evolve Hong Kong's constitution in a way that will preserve the basic liberties that are now enjoyed by the people of Hong Kong. The fundamental division of powers as between the Legislature, the Judiciary and the Executive has not been properly considered, particularly in the case of the Executive. At present, the Executive consists of the governor with his civil servants and officials acting—as we might say—as Ministers in the Legislative Council. But they are now to be retired to the sidelines. Nevertheless, the question of how the Hong Kong people are to control their Executive remains. I would hate to see us hand over the sovereignty of Hong Kong, with absolute power being retained in the hands of a governor and an Executive without proper democratic control which guarantees the freedoms of the people of Hong Kong and which they have enjoyed so far and which will be in stark contrast to the sovereignty to which they are to submit in 1997. Without that constitutional development, the people of Hong Kong will be vulnerable to the different tradition of the sovereignty to which they will be committed.

I urge Her Majesty's Government to work with the Hong Kong Government quickly to develop the Green Paper and White Paper issued by the Hong Kong Government, tailoring it in a sympathetic way to the needs, traditions and customs of the people there. It should not necessarily be a Westminster system, but one which will enable the Executive to be controlled by the people.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): The hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) was right to focus attention on the importance of the development of democracy, in an evolutionary sense, as we approach 1997.

[Mr. Tom Clarke]

There is the temptation to think only in terms of 1997 and to forget that there are 12 years to go before we reach that time. I hope that those years will be used, as the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford said, towards achieving a greater degree of democracy than has been the case hitherto.

It seems that we have been too ambivalent in our views about democracy. We must accept that existing laws must be adapted to meet the changing situation, and that situation will change rapidly as 1997 approaches. The basic law—to which my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) and others have referred, and to which my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) devoted much of his speech when we last debated this subject—is vital. I gather that the Legislative Council agrees with that and has reservations only on the question of passports, an issue which concerns, among others, the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell).

We must give close consideration to the way in which the basic law evolves before Hong Kong begins to work, hopefully in harmony, with China in 1997. I hope that tonight we can continue to provide those concerned with an assurance that confidence on their part is not misplaced. Hon. Members on both sides of the House have an interest in encouraging confidence. That confidence is necessary, not just in Hong Kong but in relation to Hong Kong's association with China. In other words, there must be a clear understanding between Hong Kong and China as 1997 approaches.

The Committee will not be surprised to hear me say that a great test of the basic law of democratic development in Hong Kong rests on the way in which we approach the problem of the Vietnamese refugees. I remain disappointed that the Legislative Council has not managed to make that an item of major priority, bringing pressure on the British Government to respond to the Canadian and American debates about the refugees that are taking place. In dealing with this problem in the serious way it merits, we could send a message to China that we believe that it is important to develop in Hong Kong not only laws but a humanitarian approach to problems of that nature which will be an inspiration to China and encourage the Chinese to develop their own views on human rights.

10.15 pm

Sir Paul Bryan: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that China has probably accepted more of those refugees than any other country? I do not believe that the Chinese need any lessons in that direction.

Mr. Clarke: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is correct. None of us wants to score points, especially about China, because we are keen for the agreement to work. Hong Kong has lessons to learn. If those lessons come from China in the context of these negotiations, so much the better. I thank the hon. Gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. David Young (Bolton, South-East): Both sides of the Committee want the agreement to work for the people of Hong Kong. It is a long time between now and 1997. As one of the major signatories to this agreement, Britain must maintain the confidence in Hong Kong not only of business but of the people. There must be close liaison and discussions about what is evolving in Hong Kong. There are few democratic institutions in the region, at the moment but I think that such institutions will take off with the spur of change of sovereignty. The minority communities are deeply worried not only about passports but about the position of their children.

In Hong Kong, as in this country, people want a voice in the democratic system. I believe that hon. Members do not want just a formal debate on these matters that merely goes through the motions. This is a unique development. We are transferring over 13 years' not only sovereignty, but law, ways of life and institutions. If they are to be transferred smoothly and maintained, we need gentle touches on the tiller. Administrations in Britain and attitudes in China may change. Certain attitudes and institutions in Hong Kong will change. To retain the confidence and support of the Hong Kong people we need constant consultations between the British Government and the Hong Kong people. The results of those consultations should be reported at regular intervals of no longer than a year to the House for consideration.

We have heard of the Hong Kong people's worry about passports. At this stage, we cannot dot every "i" and cross every "t". No one challenges the good will with which we enter this agreement.

Members of the House, whatever their political differences, share an interest in the people of Hong Kong. We ask that there should be regular meaningful discussions on the Floor of the House at intervals of no more than a year. Now that we are moving towards the transition in 1997, that would be the way to gain and maintain the support of the people in Hong Kong whom it is our responsibility as Members of the British Parliament to sustain that relationship.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): The clause provides for the withdrawal of our claim to sovereignty over Hong Kong from 1997 provided that the Anglo-Chinese agreement is ratified and the appropriate documents are exchanged.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stevenage (Mr. Wood) was right when he said that between now and 1997—if the Bill is passed—it is important to ensure that as far as possible the internal Government of Hong Kong is arranged democratically so that power can be dispersed within the community by the time of the transfer of power rather than be concentrated, as it normally is with colonial Governments, in the hands of the governor.

I hope that the Government will bear in mind, as a matter of urgency, the needs of the expatriate Civil Service in Hong Kong. Democracy may be the objective, but there will be a need to transfer and promote indigenous members of the service into various senior civil service posts in Hong Kong. I declare an interest, because I am a former member of Her Majesty's overseas Civil Service now on pension from Nigeria.

The House is taking insufficient notice of the fact that the people to whom I refer, who have had their conditions of service confirmed and who have been assured that their pensions will be guaranteed and that their rights of transfer and promotion will be maintained before and after the transfer in 1997, will have their conditions of service changed from the date upon which the Bill becomes effective, because there will be a deliberate policy to appoint to senior posts on promotion and transfer people of Chinese ethnic origin in preference to expatriate officers. The rights and conditions of service of serving expatriates will have been prejudiced from the word go.

The Government must arrange for those people to be able to retire with pension rights and conditions of service equivalent to those of officers in a similar position in the past when our colonies achieved independence. Previously, when colonies achieved independence, arrangements for the transfer of power were made rapidly between the final agreement with the parties following a general election and the assumption of power. In this case, there will be over 12 years of preparation. However, that is no excuse for failing to deal with the deterioration in the career prospects of members of the overseas Civil Service now serving in Hong Kong. By the time the Bill becomes an Act, their conditions of service will have changed.

I understand from my hon. Friend the Minister of State that the rights of people in the Overseas Civil Service serving in Hong Kong are under active consideration. That is fine if it means that a public officers' agreement will be concluded and announced fairly soon, on which officers in Hong Kong may depend. However, if it is thought that the decision can wait for years because the transfer is not until 1997, a great injustice will be done. Many officers will leave the service prematurely, being willing to lose such pension rights to which they might have been entitled simply because of the insecurity that faces them.

Therefore, I ask the Government in this intervening period to make a public officers' agreement with the overseas Civil Service in Hong Kong as soon as possible, such as was made in equivalent cases in the colonies when they achieved their independence, so that the officers have security and may continue to serve in Hong Kong to its benefit in whatever post they have.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): I heartily agree with clause 1. I speak not in order to criticise it; it is absolutely the right clause. It is short, succinct and easily understandable by everybody. I worry about how much of it is understandable with regard to what will happen in Hong Kong itself. I shall refer to that later.

I should like to say a few words about an annual debate or progress report. At this stage I am not particularly concerned about what form it takes, and as we have 13 years to go it would be premature to say that, willy-nilly, it must be an annual debate or a report presented as a Command Paper. It is important for the Government to say that they would make provision, if necessary, through the usual channels. There should be provision, annually if necessary, for a debate. It may not be necessary, but it is important, if there is pressure from Parliament or a significant part of the House, for this major issue to be debated.

More importantly, from my point of view, we should have a collation of information. The hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Mr. Johnston) said that it was not so important, but I believe that it is probably more important. We have information from the press and various publications, but it would be useful if an annual report were compiled and presented to Parliament, although not necessarily debated. It need not even be published by HMSO. It might be published in Hong Kong. I am not particularly fussed about how it is done. We have many things to do, and it would be useful for us to have something like that to take away and look at to see whether progress has been made in Hong Kong or whether there are matters for concern.

I should like to refer to consultation and getting the agreement of the people of Hong Kong to the measures that we are taking. I said this on Second Reading, but it is important to re-state it. I do not believe that all the people in Hong Kong, or anywhere near the majority, really understand what is proposed and what changes will take place, particularly what status they will have and what citizenship they will be entitled to. Such matters will hit Hong Kong as the years go by.

I do not criticise the efforts that have been made so far by the assessment office and the monitoring team, but it is vital that we continue to do our best to inform, persuade, educate and argue with people in Hong Kong about what will happen. There is not necessarily a general acceptance any more than a general non-acceptance. I do not know. I am sure that, although most Hong Kong people are apprehensive and worried, they do not really have all the information that is necessary to take a considered decision. But if the measure is to succeed, it is important that by 1997 there should be a general acceptance by the people of Hong Kong about what will happen to them.

10.30 pm

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Does my hon. Friend agree that as times passes various points or issues will undoubtedly arise and that as they do they should be debated? The only way to get general agreement is by general consensus and that can only come from debate. Therefore, debates should take place periodically in the Chamber.

Dr. Marek: I agree that information should be made available, but if there is general agreement I do not see the need for a debate. I am sorry if my hon. Friend disagrees, but I have no love of being in this Chamber when everybody is agreed. We should all go home early. It is important to be here when important principles are at stake. If we agree, we should not be too long, and I shall not be too long now. It is important to be here when we disagree, as we often do, but I would not insist on debates just for the sake of them.

The hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber talked of tripartisanship. There is one Liberal Member present. It would be uncharitable of me to stick to the tenets of bipartisanship when there are other minority parties in the House. It is important that not only the Government and the Opposition but all the minority parties should be brought into the discussions. We should all be on the same side, working for a smooth transition of sovereignty from ourselves to the People's Republic of China. We should disseminate information as much as possible and learn in advance of different thinking on different Benches, so that, if possible, we can arrive at an agreed solution. If that cannot be done, clearly, as my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) said, we should have a debate to decide matters.

However, I hope that such situations will be infrequent. One of the keys to a successful transition, certainly for the people of Hong Kong, is that we have a policy which has the agreement of all parties in the House. I hope that the Government will bear that in mind. Although we must argue about some aspects, such as nationality, in the schedules, I am sure that every hon. Member will welcome clause 1.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): This is a historic and unique occasion and it would be wrong not to contribute to a debate that is of such importance to 5½ million souls in Hong Kong. Listening to the contributions this evening I am prompted to say that over the next 62 years we must be involved in a vigil for those 5½ million souls. That vigil does not end in 12 years. That vigilance, in terms of a moral responsibility, goes on and on. The link between the people of Britain and Hong Kong is far too important to believe that it can be cut off in a short period of 12 years.

Vigilance will have to be expressed through the people of Hong Kong as well as through the British people in the House of Commons and there must be an appropriate mechanism through which that vigilance is exercised. I am not particular whether the mechanism is a Select Committee or a regular debate, but the vigilance must have an expression, and an annual expression would be appropriate. The vigilance of the people of Hong Kong must be maintained and that can best be done if there is steady progress towards more direct control of their affairs over the next 12 years.

I have spoken to people in Hong Kong and I have the impression that there is much support there for a steady movement towards a greater say in their affairs and not overnight democratisation of the processes by which they live. That means a larger say for those in the middle and at the bottom of the Hong Kong social ladder and not for the most privileged. All the people of Hong Kong must have greater identification with the decisions that are made in their name over the next 12 years and we must be vigilant about their future over that period.

There must be monitoring by the British and Hong Kong peoples over the next 12 years and beyond. We shall not have much direct influence over many changes in basic law but we shall have a moral influence. In addition, we shall have a role in monitoring the implementation of the proposed process of nationality. We have seen the way in which nationality provisions often take a turn that is very different from that which was intended. There are the unintended consequences of human actions and legislation and latent Government interpretation of the law. All those who have a large immigrant population in their constituencies know the difference between individual Ministers' interpretation of the law. We must keep a close eye on the spirit of nationality law and the way in which it works through.

There will be minorities in Hong Kong who will be deeply and badly affected by the operation of the proposed nationality law. That is why there must be constant vigilance. Where grievous wrongs are identified, they must be able to be corrected. If that message goes out from the House of Commons this evening, many in Hong Kong will feel better about their future.

Our close friendship, deep interest and central responsibility will continue over the next 12 years and beyond. No people can be severed from the British nation by legislation or the stroke of a pen. The bonds of friendship and unity will continue. I hope that those who are Members of this place and those who will replace us will keep in mind our long duty to and responsibility for the people of Hong Kong far into the future.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): I also should like to welcome clause 1 and to wish the people of Hong Kong well in the process that will take them to their new status in 1997.

Success will be determined by several factors. The first is internal circumstances in Hong Kong and the development of the new system of democracy, which I, like others, welcome. That must not cause upset or disruption or fears that might affect confidence in how Hong Kong is being run. I am confident that it can and will work.

The attitude of the Government in Beijing will have a profound effect on the success of the transitional period. I shall be interested to see how sensitive to the future of Hong Kong the Beijing Government are in drawing up the basic law and in understanding how the system operates. The system is quite different from that which operates over the border and it would not be surprising if the economic life of Hong Kong were not fully understood or appreciated.

I hope that the Government will help Beijing if difficulties such as I have mentioned arise. I am sure that there is good will on both sides and that the Hong Kong Government and the Hong Kong people will be only too pleased to help the People's Republic to enable Hong Kong's economic success to be sustained.

Mr. Adley: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that there is, perhaps, a difference of view between the establishment in Hong Kong and the large number of extremely articulate young people who feel that they have not been enfranchised in any way? Is there not a danger that, by listening to the establishment, the British and Chinese Governments will fail to realise the aspirations of the young people of Hong Kong?

Mr. Wrigglesworth: I hope that the British and Chinese Governments will listen to all of the voices. I have met many young people from Hong Kong, had lively discussions with them and thoroughly enjoyed doing so. They give every hope of a dynamic and prosperous future for Hong Kong. I believe that more than 50 per cent. of the population is under 21, so the voice of that generation must be listened to. However, it is important that the more senior voices of those in prominent positions in industry, for example, should also be listened to. I am anxious that the People's Republic should understand Hong Kong's very different system when drawing up the basic law. I do not lack confidence, as China has shown such understanding in the agreement. I thought that the People's Republic would never accept such an agreement. I am therefore confident that it will be sensitive to the different system that it will have within its orbit. Nevertheless, misunderstandings could arise, and there will have to be some sensitivity towards how Hong Kong works if there is to be no damage.

It is important that Hong Kong's economic prosperity be sustained. The people of Hong Kong, especially the young ones, have become used to continuing growth such as we have not seen in Britain in post-war and many pre-war years.

It is important that the Government should help Hong Kong to sustain its trading relationships and prosperity in the transitional period because nothing would give rise to a flight from the economy and to greater damage to its prospects than a slump in its economic fortunes in that period.

It is important that the Government and Parliament should help Hong Kong to sustain its position in the transitional period. I do not believe that regular reports and debates, as has been suggested by some hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson), are the best way to do that. That might give rise to all sorts of things building up in Hong Kong. Those of us who know Hong Kong reasonably well realise that if a debate is anticipated on a set date every year and a regular report, this will lead to great build-ups. As the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) commented, if problems arise hon. Members can raise them in many different ways. This has been done in the past and the ingenuity of Members will ensure that a debate is held when problems occur.

However, that does not mean that the Government can be let off the hook and that Hong Kong's affairs should never again be debated by the House. There must be debates, but I do not like the idea of a regular debate and report which would entail discussion of Hong Kong whether or not it was necessary.

Mr. George Robertson: Although there are undoubted dangers involved in the high expectations raised in Hong Kong by parliamentary debates, it would be equally dangerous to allow a number of issues to drift along on the tide of speculation without an opportunity being afforded to raise them in Parliament. It might be preferable to have something that people could observe as an authoritative sounding board rather than reading 70 newspapers juggling round the various factors involved.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: I can see that, but it is a balance of judgment. Indeed, I do not wish matters to be brushed under the carpet or misunderstandings to occur because the House has no opportunity to discuss the affairs of Hong Kong, but the press in Hong Kong, of which many hon. Members have had experience, can be very excitable; it may misinterpret what happens in Parliament and, indeed, may expect too much of Parliament. It is not wise therefore to build up expectations unnecessarily. In my judgment, it would not be helpful for Parliament to debate and to produce reports on Hong Kong regularly. Those hon. Members who take a close interest in these matters will ensure that the subject of Hong Kong is raised in Parliament in the period up to 1997 and that its progress will be monitored carefully.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Richard Luce): As the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) and my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) said, clause 1 is the central provision of the Bill. It provides for the termination of British sovereignty over the ceded parts of Hong Kong and the termination of British jurisdiction over the whole territory from 1 July 1997. It is therefore appropriate that the Committee should have decided to debate the matter for over an hour, raising issues that go wider than clause 1.

I appreciate the way in which the House has approached the Bill and the future of Hong Kong and, above all, the common strand that comes through of the desire to see confidence in Hong Kong. That was the clear desire on both sides of the House.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Hamilton for welcoming the time lag between the Second Reading and Committee stages which we effected after listening carefully to the suggestions that he and other hon. Members made that there should be more time to consider the Bill before the Committee stage. I shall try to answer the points raised as clearly as I can to enable the Committee to proceed to the other issues.

The point that has come through most strongly tonight, as on Second Reading, is the question of accountability to the House. My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary and I have given this a great deal of thought. As hon. Members will recall, on Second Reading we had considerable reservations about having an institutionalised system in the form of an annual report and debate. We thought that that would not necessarily accord with the demands of the situation. It is worth recalling, too, that this is the third debate on Hong Kong in two months, although I appreciate that there are special reasons for that which will not apply in future years.

My right hon. and learned Friend and I have responded to the views of Members in all parts of the House in deciding that an annual report on Hong Kong will be produced by the Government and laid before Parliament. The exact form has not yet been decided and the matter is to be discussed further with the Governor of Hong Kong, but it is expected to include a general account of developments in Hong Kong during the preceding year.

The hon. Members for Hamilton, for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), for Wrexham (Dr. Marek), for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Mr. Johnston) and for Bolton, South-East (Mr. Young) have all raised important points. The Select Committee on Foreign Affairs is bound to take a close interest and the Government stand ready to co-operate with it. If it wishes to look into issues from time to time, we shall do our best to co-operate.

As to whether there should be a debate on the annual report, the House may wish to judge whether a debate is desirable or useful in the light of the report. If the House takes that view the matter can then be pursued through the usual channels. Equally, the Government or the House may judge on some other occasion that a debate should take place because something special has arisen.

I hope that my comments will be of some help to the House and will show that it is the Government's desire to co-operate as best we can. I appreciate the importance of the House continuing to take a strong interest in Hong Kong throughout the period in which the Government have a clear responsibility for Hong Kong, certainly until 1 July 1997.

The hon. Members for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber and for Hamilton referred to the basic law. The situation in that respect has not changed substantially since Second Reading. Drafting the basic law is clearly a matter for the Chinese Government, but they have made it absolutely clear that they will consult Hong Kong opinion on a wide basis. The mechanics of the consultation are not yet clear and this is a matter for the Chinese Government, but we welcome the fact that they have expressed the clear intention to consult Hong Kong opinion.

The hon. Member for Hamilton referred to international trade agreements. As he knows, provision is made for the special administrative region to continue with very important agreements such as the GATT, and the provisions for the Joint Liaison Group specifically mention the need to discuss how special arrangements can continue for GATT and other international agreements.

The hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) spoke of the Hong Kong economy, which is doing extremely well in terms of growth and exports. I am sure that continuity of international agreements is an important factor in that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) and the hon. Members for Stockton, South and for Huddersfield talked about democratic institutions and the pace of progress in that respect. As the House knows, the first indirect elections will take place in September this year for part of the Legislative Assembly. Looking back to the debate of 5 December and to Second Reading, I believe that it is the general view of the House that it is best to proceed cautiously towards the fullest degree of democratic accountability by the Executive, and that is what we are doing, taking the views of the people of Hong Kong very much into account. As the House also knows, there will be a further review of the democratic institutions and the constitution in 1987 in the light of the experience of indirect elections in the next two years. Obviously, the House and, above all, the people of Hong Kong will have another opportunity to express their views.

The hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) raised an important point about Vietnamese refugees, of which I am aware. It has a bearing on this legislation because it also affects the confidence of the people in Hong Kong. I did not answer him on Second Reading because of the lack of time. We give the matter high priority. There are still 11,900 Vietnamese refugees in Hong Kong. I pay tribute to the people and Government of Hong Kong for the way in which they have tackled this major problem. They have coped with no fewer than 100,000 refugees since 1979, and they have done an admirable job in extremely difficult circumstances. The Sub-Committee of the Select Committee on Home Affairs is taking evidence on that. I gave evidence this week. We look forward with great interest to its report.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: On 25 July the Minister gave me an extremely informative analysis of the present population of Hong Kong. One of the sections referred to 4,500 stateless persons of non-Chinese race, most of whom originate from Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia. Does the 100,000 that he mentioned include that figure, or is that figure included in the 95,000 other foreign nationals?

Mr. Luce: Those 4,500 people are quite separate. At present they are stateless people. I think that 11,900 people are classified as refugees, who are foreign nationals. I am subject to correction on that. They are the clear responsibility of both the Hong Kong and British Governments, and it is our objective to find a durable solution to the problem.

My hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) made an extremely important point about the officers in Her Majesty's Overseas Civil Service in Hong Kong. He reminded the House that he served in the Overseas Civil Service, as I did. The agreement on the future of Hong Kong provides satisfactorily for the continuity of service by serving officers in the public services in Hong Kong on terms and conditions, including pay and pensions, no less favourable than on the 30 June 1997. Those provisions apply to members of the Overseas Civil Service serving in Hong Kong and other civil servants. The resumption of sovereignty over Hong Kong by the People's Republic of China raises similar issues in respect of the Overseas Civil Service, as independence has in other dependent territories. With that in our minds, we address ourselves to questions about their futures. I know that my hon. Friend will retain a close interest.

Mr. Stanbrook: I shall certainly do that. However, with respect, my hon. Friend has not grasped the point, which is that once the documents are exchanged and the Bill is enacted the conditions of service for all expatriate officers serving in Hong Kong will have been changed because from then onwards the policy will naturally be to promote as many people of Chinese origin as possible. That will mean that, if the qualifications of an expatriate and local officer are equal, when they apply for a post, the local officer will almost certainly be promoted. That has an adverse effect on career prospects, with a subsequent loss of morale, unless such staff now receive the sort of guarantees of security which others have had in colonies in the past.

Mr. Luce: I appreciate my hon. Friend's point. The Hong Kong Government are reviewing the number of people in the Overseas Civil Service in Hong Kong, and they will consider the numbers in the years to come. I assure my hon. Friend that we take his points on board and that we are considering those matters urgently.

I have tried to answer the debate as best I can. I hope that I have answered it sufficiently to be able to commend the clause to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 1 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 2 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Schedule

Supplementary Provisions

11 pm

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 2, line 9, leave out paragraph 2.

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Harold Walker): With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 2 and the following amendments:

No. 3, in page 2, line 17, leave out
'new form of British nationality' and insert 'status'.

No. 4, in page 2, line 18, at end insert
'and
(c) a British Dependent Territory citizen who has a connection with Hong Kong may have the option of being given a multiple access visa stamp in any existing British Dependent Territory passport'.

No. 5, in page 2, line 18, at end insert—
'(c) persons possessing that status may obtain a travel document.'.

Mr. Powell: I have the honour to move the amendments also on behalf of right hon. and hon. Members of the official Opposition.

Earlier, the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) informed the Committee how closely in Hong Kong the proceedings on this subject in the House are followed. I can verify that from some information which the hon. Gentleman gave me, and which I hope he does not mind me quoting. He told me that when, on examining the Order Paper, my name was seen to be not only there but above the name of the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey), a frisson of alarm ran through the population of that colony. The hon. Gentleman confirms what I say. Therefore, it is incumbent upon me to do my best to damp down those anxieties by explaining that there is a simple reason for this unusual juxtaposition; I got there first.

As you will realise, Mr. Deputy Speaker, in the group of amendments that you have so wisely recommended the Committee to take together, two separate matters are raised. One is raised by the amendment that I have just moved, and on which I understand it is in order for the entire debate to take place—that the alterations in our law of citizenship, which are authorised by paragraph 2(2) of the Schedule to be made by Order in Council, should be made by substantive legislation. Only substantive legislation can permit the careful examination, clause by clause and detail by detail, of a change in the law on so important a matter. Apart from alterations from time to time in schedules to British nationality legislation, I believe I am right in saying that at no time has an alteration been made in the law of British nationality than by substantive legislation.

Therefore, I was happy to join the official Opposition in urging upon the Government that, instead of proceeding by Order in Council under this paragraph of the schedule, they should proceed by legislation. If they are anxious about time, in recognition of the importance of the subject, no doubt the House would be willing to facilitate the consideration of a Bill, which would be the only proper way to do it.

Perhaps a bargain has been struck between the Government and the Opposition Front Bench. I do not know. Perhaps the Opposition Front Bench——

Mr. George Robertson: No.

Mr. Powell: The hon. Member for Hamilton says no, and of course I accept that immediately. But suspicions keep recurring in one's mind, especially when one realises how difficult it is for an Opposition, in the circumstances of the present Opposition, to provide themselves with sufficient troops to carry a point to a Division and to make a reasonable showing in the Lobby. I realise that I am considering a theoretical possibility, but the Government might make the suggestion that a special procedure might be followed—indeed, this was mentioned in the debate on Second Reading—to facilitate the consideration of the Order in Council which the paragraph envisages. A green-edged, green Green Paper or something of the sort might be considered.

An hon. Member from Northern Ireland is qualified respectfully to advise the Committee on this point of procedure. We have the misfortune, under direct rule, that substantive law is made for the Province under Order in Council. However, the extreme severity of that method is modified by the fact that it is normally, although not invariably, the practice to publish what are called proposals for a draft Order in Council. If the Government were to say that they had something of that kind in mind, it might go some way to assuage the anxieties in the mind of the Opposition, and I would urge caution. The existence of a document that is not itself a draft of an Order in Council makes it possible for that document to be discussed, and for differences to be made in that document and in the eventual draft when it is made, without the Government appearing to lose face as they would do if they had to withdraw a draft and replace it by another.

However, I am afraid that whatever the good will with which this operation is conducted, and however frank and candid the discussions that take place, either in the course of the debate or more informally on such a document as proposals for a draft Order in Council, it is impossible, by the nature of the document, for the House to have the opportunity of considering severally the several aspects of the changes in law that are brought about. Even if the Government, as I hope that they will, go at least as far as to say that they will publish the draft Order in Council in proposal form, and give the House the opportunity to debate those proposals, I would still say, and place on record, that it is an unsatisfactory method of proceeding in legislating for citizenship.

The other topic is the new form of British nationality that is envisaged in paragraph 2 of the schedule, from which amendment 3 results. There is a curious story that lies behind the paradoxical proposal of Her Majesty's Government that, on relinquishing sovereignty over Hong Kong, a new sort of British nationality should be invented to be conferred upon up to 3 million of the present inhabitants of that colony. This is an act so paradoxical and so curious that it naturally provokes a certain conjecture as to how it might have come about. I have done a little careful, microscopic reading of the White Paper, which is one of the few public documents that we have to enable us to reconstruct the processes that may have preceded this extraordinary outcome.

There were such processes, and they were difficult processes. Earlier in these debates, we were told that the present proposals are the ninth in the series, there having been eight previous proposals that, for one reason or another, failed to stand up to whatever considerations were brought to bear on them. The Committee would do well to look carefully at the references to this proposal in the White Paper.

As you appreciate, Mr. Walker, the arrangements for a change in British nationality are no part of our agreement with the Government of the People's Republic of China. They are merely dealt with in an associated exchange of memoranda, which is the crosshead to paragraphs 62-65, the last paragraphs of the White Paper. The first three of those four paragraphs describe the position of Her Majesty's Government on the subject. Paragraph 65, the last — of Revelations, one might say — describes the Chinese position, and sheds a little more light upon the story that lies behind the curious and paradoxical proposal that we are considering. May I read it to the Committee, with commentary.

"The Chinese memorandum states the Chinese Government's position that Hong Kong Chinese are Chinese nationals."

Certainly. That is self-evident and follows logically of its own accord. It is in accordance with that that

"British Dependent Territories citizenship cannot be retained or acquired on or after the relevant date by virtue of a connection with Hong Kong."

Since Hong Kong is no longer a dependent territory, no doubt the Chinese pointed out that it would be inappropriate—because they are not entirely insensitive to the nuances even of the English language; they are subtle interpreters of language and its implications—for that status to be retained. Accordingly, and very necessarily and logically, we conceded that point in paragraph 2(1)(a) of the schedule. The White Paper continues:

"It"—

that is the Chinese Government—

"indicates, however".

May I pause there for a moment. Why do the Chinese Government indicate when they have stated their position that Hong Kong Chinese are Chinese nationals? I should be glad to hear whether the Minister and his advisers think that there is any difference of emphasis or nuance between the words "state" and "indicate". At least "indicate" is a much more general and a much more stand-offish expression that a statement on the part of a Government. But what is it that the Chinese Government, we are told, indicate?

"It indicates, however, that those Chinese nationals who hold British travel documents may continue to use them after 1 July 1997".

That is all that the Chinese said—rather, indicated. I must not get it wrong. The Chinese indicated that their own nationals who happen to have British travel documents may continue to use them after 1997.

Mr. Adley: The right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) refers quite properly to the difference between "indicate" and "state". He used the words "paradoxical" and "curious". Will the right hon. Gentleman agree with me that the Bill does not seek in any way to confer United Kingdom citizenship upon 3 million people but that it is trying to supply the citizens of Hong Kong with some form of legitimate document to enable them to travel outwith Hong Kong but not to reside in the United Kingdom? Does the right hon. Gentleman think that that is a legitimate objective for the Government to try to achieve?

Mr. Powell: The intervention of the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) has allowed me to anticipate exactly the next stage of my argument. I have succeeded, I hope, in establishing that the Chinese Government indicated that so far as they were concerned they would have no objection if their nationals who could get hold of them got hold of British travel documents and used them, except in the circumstances that are set out in the remainder of the paragraph. Therefore, one naturally asks what we are doing in implementation of this understanding to provide those persons who have hitherto had a curious sort of citizenship, British dependent territories citizenship, with British travel documents.

Why is it that this Order in Council is not an Order in Council that will create a status of those who can have a British travel document? As the hon. Member for Christchurch said, it does not confer United Kingdom citizenship. There is a reason for that. There is no such thing in our law as United Kingdom citizenship. But it does something perilously close to what the hon. Gentleman was indicating — I have used the word myself! It creates a new form of British nationality. So it confers British nationality. Perhaps the Minister will explain — it would be most interesting, and would be quoted in future textbooks on the law of British nationality, some of which will I hope be written by my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) —that it is impossible for this country to give anyone a travel document that could be described as a British travel document without conferring British nationality on him.

I have offered the Minister the opportunity to prepare himself to meet that daunting inquisition by placing upon the Order Paper illustrations of how an Order in Council might have been empowered by the schedule to give the Government the power to issue British travel documents conferring certain rights in British consulates and so on to persons of a defined class or status. But that is not what is happening. That is what the Chinese indicated they would put up with. But instead of that we have invented a new form of what, over and over again, we go out of our way to call British nationality, in order to confer it upon up to 3 million of the inhabitants of Hong Kong to be enjoyed by them after the cession of the territory. I do not think that I exaggerate in describing that as a most paradoxical and curious proposal.

I wish to go a little further into what might be the reasons for that proposal. Presumably someone did not think that a British travel document was good enough. Someone was dissatisfied with a British travel document. Who was it? Who said, "No, that won't do. That's not good enough. We want British nationality."? Who insisted on British nationality being conferred on up to 3 million of the Hong Kong people? It was not the People's Republic of China. Indeed, the astonishment is that its national sensibilities were not offended by the Government openly conferring British nationality on up to 3 million of its Chinese nationals. But I shall come shortly to why their offence was not carried to a point of mortal objection, although that objection may after all be concealed. We may one day find that that repugnance is concealed under the very cautious words of the "indication" in paragraph 65 of the White Paper, which does not go to say that the Chinese Government take no objection to our conferring British nationality upon their nationals.

So who was it? There is only one cui bono here, and that is the Hong Kong people themselves—those whom we were anxious to carry along with us in the general agreement, and who were able to persuade us not to rest satisfied with providing them with what the Chinese indicated they might have, but to provide them openly and expressly with British nationality and passports. That is the terminology. From their point of view what was the difference? The Government have explained to the House that there is no difference, and that the new-fangled sort of British nationality will confer no sorts of rights except those that a travel document would confer. Why, then, was it so important to the people of Hong Kong to be given what is described as British passports and British nationality?

The answer is that they believe that, armed with that, in certain circumstances they can mobilise opinion inside and outside this country to enforce on a future Government of this country the concession of rights which do not attach to that status but which, it will be argued, are the natural implications of anything which is called a British passport or British nationality. If that is how it looks from the point of view of the Hong Kong people. I find it a little sinister that as yet it has excited no repugnance on the part of the People's Republic of China.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): Is it not equally plausible that the reason why the citizens of Hong Kong sought this additional phraseology is that they believe that the travel document to which they would become entitled would receive more respect from those countries which they might wish to enter carrying that document if it contained that additional phraseology?

Mr. Powell: We know that this form of British nationality will confer no additional rights on them. It is in the power and capabilities of the House to confer on Her Majesty's Government the right and power to produce the most impressive documents, loaded with all sorts of minatory and monitory abjurations to those before whom they might come.

That could be done almost in the style of the old passports which we used to be so proud to carry, in which Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State called upon all kinds of lesser breeds without the law to extend all sorts of courtesies and protection to those who travelled under that illustrious patronage.

There would be no difficulty in doing that. The point is—and the people of whom I speak are by no means lacking in shrewdness—that they perceived that there was an essential difference for certain purposes between having British nationality and just having what the Chinese Government had indicated that they would not object to. Therefore, I return to the question: why did the Chinese Government not object to our going out of our way, beyond what they had conceded, to confer our nationality on their nationals?

I believe that they believed that for them, too, it might be convenient one day. They thought that if one day they found themselves somewhat embarrassed by some of the people in this category, it might be easier, more expeditious and more comfortable to dispose of them under the description — which we could not deny because it would have been our description—of British nationals than if they were merely Chinese nationals who held British travel documents.

A fraud is being perpetrated by three parties in league together. One is the Foreign Office, as usual. I think I see the Minister shaking his head in dissent at that reference to the Foreign Office. I should have thought that he had been there long enough to have found that out by now. The second is the People's Republic of China and the third are the representatives of the Hong Kong people who have been engaged in these negotiations.

They have put their heads together and have cooked this up to deceive the House and the people whom we represent, to deceive the House into supporting that nothing of any importance or significance, nothing that may ever rebound on them in the future, is being done or is being proposed. That is being done, and we should have the opportunity—in the form of considering this matter in legislative terms—to expose it further than I have been able to do in the debate on the schedule. At least, for the record, I have put it in evidence.

Mr. George Robertson: The right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) has created a climate of hostility to the cause he has promoted by the very fact that he has promoted it. I believe that, 8,500 miles away, the people of Hong Kong do not treat the matter lightly. We have heard, as ever, an interesting exploration of the logic and illogic that can be demonstrated by a master of the art, building one premise on the other and coming to an inexorable conclusion which we all know instictively to be wrong.

The right hon. Member did the cause of an important principle a grave disservice by the accusation that he flung at the perpetrators of this "fraud". I am glad that I was left out of the catalogue of those who seemed to be involved in this deception of the House of Commons. This is the Committee stage, and the right hon. Gentleman has the right to re-enter the debate any time he chooses. Perhaps, by the end of my speech, I shall be added to the pantheon of those who would perpetrate this historic fraud.

On Wednesday 23 January the press comments collected by the Hong Kong Government for the benefit of hon. Members reported:

> "Sing Pao and Sing Tao Jih Pao reported that five MPs including George Robertson"—

I like the order in which the names are listed—

> "Denis Healey, Enoch Powell and Donald Anderson would seek amendments to the Bill at the committee stage to require a debate in both Houses of Parliament on the nationality of Hong Kong residents. Sing Tao quoted sources close to the House of Commons as saying that the chance of success of these amendments was very remote because experience showed that Bills were normally passed without amendments at the committee stage."

It is interesting to note that the Chinese language newspapers have managed to look carefully at practically all the legislation—

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: Not the Representation of the People Act.

Mr. Robertson: —with the exception of the Representation of the People Act, which comes up for later consideration.

The right hon. Member for South Down made the valid point—some of my hon. Friends will make that same point later—that the way in which the Government have chosen to create a new nationality has disturbing implications. It is true that never before has Parliament created a new nationality by means of an Order in Council. There are good precedents in statute law showing that nationality should be created by amendable legislation—legislation which is capable of being scrutinised and which has the safeguard of being difficult to pass through the House of Commons and, therefore, is not lightly undertaken by any Government.

The Bill creates a new nationality and that is a major and serious matter. There is an increasing number of nationalities and they were all enshrined in the British Nationality Act 1981 which received the detailed scrutiny of the House, and which contrary to reports in the Sing Pao newspaper was amended substantially in Committee.

11.30 pm

My final objection is that anything that is created by statutory instrument or Order in Council can be easily amended or removed if circumstances change. It provides inadequate long-term security for those people fortunate or unfortunate enough to find themselves under the title designated within the Order in Council.

Those are serious objections to the way in which the Government have chosen to create this new nationality, and it is only right as the right hon. Member for South Down fairly said to place those objections on the record. The official Opposition might be prepared not to divide the Committee on this central issue, but with those words I have no doubt entered the list of those involved in the gigantic fraud.

The first precondition to the Committee accepting that exception to the normal rule has been conceded by the Government in their amendment No. 2 by which it is proposed to include the nomenclature of the new nationality in the Bill. A further assurance must be given by the Government on that exceptional circumstance before the official Opposition will be persuaded that to divide the House might not be in the best interests of those affected by the Bill.

The Government must assure the Committee that the Order in Council will not be dealt with in the conventional way and that a draft of the draft statutory instrument will be available to the House and the people of Hong Kong which should preferably be debated in the House before the final draft statutory instrument is laid before the House. That would provide an opportunity to scrutinise the detailed nationality proposals so that hon. Members and those people who will be affected can express their views. It would also give the House a better opportunity to express strong views on the contents of the statutory instrument than the more limited opportunity available when a draft statutory instrument is laid before the House.

The Government must provide sufficient time between the various stages of the legislation to allow those people who are unaware of Parliament's intricacies to discuss the Government's proposals and to rehearse their arguments of the past 10 days more pointedly as the new passports will be available long before 1997.

The Committee expects an assurance from the Government this evening — I accept the limitations placed on any Government committing themselves and their successors—that any future changes in the Bill will not be effected simply by an Order in Council.

I have no doubt that the forensic skills of the right hon. Member for South Down will be applied to my plea that the limitations are considerable. However, the people of Hong Kong have a right to expect this from the Government who gave them the assurance in the first place and who negotiated the joint agreement and its annexes. They have the right to expect that in the foreseeable future the British Parliament will not indulge in any changes to the nationality based on temporary circumstances.

The other factors that would lead the Opposition not to divide the Committee are largely conditioned by opinion as expressed in Hong Kong. There are no fully democratic institutions in Hong Kong, and we are therefore at a disadvantage in expecting views to come forward with great authority, but inasmuch as opinion has been expressed, it appears to be in favour of the methods adopted by the Government in the Bill. However, I have a suspicion that the enthusiasm for the Order in Council has less to do with the constitutional mechanism put forward by the Government than a faith in the Government who gave the promise and a fear of the Parliament that includes the right hon. Member for South Down.

Mr. Bermingham: A new form of nationality will be created by Order in Council. I agree that the matter should be debated, and primary legislation rather than an Order in Council should be used. Does my hon. Friend agree that the new form of nationality creates a situation analogous to that in east Africa, in respect of those who are not ethnic Chinese in Hong Kong? I understand that there are some 6,000 Indians, for example, who might find themselves in the invidious position in which the Asians found themselves in east Africa, at a future juncture. That, too, should be covered by the orders that we make.

Mr. Robertson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I shall come to some of the details. I am now dealing with the principle. My hon. Friend made a point about some of the ethnic minorities in Hong Kong. In fact, he is referring not to the 6,000 people of Indian origin, but to their children after 1997, but I shall cover that point later. It is extremely important.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): This was a matter that was raised in earlier debates and I think that the figure was 6,000 Indians. It is nothing to do with their children. It is Indians who are living possibly outwith Hong Kong at the moment, but are under the Hong Kong legislation as it presently exists, as the responsibility of the British Government. I understood from a commitment that the Minister gave excellently that those people's interests would be covered—I hope that the Minister will nod his head—by the arrangements that were being made.

Mr. Robertson: I have a faint feeling that that question was directed not to me but to the Minister——

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): He nodded his head.

Mr. Robertson: The Minister nodded his head in reply in the time-honoured fashion of Parliament. We shall come to that matter. I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Warley, East (Mr. Faulds) that I shall be looking for precisely the same assurances that he is seeking.

I return to the reasons, Sir Paul. I apologise for the fact that in my intervention on clause stand part I omitted your knighthood, which is an honour well earned.

For whatever reason, opinion as expressed in Hong Kong has crystallised round the idea of the Order in Council. It is a fact that there would be a misunderstanding that would be difficult to clear up if we were to seek to divide the House on this important issue. In many ways I regret that those misunderstandings have arisen. I regret that different views are now held about a constitutional and procedural issue in that regard, but we must live with it. The general non-partisan view that has been taken of the Bill up to now might conceivably be damaged if we were to seek to divide the House on a point of principle this evening.

The final reason on which I base my case for not contesting the Bill, although placing our reservations on record, is the fact that there are unique circumstances in Hong Kong. This is a unique agreement, a unique joint declaration and a unique situation will apply after 1997. Perhaps it is to expect too much that uniqueness itself will be a protection in future which can be discounted when precedent is quoted against us. It is a reality that we must live with and we should bear it seriously in mind.

A number of detailed questions have been asked in Hong Kong and I am sure that the Minister would want to give some assurances to the House this evening. The Legislative Council had a debate less than 24 hours ago in Hong Kong. It raised a number of points and I see from the telex today from the Hong Kong office that the Hong Kong Chief Secretary gave a number of interesting reassurances in that debate. It is right that some of those matters should be raised here so that the Minister, with whom the buck stops, can authoritatively tell the House and those who are watching us what the position is.

First, there is the question of the acceptability of the new British national overseas passports in third countries. That has arisen on many occasions in the Hong Kong press and was mentioned during the debate in the Legislative Council. The Government are in no position to give absolute guarantees and it would be unrealistic to expect them to do so. On the other hand we have a right to ask the Government what they are doing to ensure that the new passport will be acceptable to immigration officers all over the world. Specifically, what will the Government do as a gesture to show that acceptability should be the norm? Will the Government make entry into the United Kingdom by British national overseas passport holders visa free? Will they give them unrestricted entry and exit? Without that it is difficult to see other countries giving open entry and exit.

The second point is the question of identity cards being required alongside the passport in order to prove that the holder of the British national overseas passport has the right of abode in Hong Kong. That was not cleared up on Second Reading and it has concerned people in Hong Kong newspapers and in the Legislative Council yesterday. There is some confusion which was not cleared up by the Chief Secretary. Yesterday, he drew attention to section 14 of annexe 1 to the Sino-British joint declaration which provides for the holding of permanent identity cards to be stated in the future BNO passports as evidence of right of abode, and said that Her Majesty's Government would be discussing with the Chinese authorities the wording of the statement with a view to ensuring that BNO passport holders would not have to produce their identity cards for immigration clearance.

The confusion is illustrated by a variety of statements that appeared to be emanating from authoritative sources. Some newspapers in Hong Kong on Monday 28 January quoted Principal Assistant Secretary for Security, Regina Ip, who said that local residents would not need to take with them their Hong Kong identity cards when travelling abroad to prove that they had the right of abode in Hong Kong as that would be stated in the new British national overseas passports. She added, interestingly, that the United Kingdom Government would seek an agreement from other countries for the exemption of visas after the new nationality title was approved. It would be interesting to have the Minister's comments on that.

Mr. Stanbrook: Is the hon. Gentleman not ignoring the fact that after 1997 those to whom he is referring will be entitled to travel with British national overseas passports and will have an entitlement also to carry with them Chinese passports? Would they not be acceptable around the world by then? Why should he be so concerned about the acceptability of a species of British nationality passport which we all know is not 100 per cent. British?

Mr. Robertson: The form of passport that they will hold as Chinese nationals has not yet been resolved. They will have the right to carry a special administrative region identity card. The question whether one document will suffice seems to be taxing the people of Hong Kong. I am expressing anxieties that seem to be the subject of wide expression in Hong Kong. It appears that they wish to know whether they will be able to use one passport or the equivalent of two passports to prove that they have the right of abode in Hong Kong. As this is a source of anxiety and concern in Hong Kong, it is something that can be clarified only by the Minister when he replies rather than by his proxies on the Legislative Council in Hong Kong.

I am sure that the right hon. Member for South Down will find enormous interest in the debate which has taken place in the Chinese press over the Chinese interpretation of the new nomenclature. The translation from the English of "British national overseas", which seems remarkably clumsy in any event, appears to create some bizarre formulation which is not comprehensible in my pronunciation. The Chinese writing apparently creates confusion between the words "nationals", "citizens" and "subjects". We are told the Left-wing lawyer Dorothy Liu has been quoted as saying that it would be more appropriate to translate "British national overseas" as— there then follows a string of Chinese characters. The literal British translation of those characters is "British (overseas) subjects". The commentary of Wen Wei Po— that is a pro-Chinese newspaper in Hong Kong—quoted an English/Chinese dictionary and stated that the word "national" means — there then follows a string of hieroglyphics—

"(subject of a country, in particular those living overseas)."

It is said that Miss Liu's proposed translation could reflect the spirit of the proposed declaration more accurately but there is at least some room for confusion. It is conceivable that the title "British national overseas" was devised out of a knowledge of the Chinese language rather than out of a use of the English language.

Mr. Adley: May we not deduce from what the hon. Gentleman has said the very point that I tried to make in the previous debate, which was that we should not make an attempt to write in too much detail at this stage, which would risk the sort of misinterpretation which he has well illustrated? We all understand the fears and concerns of those in Hong Kong, but does the hon. Gentleman agree that some of those who have been pressing so hard for so much seem still to fail to realise the difficulties in nuance that could result from pressing for too much too precisely and too quickly in the way that the hon. Gentleman has illustrated?

Mr. Robertson: That is one version. The hon. Gentleman has a long pedigree in terms of Chinese relations. The problem is that the people who are creating the confusion are on his side of the argument. I agree that we must not allow ourselves to get too bogged down or encourage people in Hong Kong to get too bogged down with detail when their futures must be based on trust. Nevertheless, we are dealing with a Bill that concerns nationality, which people in Hong Kong deem important. If there is confusion, the Government should make the matter clear.

The Government have given guarantees for people who, without the agreement, would appear to end up with no form of statehood. We are told that they are to be given British overseas citizenship. The paradox is that, in one respect, the Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants finds itself in the camp of the right hon. Member for South Down. I am sure that is the first time that that has happened. The council has made it clear that British national overseas and British overseas citizenship are not really nationalities but travel documents. I hope that the Minister is now better able to identify his plans to deal with the 6,000 prominent non-ethnic Chinese British dependent territory citizens who happen to be of Indian origin, and others who will find that they are stateless after 1997. They need reassurance from the Government tonight.

The Minister has said that he seeks a durable solution for the Vietnamese refugees in Hong Kong. The sooner we hear what that solution is, the better. I pay tribute to the Government of Hong Kong for its treatment of the 100,000 boat people who fled Vietnam. The residual problems of the 10,000 who remain, however difficult, cannot detract from the huge humanitarian effort that the Hong Kong Government mounted. My hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) and I visited a camp and saw the pitiful conditions. The people there do not benefit from the stability and prosperity of the free enterprise system of Hong Kong. They have little past and a bleak future. The House should give them early assurances about their future.

We must consider those who are able, because of their Government service, to register for full British citizenship. The Government have said that they will be generous with people, especially in the security services, who might have reason to fear the transfer of sovereignty. The Government have not been specific about the numbers who might be involved and the extent of the generosity that might be accorded. We know from what we are told that a number of people are very apprehensive about the future. Given that the generosity of the Government in this regard has not been notable in the past, some further assurances this evening would go a long way to reassure them that their future is guaranteed.

These are a few of the questions and issues that have been raised in Hong Kong to which the Committee deserves answers this evening. I ask them in no controversial or combative way. These matters need to be put on record, and a much wider public outside is waiting for the answers.

Mr. Michael Marshall (Arundel): I am glad to follow the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) and, indeed, the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), because, in the course of their contributions, a number of points were raised which, in a sense, broadened the queries that I seek to pursue in relation to amendment No 4 standing in my name. In tabling the amendment, I had no prior knowledge of amendment No 2. I am in some difficulty in judging precisely the effect of amendment No 2. I am sure that when my hon. Friend the Minister replies he will want to take into account not only some of the questions that have been raised so far, but, I hope, what I am about to put to him. The suggestion encompassed in amendment No 4, in the light of some of the problems about which the right hon. and hon. Gentlemen have spoken, I hope will contribute to overcoming some of those difficulties.

The right hon. Member for South Down in his waspish and witty way was pointing to some unanswerable questions in my view. There are practical issues involved here, on which he touched, and I should like to think that what I am about to outline will provide a practical way out of some of the difficulties.

In my view, we are now in danger of getting slightly confused about which kind of passport and what sort of citizen we are referring to. What I have referred to in amendment No 4 as British dependent territory citizen passport (Hong Kong), to give it its full title, I shall refer to as BDTC for the purpose of my remarks. I recognise, however, that if Government amendment No 2 is agreed to, we shall be talking about BNO passports.

With relation to BDTC passports, and to put that into perspective, on the figures given to me by the Hong Kong Government Office in the helpful briefing that was arranged, I note that that covers current holders of just over one million and, for those eligible but who have not yet applied, two million. It is the largest group of passport holders in Hong Kong and is to be contrasted with the 18,000 British citizen passports of those who have the right of abode in the United Kingdom as opposed to the figure of some three million who have the right of abode currently in Hong Kong but not the right of abode in the United Kingdom, although they have the rights of access. To round off those categories, there are travel documents covering an additional one million people mainly through certificates of identity.

The purpose of amendment No. 4 is to facilitate the entry into the United Kingdom of those Hong Kong Chinese residents who in my judgment have a particular role in the relationship between our two countries. This tends to be a matter of the frequency of visits of many of the people whom I have in mind. Secondly, I seek to help create a system which recognises the needs not only of those who travel backwards and forwards between Hong Kong and this country at present, but, even more important, of those who will do so after 1997. Thirdly, I should like to think that what I suggest would help to begin a process of accreditation which will influence the thinking not only about visitors from Hong Kong but British visitors to Hong Kong and the People's Republic of China in the years after 1997.

My concerns in putting forward the suggestion stemmed from two sources. One was the visit that many hon. Members paid in recent weeks to Hong Kong, courtesy of the Hong Kong Government, during which we learned of some of the practical problems. The second arises — and I declare my interest as parliamentary adviser to Cable and Wireless Ltd—from some of the examples of difficulties which, as I know from my experience, Cable and Wireless and other companies deeply involved with Hong Kong and China have had in the past.

The problem to which I refer relates essentially to BDTC passport holders coming to this country on a regular basis who find themselves constantly subject to quizzing and cross-examination as to the purpose of their visits. They are not included in statistics which merely show those refused entry. It is not just a matter of immigration officers who may have got out of the wrong side of bed. For the perfectly legitimate visitor, a dialogue of misunderstanding may occur that is time-consuming and causes disproportionate offence to many people who have important reasons to visit this country, especially in the pursuit of trade and investment between Hong Kong and the United Kingdom.

12 midnight

The problem is not confined to business visitors. My attention has been drawn to the number of Hong Kong officials who have also been required to explain in considerable detail why they visit this country so regularly and the exact purpose of their visits.

It seems to me that one way out of the problem would be for those who have reason to visit this country regularly to have that acknowledged in their travel document by an unlimited access stamp. I freely admit that I have followed the American example in this. In exchanges with my hon. Friend the Minister, who was kind enough to write to me after Second Reading, a certain amount of misunderstanding seems to have crept in. I may have contributed to that by using the word "visa". The present BDTC passport allows unlimited access. I merely suggest putting a stamp into that passport or its successor passport. That is not a visa system, because the process is voluntary. There has been careful consideration of words in many speeches today, so perhaps I should refer to a "multiple access stamp" and thus avoid any suggestion of a move away from existing rights, which is not my purpose at all.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will also tell us whether in the light of the latest advice from Hong Kong, following the debate there, there is to be an absolutely straightforward transfer as between BDTC and BNO passport holders on the right of access though not the right of residence. The comments that have come out of the message to Mr. Colvin Haye in the recent debate in Hong Kong seems to throw some doubt on that. I think that the only clarification given related to entry certificates. On the assumption that the current BDTC privileges in terms of United Kingdom entry would be transferred to the BNO passport, the procedure that I suggest would apply equally to the latter.

The problem that I have described has wider implications. The hon. Member for Hamilton referred to the acceptance of Hong Kong citizens' rights by third countries. There is an interesting difference in the figures that I gave earlier as between British citizen passports and BDTC passports. Some 104 countries allow entry on the basis of a British citizen passport with visa and 70 allow entry without visa for BDTC Hong Kong passport holders. In other words, some 34 countries will accept a British citizen passport but not a BDTC passport without a visa. Those countries include Austria, Brazil, Denmark, West Germany, Japan, Bermuda, Spain and Sweden. Therefore if my suggestion were to become part of the standard practice, I would expect the Government to seek reciprocity, certainly from other members of the European Community and from the Commonwealth. The people about whom I am especially concerned are involved in international trade, investment and the public service. They are important to the relationship between Hong Kong and the United Kingdom and to the wider relationship implied in the list of countries that I gave.

We may not have addressed our minds to the question of what is to happen about British visitors to Hong Kong, especially those who go in pursuit of trade, industry and the international relationship implicit in the agreement, as 1997 draws nearer. Our difficulty at present is that we have old-fashioned thoughts about the way trade has been done between the United Kingdom, Hong Kong and China. We should take the view that whenever we are concerned with Hong Kong we are also concerned with China.

We have a great opportunity to see the growth of investment in Hong Kong and to recognise that it is a long-term investment in China. I was glad to see that the Governor made that point in a speech to the stock exchange. Some people in the People's Republic of China will look for direct investment in China, but prudent business men, industrialists and those who already have a stake in Hong Kong would do well to consider the opportunity to create a centre of excellence in Hong Kong, which could relate, particularly to the special economic zones, as a natural bridge to the whole of China as its market.

The way to facilitate that process is to ensure the freedom of travel from Hong Kong to the United Kingdom and vice versa, and by extension into China. In other words visa liberalisation would allow wider access to China as a whole.

Those are some of the reasons why I urge my amendment on my hon. Friend the Minister. I hope that it provides him with a way through some of the practical difficulties. I have received support from members of UMELCO and members of the Hong Kong Government for my amendment. In talks about the issue it has become clear that the two classes of citizens—the BCCs and BDTCs — should be tackled in the short term. My proposal would help in that process.

After 1997, a whole new range of relationships will evolve. I hope that my suggestion will facilitate the building of bridges, and the strengthening of links and of a tripartite agreement, to which the Committee has shown its commitment tonight. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will see that the objections he put to me in correspondence were based on a misunderstanding about the rigidity of the visa system. My suggestion is flexible and, I hope, practical.

I recognise that the wording of my amendment would not fit into the terms of the Bill. My hon. Friend may be relieved to hear that I shall not, therefore, seek permission for a separate vote and to divide the Committee. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will respond in that spirit of good will and co-operation. I appreciate that, having heard the arguments in the light of current events, he may wish to give the matter further consideration. I reserve the right to come back on Report, because I believe this to be an important matter.

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): Unlike many hon. Members who have spoken in the debate, I have not had the opportunity to visit Hong Kong. However, having spent many weeks and months in the Standing Committee on the British Nationality Act 1981, may I claim some familiarity with Hong Kong born of those long hours of debate?

I am not sure that I followed the argument of the hon. Member for Arundel (Mr. Marshall) correctly. He seemed to be implying that British dependent territory citizens have certain rights of entry into the United Kingdom, and that he wanted those rights to be retained when the measures about which we are talking come into force. My understanding is that, in the main, British dependent territory citizens do not have the automatic right of entry into this country. We established that during the passage of the British Nationality Act. Therefore, I had some difficulty following his argument, based as it is on an incorrect premise.

When I re-examined some of our debates on the British Nationality Act, I wondered whether some of the discussions that we are having now were not foreseen——

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: Yes.

Mr. Dubs: —yet we seemed to ignore some facts that stared us in the face at that time. Shortly after that Bill becoming law we are forced to change some of its provisions, although we were assured at the time that the Government—the same Minister is sitting on the Front Bench now—had thought through the matters and were ertain that they were anticipating future developments in Hong Kong when they provided for the future citizenship of those in Hong Kong. If hon. Members doubt what I say, they should re-read those Committee debates.

My special concern is with amendments Nos. 1 and 2, and with paragraph 2 of the schedule. I share the views expressed by other right hon. and hon. Members this evening that a matter of such importance as the nationality provisions affecting one territory should not be dealt with by Order in Council. Referring again to our debates on the British Nationality Act, in Committee and on the Floor of the House, the way in which the House dealt in detail with those provisions, and the way in which we were able to develop the arguments, I am even more concerned that the Government believe that Hong Kong will not have the benefit of those procedures. I must admit that we came up with the wrong answer for Hong Kong in the debates on the British Nationality Act——

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: It was not our fault.

Mr. Dubs: I should say that the Government came up with the wrong answer, because we must change the provisions now. But as the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) said, that was not our fault. Many of those points were put to the Government during the Committee stage of that Act.

I shall not address any of my remarks to the ethnic Chinese, because I wish to keep my speech short. They are catered for, or at least there are not too many ambiguities about their position. I am concerned about other people now in Hong Kong who are not protected in the same way. Some of these problems were referred to on Second Reading and earlier today. First and foremost, I am still not happy about what the Government think will happen to the 6,000 people of Indian descent. At the moment, they are British dependent territory citizens. They will become British nationals overseas under the Government's proposals, if amendment No. 2 is passed. However, any children born to those people after 1997 will, I assume, become British overseas citizens.

12.15 am

Although the intention of British overseas citizenship in the Nationality Act is that that status should not be hereditary, I interpret what the Government have said to mean that this group of people will, exceptionally, have a citizenship that can be passed on from generation to generation. The Minister suggested that on Second Reading. He said:

"It is our intention that no British national or any child born on or after 1 July 1997 to a British national should be made stateless as a result of the nationality arrangements, envisaged in the Bill."

He went on to say, when talking about British dependent territory citizens, that the "title announced today"—the transfer from BDTCs to British national overseas—

"does not give a right of abode here. It preserves all but one of the entitlements possessed by those who are at present BDTCs. The one exception is right of transmissibility." — [Official Report, 21 January 1985; Vol. 71, c. 809-10.]

British nationals overseas do not have the right of transmissibility, and their children will therefore become British overseas citizens, who will, by implication, have transmissibility, although that was never the intention of the Nationality Act. If I have not got that argument right, I hope that the Minister will clarify the point, but, having studied what he said on Second Reading, I cannot come to any other conclusion. If it were possible to come to any other conclusion, the Minister's undertaking that nobody would remain stateless would not be capable of fulfilment.

I am concerned that we are getting ourselves into somewhat of a tangle, and, as my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) said earlier, we are in danger of putting a group of people into similar difficulties as those experienced by the east African Asians. They are still queuing up in Gujarat province in India and waiting six or seven years to come here and establish a right that has been given to them by successive British Governments, but is being handed out in meagre annual doses.

The right hon. Member for South Down anticipated that, and said that the new type of citizenship should not be given, and instead travel documents should be issued. I take the opposite view, that we have a responsibility to see that we do not leave any people high and dry, and stranded with no territory to which they belong, and no place to which they can travel. It is by no means certain that there will be a continuation of rights in Hong Kong when the status of Hong Kong is changed.

Mr. Michael Marshall: I am reverting to an earlier point made by the hon. Gentleman. I was trying to refresh my memory from the notes provided by the Hong Kong Government Office. The hon. Gentleman asked about British dependent territory passports, and I was looking to see what had been said in the debate in Hong Kong in the past few days. I see that no commitment is made as to when that passport will be superseded by the British national overseas passport. I understand, therefore, that this passport must continue for some indefinite period, and perhaps we shall hear a view on this tonight. While the passport or other travel documents continue, the question of access to this country still remains as previously arranged. My understanding of that is that a stay of between one month and one year is available to BDTC passport holders. For that reason, I am suggesting that a stamp that could go into such a document and could subsequently be transferred into any document that is issued within the SAR after 1997.

Mr. Dubs: No doubt the Minister can answer for himself in explaining the point. My argument was not that BDTC passport holders would lose their passports at a later date but that their children born after the due date in 1997 would become British nationals overseas. There were then difficulties. As to the hon. Gentleman's other point, I am sure that the Minister can answer that himself. My understanding is that at the moment, BDTCs do not have an automatic right of entry into this country. They may be allowed to enter this country for periods ranging from one month to one or two years, but they have to establish that right by seeking to obtain an entry certificate or by being allowed in. But that is by no means automatic. They may well be refused entry when they reach Heathrow.

Mr. Michael Marshall: It may be that the words that are used need to be defined. Entry equals access. It does not mean residence. I understand that there is no difficulty about those with British dependent territories citizenship visiting this country on existing passports, but their entry is for the purpose of making a visit, not for residence.

Mr. Dubs: I have to disagree with the hon. Member for Arundel. It may be that in practice the majority of BDTCs have no difficulty in obtaining entry to this country for the purpose of making a visit. Permanent settlement is not the question, but the fact is that they still do not have an automatic right, any more than do people from most other parts of the world. Therefore they have to be allowed in; they are not entitled to come in. In seeking to ensure that the existing rights of those people are not lost in their change of citizenship the hon. Member is saying that their very limited rights, which do not guarantee entry, should be transferred. I did not really follow the hon. Member's argument, even if I concede that in practice these people do not have too much difficulty in coming in as visitors. That is not the case with people from many other parts of the world, although this is not the occasion to develop that point.

My concern is that we shall leave certain people without the basic rights to which they are entitled. Ought we not to consider allowing those people who wish to become British citizens and who have no other citizenship to become British citizens after a certain date? If they wanted to avail themselves of it, this small group of people would be able to come to this country and exercise the right that I would wish them to enjoy. The alternative is to leave them with no obvious place to which they belong. If they have no citizenship they will be, in effect, stateless.

The other group of people about whom I am concerned are the Vietnamese refugees and any other people who do not come into the categories that we have discussed. I am not clear about the future position of the Vietnamese refugees. They are not ethnic Chinese; they are not BDTCs; and they have no means of becoming BNOs or BOCs. In other words, they will remain stateless. The Minister referred to other groups who, apart from the Vietnamese, are in this position. I should be unhappy if we passed legislation that left a group of people in a territory for which we are still responsible suspended in mid-air, with no citizenship, no rights and no guarantees about their future. I am not saying that every Vietnamese refugee in Hong Kong is directly our responsibility and ought to be allowed to come to this country. However, we ought not to ignore the fact that these refugees exist. We must not just hope that they wil not make a fuss when we pass legislation and that the Chinese will take care of them. That is not good enough. If there is no other alternative, I believe that we have to accept responsibility for these people and possibly share it with other countries. Therefore, I am unhappy about what is intended for the two groups of people I have mentioned. The Government owe us a responsibility, and we owe them a responsibility to say what their long-term intentions are. I have said what my solution would be, and I should like to hear the Government's view.

Mr. Adley: I join the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) in apologising to you, Sir Paul, for inaccurately designating you. I should like to take this belated opportunity to congratulate you on your merited and well-deserved knighthood. We all share in your pleasure.

I am happy to speak after the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs), who has never been to Hong Kong. I think that I first went there in 1955. But I have one thing in common with him, and that is that, like him, I have never travelled to Hong Kong with the benefit of a free ticket from the Government of Hong Kong. Many hon. Members will well understand the reasons for that.

In the past two weeks we have had a further chance to consider the Bill. That rightly enabled the people in Hong Kong to express their views and gave some of us a further chance to consider the point that my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary announced on Second Reading about the designation of British National (Overseas) citizenship. I am slightly concerned that the Indian community in Hong Kong, and particularly those of its members who settled there before India achieved independence, will find that their new status is less advantageous than their BDT citizenship, for the very reasons that were outlined by the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell). I did not necessarily agree with everything that the right hon. Gentleman said, and we may not draw the same conclusion, but it is important to discuss such matters openly and frankly.

There are three things that we should avoid at this stage. First, we should avoid misleading people, deliberately or otherwise. Secondly, we should avoid making promises that we cannot deliver. Thirdly, we should avoid upsetting the delicate balance of the relationship between the British and Chinese Governments, and between both of those Governments and the people of Hong Kong. I am quite clear about what we should and should not be doing in respect of the first two items, but in respect of the third, one must bear in mind that nothing is quite as simple or as black and white as the right hon. Member for South Down might have us believe.

Mr. Bermingham: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that we are discussing the future of several million people who live thousands of miles away, and that they have a right to expect that whatever we legislate about will not deprive them of security in the future? At present we are putting a number of people in Hong Kong, who are not ethnic Chinese, in a position in which they may well find themselves stateless.

Mr. Adley: The House of Commons is not in a position to give any guarantees to anyone in Hong Kong about their indefinite welfare. To seek to pretend that we can legislate indefinitely for their perpetual welfare falls fairly and squarely under the heading of making promises that we cannot deliver. I take the point about the minority Indian population, who are in a special situation. I think that my right hon. Friend the Minister nodded earlier that the Government are seized of it and intend to do something about it. But it is wrong to give perhaps 99 per cent. of the population of Hong Kong—the Chinese citizens—the impression that, merely by passing legislation here, we can provide them with permanent guarantees about their settled future. That is to make promises that we cannot deliver. I stress again that the people of Hong Kong are dependent on good relations between the British and Chinese Governments, and ultimately on the intentions of the Government of the People's Republic of China.

12.30 am

In a book that I wrote on the subject, I recalled stating on 8 September 1982:

"The future status of Hong Kong depends ultimately on Beijing."

Let us accept, as we debate this issue, that we can only do our best within the limitations of the power that we shall have in the future. The right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) was right to point out that we should be failing in our duty if, by this legislation, we misled people into believing that they were being given something entitling them to what we know we are not able to deliver.

The right hon. Member for South Down used the word "fraud" and implied that there was a plot between the Foreign Office, the Chinese Government and the Government of Hong Kong. In fact, the pressure to dot the i's and cross the t's has come not from the British or Chinese Governments but from certain people in Hong Kong, for understandable motives, and that pressure has been led by UMELCO in Hong Kong.

All along we have been urged to provide security and guarantees. We cannot provide such guarantees, and that is why the right hon. Gentleman said that we were in danger of perpetrating a fraud on those people by this legislation. I emphasise that neither the British Government nor the Chinese Government have been behind the move to seek such guarantees, and even at this late stage the British Government are being pressed to make changes to the Bill.

The hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) referred to the press in Hong Kong criticising us for showing a lack of interest in their affairs. They always know best. On 4 November 1983, the South China Morning Post, referring to a visit that I was about to make, wrote:

"Hopefully, his forthcoming visit to Hong Kong will impress on him the grave disquiet felt by people in many walks of life here about outsiders interfering in Hong Kong's affairs as negotiations on the future issue continue. Although Mr. Adley has a mandate to speak for the electors of Christchurch and Lymington he holds no such mandate for the people of Hong Kong."

Leaving aside his poor homework in designating my constituency wrongly, I wonder who the deputy editor of the paper, who wrote that, thought was going to settle the future of Hong Kong. That is the task of hon. Members here, and I agree with the hon. Member for Hamilton that we have done our best, within the limitations of the power available to us, to attend to their problems.

Dr. Marek: It will not do to say that we have done our best and can wash our hands of the matter. There is an onus on us to ensure that nobody will be stateless as a result of what will occur in 1997. Although we may not be able to give guarantees here and now, let us hope that in the coming 12 or 13 years we will be able to ensure that nobody is stateless.

Mr. Adley: I agree with the hon. Gentleman, but we cannot, in legislation tonight, give people guarantees. Certainly we must do what we can. As for people being stateless, presumably the hon. Gentleman was referring to that tiny fraction of people who are not of Chinese race. The hon. Gentleman must do me the credit of recognising that I raised this point on Second Reading and have done so again during this debate. I have made clear beyond peradventure my belief that we have a responsibility for these people, perhaps more than others. It is not practical or sensible to try to write into the Bill precisely how we shall do that. It is better to get these provisions right in the next six or 12 months or two or five years rather than try to identify in this legislation every problem.

It might have been better if we had had two Bills—one dealing specifically and solely with the sovereignty issue, and the other dealing with all the problems of nationality and citizenship.

Mr. Faulds: If the Government do not get this matter right within the next seven or nine months, or whatever, what recourse does the House of Commons have under the Order in Council procedure to put it right?

Mr. Adley: In June I shall have been a Member for 15 years. I cannot recall the House being incapable of doing what it needed to do if that was the will of the House and there was a majority to achieve that objective. I have great faith in the collective determination of hon. Members to act in a particular way if they wish to do so. I see that the right hon. Member for South Down is looking askance at that statement. He is probably thinking of the European Communities Act 1972. Whether hon. Members have the will to undo what we did at that time is a matter for debate—but not tonight.

I respect the right of the right hon. Member for South Down to make the point that he made and I agree with him that it would be improper for us to make promises that we cannot maintain. The right hon. Gentleman did not answer my question whether he believed that it was right for the British Government to evolve a form of status for the Chinese citizens of Hong Kong which applied to their movements when they were travelling outside Hong Kong but did not affect their position in so far as they might wish to come to the United Kingdom. I do not propose to pursue him on that point now.

Membership of GATT is one of the most important considerations for Hong Kong. That issue and others will depend upon finding some form of identity which makes

Hong Kong a separate entity to the People's Republic of China in the eyes and minds of those countries with which Hong Kong will be negotiating to maintain its present commercial status. For that reason, if for no other, I believe that flexibility is the sensible order of the day. That is why I have been concerned about the persistent attempts to try to find detailed answers at one pop to problems that, are only just beginning to emerge.

I finish with these words. I believe that the flexibility I seek will prove to be the test of the sincerity of the Government of the People's Republic of China in their oft-stated intentions, now that sovereignty has been ceded, to maintain the stability and prosperity of Hong Kong.

I conclude by agreeing with the hon. Members for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) and for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) that we must be certain that we receive from the Government a firm and clear undertaking that we shall maintain for those members of non-Chinese minorities in Hong Kong our absolute obligation to find a solution to their problem long before 1997, even if we cannot write that provision into this legislation immediately.

Finally——

Mr. Russell Johnston: The third "finally".

Mr. Adley: That may well have been my third "finally". It will be the last. The success of this legislation will lie not in producing a bolt-hole in the United Kingdom for the people of Hong Kong but in maintaining the stability and prosperity of Hong Kong and maintaining for the Hong Kong people their ability to live in the present form of society in Hong Kong. Let us never lose sight of that aim.

Mr. Bermingham: I wish to draw to the attention of the Committee the fact that, although I have never been to Hong Kong, I have, as a practising lawyer for 15 to 20 years, been dealing with immigration problems. I view with horror any legislation that will again create some of the misery that I have seen in those cases. I feel that I have a duty to point out the legal problems that I see.

I have spent some considerable time studying the subject of the refugees. I am sad at having to take issue with my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson), but I do not believe that anything good can be said about the closed and open camps in Hong Kong. One solution to the problem would be for the Hong Kong Government to allow the ethnic Chinese in the camps to assimilate into the community in Hong Kong. That would start to breach the logjam that has developed in those camps. I do not propose to develop that issue any further at this stage.

Mr. George Robertson: I remind my hon. Friend that when I referred to the Vietnamese refugees, I paid tribute to the work that the Hong Kong Government had done in resettling almost 100,000 of the Vietnamese boat people. The fact that people are held in closed camps and the circumstances in which they are kept continues to cause anxiety to the Hong Kong Government, and to Members of the House. We long to find a solution which will remove people from those quasi-prison camps.

Mr. Bermingham: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for intervening and correcting the record in so far as I may have misheard him. He takes the stance that I do. I have given my views here and elsewhere, and I shall continue to do so until the problem is solved because it is one that we must solve. I do not propose to continue with that point because it is outside the scope of the amendments.

I did not participate in the Second Reading debate, but I have studied the record carefully. I appreciate that nuances can occasionally be read into the written word and I looked for the assurances given to what we might call the "ethnic minority groups" who might find themselves in a difficult position if the legislation is left as it is.

I ask the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) to accept that my intervention in his speech was born out of the frustration of finding no commitment to the solution to the problem. I should not dream to seek to argue with him or any author about their books, but perhaps we could approach the matter in a way which does not leave us talking about BOCs, BNOs and BDTCss. They mean nothing to the man in the street. He wants to know whether he will have a secure status somewhere and somewhere he knows that he can go.

The solution is not beyond the wit of man. For instance, in 1982 we gave the Falkland islanders British citizenship, and under the British Nationality Act 1981 we allowed Gibraltarians to register in the United Kingdom as British citizens. I understand that some 5,000 did so in 1983 and 1984. When we talk about the minority groups in Hong Kong we are talking about relatively small numbers of people. We are not talking about numbers that will compare with the South Africans. As I understand the legislation, nearly 1 million South Africans have the right to come to the United Kingdom as British citizens if and when the majority take control of the state, as will undoubtedly happen one day. In those circumstances, up to 1 million South Africans have the right to come to the United Kingdom, and there is nothing that we can do about it. It is in legislation already.

If we can solve those problems and put forward such solutions, it is not beyond the wit of Parliament to put forward a solution in the years ahead before 1997 that will protect the rights of the Indians and other small minority groups who are not protected just now. There is no way that we can dodge that issue. Those people are not protected.

At this stage, I do not expect the Government to say, "We shall do 1, 2, 3 or 4." However, I ask for a clear and unequivocal statement in the House in respect of citizens of Hong Kong who are not ethnic Chinese, who could find themselves in much the same situation as the Asians in east Africa in the late 1960s. That was an appalling situation, which all of us recognise. Those persons should be told in simple terms that before 1997 we shall arrive at a solution that will create for them a citizenship and a right of abode in the United Kingdom in the event of their "security of tenure"—so to speak—in Hong Kong being jeopardised.

In saying that, I in no way seek to criticise the Peking authorities. I appreciate that times will change between now and 1997. It would be a fool who did not appreciate that. At the moment Peking says, "Fine, everybody in Hong Kong can stay and we welcome them." However, conditions may arise in which those who are non-ethnic Chinese find that they wish to move. The security of knowing that one can go is in itself a deterrent to go. It has been found in the past that where people feel secure and welcome at home, they tend to stay.

[Mr. Bermingham]

The numbers involved are not great. I merely ask the Government to put down a marker, a clear undertaking that steps will be taken to protect those people's interests. I do not like the form of the Bill, in that it provides for those matters to be dealt with by Order in Council. That is not entirely satisfactory. However, I am prepared not to divide the House on the issue. I put the marker on the road for the future that if in the next couple of years clear provisions are not made, I, and I am sure many hon. Members, will seek to bring the matter back before the House.

I should like to mention just one other small point. There has been talk about people who may want to leave Hong Kong because of the nature of their job, which makes them feel that in the transfer of sovereignty they would rather go away. It might be because they have been customs officers in Crown service, and so on. I know that there are provisions for their protection, but I ask the Government to take this point on board, which has been raised with me by people from Hong Kong. I refer to people in sensitive jobs. If we are to have secure government between now and 1997, those who have to carry out sensitive functions, whether they are ethnic Chinese police officers or customs officials, must have the security of knowing that if they wish to come to the United Kingdom in 1997, provision will be made for them and their families to be taken care of.

I see that the Minister nods in acknowledgement of the problem. I concede that it has been raised in the past, but we have a duty to those whom we shall ask to serve us until 1997. They should know that, in the sensitive areas in which they serve, they have added security that will enable them to carry out their functions free from the pressures that would otherwise be upon them. If we are to have good governance in Hong Kong in those years—I am sure that we shall—we must give such security to those whom we ask to serve us.

Mr. Luce: There has been considerable debate for an hour and a half on a series of amendments that are important both to the Committee and the people of Hong Kong.

Let me set the scene with Government amendment No. 2 before I deal with amendment No. 1. The purpose of amendment No. 2 is to incorporate in the Bill the title of the proposed new form of nationality. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary announced on Second Reading, this will be, as we all now know, "British National (Overseas)".

I am glad that we have been able to propose the amendment at this stage. We were pressed to do so by a number of hon. Members on Second Reading.

The people of Hong Kong have now had an opportunity to express their opinions on the title, and I am glad to be able to report that it seems to be generally acceptable in the territory.

It was not easy to devise a title that meets all the necessary requirements. On the one hand, it needs to make clear that we are dealing with a form of British nationality. That was the strongest desire of the people of Hong Kong. On the other hand, it is essential that the title can be used after 1997, and, therefore, that it carries no implication of a continuing constitutional relationship between Britain and Hong Kong after 1997. The title "British National (Overseas)" meets both those criteria.

The benefits of the new status will be set out in the Order in Council and will be subject to parliamentary approval, but the Government's intention is that the new form of nationality will carry broadly the same benefits as British dependent territory citizen except that it will not be transmissible by descent. Holders of the new status will be able to use British passports. They will be eligible for British consular protection in third countries. They will have a right to registration as British citizens under section 4 of the British Nationality Act 1981 on the same terms as the British dependent territory citizen. The detailed provisions will be set out in the Order in Council to be set before the House when they can be discussed in greater detail.

The Committee will be only too aware that the title used to describe the status is itself the subject of great sensitivity in Hong Kong and the title now proposed has the endorsement of the Hong Kong Executive Council. As I have said it seems to have been generally well received by the public in Hong Kong. To put it in the Bill now will help to calm some of the anxiety on that score in Hong Kong. I hope that the Committee will be able to agree to the amendment. As it is a matter of importance to the people of Hong Kong, the amendment will be a reassurance to them.

Putting aside the fantasy world of the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) of plots, deceptions and frauds, let me get down to the reality of the other amendments. The effect of amendment No. 1, as the right hon. Gentleman says, would be to remove the nationality provisions from the schedule to the Bill in their entirety. The Government firmly believe that paragraph 2 should remain in the schedule to the Bill. The measures concerned arise directly out of the agreement and the United Kingdom memorandum. They are part of the same package. It is, therefore, appropriate that all such matters should be dealt with in the Bill. In fact, I would go further and say that silence on nationality would cause great uncertainty in Hong Kong and might cast doubt on the Government's willingness to implement the provisions in the United Kingdom memorandum.

Since it was made clear that nationality questions were among the primary concerns of the people of Hong Kong, the Government consider that that would be damaging. In this enabling clause we are endeavouring to provide a clear framework and statement of intent with regard to nationality and to deal with what one hon. Member described as a unique situation. Of course, the details will follow in the form of the order, which on Second Reading my right hon. and learned Friend announced to the House we would undertake to introduce within a year of the passage of this legislation.

In the debate today, several hon. Members have made it clear, as they did on Second Reading, that they were not satisfied that there would be sufficient opportunity to discuss the draft Order in Council in detail under positive resolution procedures.

I acknowledge that the right hon. Member for South Down is saying that he believes that these matters should be dealt with by means of primary legislation. Other hon. Members support the right hon. Gentleman. I acknowledge that point of view but I have sought to explain why we believe that it is necessary to deal with the problem in the way that we propose. The Order in Council procedure is inevitable because of the timing constraints on the Bill, which I have explained to the Committee.

The Government have moved as far as they can to meet the wishes of the House of Commons. We agree that the House must be given the opportunity to have a preliminary debate on the draft order. In other words, it will be, as some hon. Members have described, an order with green edges. According to the way in which the debate goes, the Government will, if necessary, withdraw the draft order and revise it before laying it again before the House for debate in the normal way under the affirmative resolution procedure. It will be open to the House to express its views without having to oppose or reject the order as a whole. I hope that the House will find that procedure to be of help in enabling its views to be taken fully into account before the draft order is finally submitted for affirmative resolution.

The right hon. Member for Down South anticipated how the Government's mind is working—this is not a plot, fraud or deception—and I know that he will not be satisfied with the procedure that I have outlined. He has made it clear that he will continue to press for a separate Bill. However, for the reasons which I have advanced, I do not share his views on this issue. The creation of a new form of British nationality for those who must lose BDTC in 1997 was essential to securing the acceptability of the agreement in Hong Kong.

Amendment No. 3 seeks to insert "status" in the schedule instead of

"new form of British nationality".

I have already said that the Government are committed to granting a form of British nationality to persons who are BDTCs by virtue of a connection with Hong Kong. I hope that this commitment will enjoy the support of the Committee. It was made clear at the time of the assessment exercise in Hong Kong and at the time of the debate on the agreement in this place that the "appropriate status" referred to in the United Kingdom memorandum would be a form of British nationality. It was on this basis that the people of Hong Kong and the House endorsed the agreement. If we failed to specify that in the order it would cause great dismay and lead to the belief that we were not keeping our word.

Amendment No. 5 is directed to the introduction of travel documents and I urge the Committee not to accept it. Paragraph 2 of the schedule does not cover the provisions in the United Kingdom memorandum relating to the issue of passports. These provisions will be implemented under the Royal Prerogative in the usual way. The United Kingdom memorandum makes the Government's intention absolutely clear. Persons who are BDTCs by virtue of a connection with Hong King will be eligible to acquire a status which will enable them to use passports issued by the Government. United Kingdom consular officials will be able to renew and replace these passports after 1 July 1997. The intention of the right hon. Member for Down South is presumably to deny former BDTCs the right to hold British passports after 1997. Their eligibility to hold passports was part of the package that was found acceptable by the people of Hong Kong and the House. I must urge the Committee to reject the amendment.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: Will the Minister make it clear what the people of Hong Kong were told was the advantage to them of having a British passport over having a British travel document?

Mr. Luce: The deep anxiety of the people of Hong Kong, especially the 3 million who are BDTCs, is that they should retain some form of British nationality allied to a British passport, which would provide them, on the responsibility of the British Government, with, for example, consular protection in third countries. The matter has caused great concern in Hong Kong and we thought it right to satisfy that concern.

1 am

In amendment No. 4, my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel (Mr. Marshall) asks questions that are geared to facilitate for entry to Britain. I appreciate that my hon. Friend has the best interests of the people of Hong Kong in mind. Since Second Reading, we have had correspondence, and I shall think carefully about the additional comments that he made today, to which it would not be possible for me to give a detailed and clear reply until I have considered them. I do not believe that amendment No. 4 would facilitate travel by Hong Kong BDTCs, which is clearly his intention. There is no requirement for BDTCs to have visas, as opposed to entry certificates, for entry to the United Kingdom. I do not think that it would be appropriate, or well received in Hong Kong, to introduce such a requirement, even on an optional basis.

There is a system by which Hong Kong BDTCs may obtain entry certificates, as opposed to visas, before travelling to the United Kingdom. These are not required for ordinary visits of less than six months, although they may be obtained if the traveller wishes. In addition, BDTCs who are bona fide frequent travellers may already obtain entry certificates that are valid for two years and allow multiple entry to the United Kingdom. I believe that this practice already substantially meets the requirement suggested by my hon. Friend.

On the wider point of the international recognition of British National (Overseas) passports, I can assure my hon. Friend that the Government will do all that they can to ensure the same access to other countries as that enjoyed at present by BDTC passport holders. We intend to negotiate visa abolition agreements.

Mr. Michael Marshall: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, as what he has said is helpful. I confess that I had not appreciated the significance of the entry certificate for two years. Could that entry certificate be shown in a travel document and be carried over after 1997? If such a transfer of documentation were possible, that would go some way to meet the bridging process that was behind my amendment.

Mr. Luce: If I may, I shall respond to my hon. Friend as soon as I have had time to consider the matter.

I should not do justice to the Committee if I did not pick up some of the other important issues that have been raised, such as statelessness and other matters relating to passports. I was asked whether the British national (overseas) passports will state the right of abode in Hong Kong. A statement to that effect wil be entered by the Government with respect to the period before 1997, as laid down in s ection XIV of annex 1 to the joint declaration.

[Mr. Luce]

After 1997, we shall be able to state that the holder of the passport holds a permanent SAR identity card which is evidence of his right of abode in the SAR. The Government will discuss with the Chinese authorities the wording of a statement to be included in the BN(O) passport. The aim is to ensure that an individual need use his passport—and not have to supply an identity card—only to satisfy immigration officials in third countries that he has the right of abode in Hong Kong.

The Government have undertaken to make every effort to explain arrangements to Third countries, as I have said. This will be done between the enactment of the Order in Council and the issue of BN(O) passports. Given a clear indication of the right of abode, I se no reason for third countries to introduce new restrictions on entry of BN(O) pasaport holders.

I deal next with statelessness. It is only right that the hon. Members for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) and for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) and, indeed, my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) brought this up. I should therefore restate the position and clarify it. The hon. Member for Battersea raised an additional question that I should answer.

The Government have clearly stated their intention in this area. It is our intention that no former Hong Kong BDTC, nor any child born on or after 1 July 1997 to such a person, should be made stateless as a result of the arrangements envisaged in the Bill. All former Hong Kong BDTCs will be able to acquire BN(O) status if they wish before 1 July 1997. If they do this, they will retain that status for the rest of their lives. Any BDTCs who do not acquire BN(O) status and would otherwise be stateless —for example, if they are not Chinese nationals and hold no other nationality—will become British overseas citizens on 1 July 1997. The children born on or after 1 July 1997 to former Hong Kong BDTCs who are Chinese nationals will, of course, have Chinese nationality. Children born to non-Chinese former BDTCs will acquire British overseas citizen status at birth if they would otherwise be stateless.

Here I answer the question of the hon. Member for Battersea. The proposal that children born after 30 June 1997 to non-Chinese former BDTCs should acquire BOC status automatically at birth if they would otherwise be stateless is intended to apply to the first post-1997 generation. However, we appreciate that there may be concern about potential statelessness arising among subsequent generations of non-Chinese Hong Kongers. It would not be appropriate as a general principle to grant British nationality indefinitely and without restrictions to the descendants of British nationals. However, problems of further generations and potential statelessness—and we are looking here into the next century—are being urgently examined in response to representations made by the non-Chinese community in Hong Kong. In this category we include some 5,000 Indian citizens.

I therefore hope that what I have said answers the position as the Government see it. I reaffirm the position of non-Chinese BDTCs resident abroad which I outlined on Second Reading. Residence outside Hong Kong is not a bar to the acquisition of the new British national (overseas) status. Thus non-Chinese persons who are BDTCs by virtue of a connection with Hong Kong will be eligible to apply for the new status whether or not they are currently resident in Hong Kong.

Mr. Adley: My hon. Friend referred to "Indian citizens". However, the people who have lived in Hong Kong of Indian descent, and who were never citizens of India before they moved to Hong Kong, because it was not an independent country, are in a separate category. From what my hon. Friend said, it seems to me that these people of Indian race in Hong Kong who are being offered British overseas citizenship will be at a distinct disadvantage as against the overwhelming majority of the Chinese citizens of Hong Kong, who have the option of a BOC passport or Chinese citizenship. Is it not fair that in due course we should make sure that these Indian people in Hong Kong have an alternative, namely, British citizenship, over and above the proposals that my hon. Friend has made?

Mr. Luce: If I referred to them as Indian citizens, I must correct that. I am talking about people of Indian origin who are part of the community in Hong Kong—all of whom, incidentally, will have the right of abode in Hong Kong. They come into the category of non-Chinese citizens on which I have given a fairly long answer. I do not think that it would be right or proper to grant them a right of abode and British citizenship. I have tried to explain how we propose to deal with the problem of non-Chinese citizens. In any event, there will be further opportunities to debate this. There will be a preliminary debate on the draft order when we shall be able to take the views of the House. I may also be able to say something further on that occasion which I hope will be helpful.

Mr. Faulds: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way and for the generosity of his assurances about Indian people living outside Hong Kong, but do those assurances cover the next generation?

Mr. Luce: I have explained the position very carefully. I ask the hon. Gentleman to read Hansard with care. Clearly there will be a problem with subsequent generations going well into the next century and we are considering that urgently. I would rather not add anything to what I have said at this stage.

Mr. Faulds: I appreciate the Minister's position and I do not wish to push him, but if he cannot give that assurance about the first generation after Hong Kong's subsumption by China what will be the position of those people? If they are refused British citizenship and abode, where will they be left?

Mr. Luce: I am sorry. I think that there is a misunderstanding. The people to whom the hon. Gentleman refers, if they have no other citizenship and would otherwise be stateless, will be British overseas citizens. I am sorry if I misunderstood the hon. Gentleman's question.

Mr. Faulds: I am grateful to the Minister.

Mr. Luce: The hon. Member for St. Helens, South referred to the admission to this country of people whom he described as "at risk". In certain very limited cases rights of admission will exist at the discretion of the Home Secretary, but this will be on a very limited basis for people who have been exposed to special factors and considerations. It would be inappropriate to disclose the categories and numbers of people involved or the special considerations or factors concerned. I should add that that point has already been covered in previous statements and debates.

Mr. Bermingham: I am grateful to the Minister for that assurance. Perhaps I may press him just a little further. I do not expect him to go into details about the categories. I appreciate the reasons for not doing that. Will the Minister confirm that the right of admission will apply not just to those people but to their families and dependants surrounding them? One accepts that there are varying degrees of family, but I hope that this will be considered in the Chinese context rather than the narrow English context.

Mr. Luce: Our policy is that the assurances extend to spouses and dependent children under the age of 18, as we have stated on previous occasions.

I have tried to answer all the main points raised in relation to the amendments. I hope that the Committee will find Government amendment No. 2 acceptable but for the reasons that I have given I do not think that it would be right to accept the other amendments.

Amendment negatived.

Amendment made: No. 2, in page 2, line 17, leave out from 'acquire' to end of line 18 and insert

'a new form of British nationality the holders of which shall be known as British Nationals (Overseas)'.—[Mr. Luce.]

Question proposed, That the schedule, as amended, be the schedule to the Bill.

Dr. Marek: I tabled an amendment which replaced the word "may" with "shall", but it was not selected because in the House of Commons we are allowed not to instruct, but to ask Her Majesty to do things. The amendment sought to put strength into the argument that no one should be left stateless. This is not the time to consider constitutional questions. Although some people say that Orders in Council are archaic, they nevertheless allow the Government to do things that they could not do if they had to introduce legislation.

The arguments about statelessness were well put in the previous debate. I am satisfied with the Government's comments except for one matter that arose in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham). I am not happy that the relatives of some people who may be allowed to come to this country would be limited to spouses and children up to the age of 18. We should perhaps reconsider that and allow wider discussion. These cases, by their very nature being special, could also involve other close relatives.

We should now wait to see what the order provides. When we have it in front of us, we can debate it, and then it can be laid before the House. The Committee can do no more at this stage, and I am happy with the schedule as it stands.

1.15 am

Mr. Bermingham: I ask the Minister to reconsider his answer to me regarding the children and the spouse, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) referred. It worries me that a senior official in his middle years could be "at risk" and have a group of children with an age span from 10 to 25 years. I make this point because I acknowledge the sensitivity of the Minister's job.

It is important to accept that some people will be in that position, if we are to provide good Government up to 1997. We must seek to protect them. Does the Minister propose that we protect such an official and his children who are under 18 years of age, but leave behind his children who are over the age of 18? If so, we are inhumane, unseeing and unthinking. Everyone will retire promptly before their children reach the age of 18, and we shall not have the continuity of service that we need.

Will the Minister reconsider the family definition in a broader context than in the past? Realism and experience show me and, I hope, the Minister, that a family must be taken as a unit, and that one must not draw an arbitrary line. In cases of immigration, arbitrary lines have caused a great deal of sadness. we can avoid that on this occasion. We are not considering a large number of people. If the Minister will consider the matter in a broader context, we could save a great deal of trouble in the future.

Mr. Faulds: The comment, perhaps, ought to be made before we finish that the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), as is his custom, issued some frightening prognostications tonight. He portrayed the preparation of a great plot between the Foreign Office, the People's Republic of China and the Government of Hong Kong. God help the Foreign Office. It normally does rather well, and I have the highest regard for it. However, that great plot was to pass a fraud on the people of Hong Kong and to fool them into thinking that their futures were safe when they were not. It ought to be known in those distant islands by the people whose future we are discussing that the right hon. Gentleman makes a practice of such frightening prognostications.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: I make a practice of being right.

Mr. Faulds: Invariably, as the House will know, the right hon. Gentleman's forecasts prove utterly wrong.

Mr. Powell: When?

Mr. Faulds: On many occasions, for example, his forecast of the terrible dangers of immigration and rivers running with blood. They were all wrong. He will also be wrong about this. It is only fair to tell those people to sleep easy. The right hon. Gentleman is incorrect. The House, the Foreign Office and the people and Government of China are concerned about the future of the people of Hong Kong. They should be assured that, although we have the greatest regard for the right hon. Gentleman as a parliamentary performer, we know that he is given to these strange frenzies and fevers. They should be disregarded, because, of course, politically, he is a busted flush.

Question put and agreed to.

Schedule, as amended, agreed to.

Bill reported, with an amendment.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

1.20 am

Mr. George Robertson: At this late hour, we have completed consideration of an important Bill. Our consideration has not been without event, because although the amendment to the Bill is important, the prophecies of the Chinese language newspapers were probably right yet again. However, the Government have made some concessions during our considerations, and it is wise to put our gratitude on record. The Government conceded more time between the Second Reading and

[Mr. George Robertson]

Committee stage. They agreed to have annual reports on the progress being made in the transition, and they have agreed to two debates on the Order in Council on British national overseas status. They have also included the name of that nationality in the Bill. They conceded that the Order in Council will have green edges. These are important concessions. The Government have listened to the will of the House and, in doing so, have done a great service to Parliament.

This Third Reading is not the end of the story. The book is not closing on Hong Kong, and there are 12 more years until the handing-over of sovereignty. The House must be conscious of its continuing obligations to monitor and to be vigilant about progress right up to 1997. On the evening of 30 June 1997, we shall make the transfer, and the House's direct influence will have gone. Until then, however, we shall not stop the scrutiny which, in the long transitional period, is imperative.

1.23 am

Mr. Johnston: It has been a privilege and a responsibility to have taken part in these debates on our acceptance, following negotiations, of the transfer back to China of the island of Hong Kong and its related territories. I include not just the land, but 5.25 million people—as many people as live in Scotland. It is a very different island that we hand back from the rocky pirates' base that we secured in the last century in circumstances in which we cannot take pride. It is also a very different China, though many traditions pulse unchecked through different political structures.

I said during our first debate, and repeated on Second Reading, that it is difficult for a Liberal to give an uncritical welcome to a Bill which surrenders sovereignty over a people without giving them an open, free choice. Nations, both large and small, continue, sadly, to be over insistent on their national pride and not sufficiently relaxed over the natural, individual and community urge to be independent that people have.

The enclaves that remain here and there across the globe are the leftovers of empires, and do not fit into tidy patterns, but why must we always have tidy patterns? Freedom and tolerance are more important than tidy patterns and historic rights. However, there is no doubt that the remarkable, indeed unique, agreement reached between the Government and the People's Republic of China can provide a framework which, while assuaging Chinese national pride, can equally facilitate the continuing evolution of the vibrant, yet controlled, free enterprise community that is Hong Kong.

The formulation of the basic law will continue to be central to setting the ground rules and to establishing whether or not the agreement will work. I hope that it will. I believe that at this moment, every responsible person in China, Hong Kong and the United Kingdom believes that it will work. We all pray that we are right, and that Hong Kong will have the future that we all want for it.

1.26 am

Mr. Luce: I think that hon. Members will agree that we have had full discussions in Committee and on Second Reading, and I hope that this will be a source of great reassurance to the people of Hong Kong. We hope that the Bill will proceed to the other place, and that the House will continue to show strong support for it. I have tried to accommodate as much as I could the anxieties and views of the House. I believe that the people of Hong Kong have every right to be pleased to know that it has been the strong desire of the House, on both sides, to retain the closest possible interest in Hong Kong in the years up to 1997. That, too should be a source of reassurance.

It is partly for that reason that the British Government felt it right to make concessions on annual reports and due debate on the draft order, so that the accountability of the House is fully demonstrated. As the House knows, ratification of the agreement has to take place before 30 June 1997. Strong views have been expressed about Hong Kong and its future, which, like the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Mr. Johnston) I believe should give a renewed sense of confidence. In the meantime, I repeat that Her Majesty's Government remain firmly responsible for Hong Kong until 1 July 1998. Against that background, I warmly commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Statutory Instruments, &c.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 79(5) (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.).

INTERNATIONAL IMMUNITIES AND PRIVILEGES

That the draft Specialized Agencies of the United Nations (Immunities and Privileges) (Amendment) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 18th January, be approved.—[Mr. Durant.]

Question agreed to.

PETITION

Human Embryos

1.28 am

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): As one born and bred in the constituency of Belfast, West, I beg leave to present a petition signed by 13,906 constituents of Belfast, West. It is entitled "Petition for the Protection of the Human Embryo". Unfortunately in one way, perhaps thankfully in another, the constituents are represented by a person who has won a seat in this place that he will not take. Therefore, I am delighted that they have asked me to present this petition to the House.

The petitioners affirm their belief that the newly fertilised human embryo is a real, living individual human being. They oppose all practices that discriminate against the embryo and violate his or her human dignity and right to life. The petition continues:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure that involves the purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment.

Your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

To lie upon the table.

M1 (Driving Conditions)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Durant.]

1.30 am

Mr. Roy Galley (Halifax): This Adjournment debate was sought because of increasing concern about driving conditions and standards on the M1 motorway. Recent accidents on the M1, some in adverse weather conditions, have reinforced that concern. The problems to which I shall refer are undoubtedly experienced on other motorways throughout the country, but my familiarity and love-hate relationship with that road, having travelled up and down it between London and Yorkshire most weeks since June 1983, lead me to be specific about the M1.

Since I initially sought this Adjournment debate, the Select Committee on Transport has published its report on road safety. It covers in much more detail many issues of motorway safety and other related matters. I hope that at a later stage the House will have an opportunity to debate them in greater detail.

Observation during the last 18 months of travelling up and down the M1 suggests that traffic volume has increased and that driving standards have deteriorated. Coming southwards from Yorkshire, the difficulties become acute after the M69, the M6 and the M45 merge into the M1. At peak times—that phrase now seems to encompass most of the week except late at night and on Saturday afternoons—the stretch of the M1 from the Leicestershire-Northamptonshire border at least to the intersection with the M10 is, frankly, hell on earth.

There is an enormous volume of traffic driving too fast, very often filling all three lanes. We are plagued by drivers who fail to adjust their driving speed and style to changing conditions, be it of weather or traffic volume. Too much traffic stays in the middle and fast lanes, even when there is room in the nearside lane. People, perhaps understandably, refuse to move over into the slow lane or the middle lane for fear of being boxed in. They are tending now to treat the middle lane as a normal progress lane rather than as an overtaking lane. This contributes to sudden traffic build-up and little room for manoeuvre if a dangerous situation arises. It leads to the even worse sin of drivers overtaking on the nearside, which is becoming an even more prevalent practice. Another major problem is that drivers move too rapidly from lane to lane, very often without indication. This can be particularly horrific if, as is sometimes the case, an enormous lorry is involved.

Great efforts have been made in recent years to cope with the problems of the M1 and other motorways. While traffic virtually doubled on motorways between 1973 and 1983, a further 1,000 kilometres of motorway have been constructed. That has not quite doubled the amount of motorway but it has gone some way towards doing so. The number of fatal and serious accidents on motorways per 100 million vehicle kilometres has been reduced and, overall, accident rates on motorways compare well with those on other types of road.

Accidents on the M1 specifically have been reduced since 1979. Yet the accident rates for Northamptonshire and Bedfordshire—the two areas with which I am most concerned—have not fallen so significantly. They have varied considerably, but they are still bad. As my hon. Friend the Minister will be aware, the key factor about a motorway accident is that it is much more horrific than a trunk road accident because of the domino effect. However, it must be said that motorway accidents occur less frequently than trunk road accidents.

I know that my hon. Friend has taken considerable steps to improve the M1, and I fully acknowledge the achievements of recent years. However, I fear that we shall have to run much harder to avoid a serious build-up of future problems. I should like to make some suggestions for future policy. Improvements to adjacent roads and motorways, such as the A1, have been made and I understand that further steps are planned. For example, the extension to the M40 is under consideration, and I urge that that is undertaken at the earliest opportunity. It may siphon off some traffic from the M1, but I doubt whether it will be sufficient. Although the southern sections of the M1 have only recently been extended to three lanes, we should start giving serious consideration now to widening them to four lanes as soon as possible. We should also consider the development of other alternative routes. Considerable progress is also being made in lighting stretches of the M1. However, I urge that a further impetus be given to that programme. My hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) will seek to comment on that point.

Television advertising campaigns can be very effective in reinforcing road safety messages and in influencing driver behaviour. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to undertake such a campaign relating to the specific dangers that I have outlined. Such campaigns have been successful in the past when mounted by the Department and aimed at motor cyclists and cyclists. The police do a marvellous job on the motorway, but more policemen would be welcome. It is remarkable what a sobering effect of the fact that a police car is parked by the side of the motorway has on us.

In adverse conditions advisory speed limits are often ignored. There is surely a good case for making them mandatory, although for that to be effective, the authorities should not be over-cautious and start the restriction too distant from the point of danger. In order to make that effective, means also need to be found for a quicker feedback of information about changing conditions on the motorway.

I come to a relatively minor point that is nevertheless worthy of consideration. Strictly speaking, it is illegal to use hazard warning lights while the vehicle is moving. Nevertheless it is enormously helpful to slowing traffic in difficult situations if such a warning is given. While the police are unlikely to prosecute if people commit such a technical offence, it seems sensible to remove the illegality and to encourage the practice.

There is also the hoary old chestnut about sections of the motorway being cordoned off when little work is going on. One appreciates that cones may well be living entities in their own right, and that they need fresh air in order to breath and breed, so we need to keep them out in the fresh air for fairly long periods. However, there have been great improvements in the past two or three years in taking them back to the cone house at night, or as frequently as possible. But as recently as last Friday, I found a stretch near the Rothersthorpe service station where the motorway was coned off for more than two miles with no sign whatever of any activity. If there has been activity earlier in the day, it would seem sensible to remove the cones at peak times, even if they have to be returned later.

There is another area in which we are improving a little. I refer to giving more advance notice at the 800-yard rather than at the 600-yard mark of when lanes are to be taken out of action.

I plead with the Minister not to raise the motorway speed limit for cars. For many vehicles, 80 mph on motorways is the de facto speed limit. With improving vehicle performance, an official 80 mph limit would mean a de facto limit of 90 moh. Indeed, raising the speed limit for lorries has had some adverse effects on road safety, although one apreciates the arguments which led the Department to agree to that increase.

I urge the Minister to give serious consideration to a noticeably deteriorating situation, to the need for a television advertsing campaign and to the need — I appreciate that it must be a long-term task—to extend that motorway to four lanes along its southern section at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East) rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): I understand that the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) has the agreement of the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley) and the Minister to intervene.

1.41 am

Mr. Bruinvels: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley) for allowing me to take part in this important debate and, as he hinted that I might, to raise the question of lighting up the entire length of the M1, a motorway that I use every weekend and sometimes more often.

I must at the outset declare an interest in that I am the joint chairman—with the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson)—of the British parliamentary lighting group. Together, in May 1984 we wrote a book entitled, "Light up the Roads", a copy of which is in the Minister's possession and in which we advocated lighting up all the motorways of Britain.

Since being elected in June 1983, I have sought to make motorways, including the M1, safer. At present, we have 1,100 miles of motorway unlit, and only 68 miles of the M1 are currently lit. On 12 December 1984, the Minister told me in a parliamentary answer in column 526 that it would cost £9 million to light up the M1 and £81 million to light up the rest of the motorway system, with maintenance for the whole system costing £9 million a year.

I highlighted the facts in a letter to The Times on 24 December last, but the problems has not gone away. We have had a rough time with the weather recently, with fog and mist, rain and heavy snow. The Minister said on 21 November 1983 that motorway lighting could be expected to reduce the night time accident rate. That is an important point, bearing in mind that each night time fatality is now costing the nation £205,460.

Lives could, therefore, be saved by bringing light to the motorways. In recent years, an average of 206 people a year have died on the motorways. On the M1 in particular there are regular contraflows and lane closures. It is vital that such areas, and junctions, are properly illuminated. As my hon. Friend said, cones get in the way, and at night they may not be seen clearly.

When the M25 junction is functioning at the M1, lighting will be necessary. The road will be narrow at that point and lights will be required. Lights there and throughout the motorway system are necessary to keep motorists fully aware of all road conditions.

I am pleased to learn, following lobbying, that the M1 is to be lit between Newport Pagnell service station and junction 16. This news was well received in the Daily Telegraph and motoring journals, and the move has been encouraging for those campaigning for more lights on motorways. In a parliamentary answer, my hon. Friend the Minister told me:

"I am keeping under review the need to provide additional lighting on the remaining unlit stretches of the M1."

—[Official Report 12 December 1984; Vol 69, c. 52.]

Not surprisingly, that has given me great hope. It is good news, and I hope that we shall receive some more news —if not tonight, then in the not-too-far-distant future.

Lighting can reduce accidents by 60 per cent., as has been proved. As recently as Tuesday this week, a man from Leicester was killed on the M1. So there is still a problem.

The first report of the Transport Select Committee said:

"we recommend the gradual installation of overhead lighting on existing motorways."

I am especially encouraged to know that the Transport Select Committee is in favour of lighting the motorways. The Committee recommended also that all new motorways should have overhead lights. That is marvellous. We should encourage moves to light the rest of the M1. The Department of Transport made a submission stating:

"If . . . there is a serious night accident problem which cannot be solved by other measures then lighting should be considered."

The evidence that the accident rate during the hours of darkness is worse than the rate in daylight cannot be disputed. Is not the time right and is it not worth spending the money now to make the M1 a safer place on which to drive?

1.45 am

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley) on securing this debate. I know that the subject is of great importance to him. Many of us travel up and down the M1 and some other motorways with great regularity. This is a useful opportunity for me to hear hon. Members' views on the M1.

The M1 has had to carry much more and much heavier traffic than was expected when work started on it in the early 1950s under my predecessor the former Member for Wallasey, the late Ernest Marples. This has required successive Administrations to monitor the M1's capacity. Work has been necessary to deal with wear and tear. Roads, like houses, need to be maintained, renovated and extended. It is no good thinking that we shall find some wonder product which means that we shall never have to resurface or repair.

Steps have been taken to increase the capacity of the length of the M1 between junctions 5 and 8 in Hertfordshire, which was the first part of the motorway to be opened in 1959. Under a scheme completed in November 1983 — between these two junctions — the motorway was widened to at least three lanes in each direction. Some surplus land enabled us to provide four lanes northbound between the site of the new M1-M25 junctions, now under construction north of M1 junction 6, and junction 7. Some new overbridges were built of sufficient width to accommodate a fourth lane if this became warranted in the future.

We are seeking to deal in the short term with some capacity problems at junctions. At junction 9 in Hertfordshire and junctions 12 and 13 in Bedfordshire northbound traffic has at times queued back on to the motorway in peak hours. A new roundabout junction is now in operation at junction 13 and, to ease traffic flows from the motorway, we shall be installing peak hour traffic signals at junction 12 this year. At junction 9 we are investigating the use of peak hour signals. Hertfordshire county council is also carrying out junction improvements to ease traffic flows from the motorway on to local roads.

My hon. Friend has suggested that the southern end of the M1 should be wider. While I have sympathy with the difficulties he and other hon. Members encounter, I have to say to him that here, as in relation to the rest of our motorway and trunk road system, we must use our limited resources carefully and build to the standard justified by the traffic volumes. I want to make it quite clear that we do not provide a particular standard of motorway or trunk road just because the route has a particular status.

Public funds for that work are not unlimited. It is important that we get the best value for money. If we were to build four-lane carriageways in places where they cannot be justified in terms of the traffic likely to use them other much-needed schemes would be postponed or forgone. As I have said on many occasions, I am not prepared to do that, but I shall do all that is necessary to try to make our roads safer.

Having said that, I am aware that traffic volumes on some of the southern sections of the M1 are beginning to build up, and we are monitoring that matter carefully. This is particularly true between junctions 7, the M10, and junction 10, Luton South. We hope that the M40 will be able to provide some relief.

There are several good reasons for completing the M40. It will bring relief to the M1 and the choice of an alternative route. There will be operational benefits from that choice during periods of maintenance or other disruptions to traffic, and I am sure that many people will seek to use the alternative route on their way to the north-west.

At the M40 public inquiry, my Department predicted that the M40 will, in normal conditions, attract between 13,000 and 16,000 vehicles per day from the M1 from the date of its opening. Even modest estimates suggest that these figures would rise to a range of 16,000 to 20,000 vehicles per day by the M40's design year of 2004.

My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for the Environment and Transport announced their decision on 14 December last to accept the recommendation of the inspector, who held the public inquiry into the proposals, that the new M40 motorway extension should be built.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax will agree that the relief we are seeking to provide by building the M40 will play a significant part in tackling the problems of congestion on the M1 which he has discussed today. The House should, however, be aware that since my right hon. Friends' decision there has been an application to the High Court seeking to have the made scheme quashed. It remains the Government's underlying policy to complete the M40 motorway.

[Mrs. Lynda Chalker]

In the corridor to the east of the M1, the A1 already provides a high standard dual carriageway alternative. With the completion of the scheme currently in progress at Hatfield in early 1987, the A1 will be of motorway standard all the way from its junction with M25 at South Mimms to the Bedfordshire border, and may offer a more attractive alternative than the A1 does at present for certain journeys. That too should help with the traffic on M1.

I agree with what my hon. Friends have said about driver behaviour. I am worried about the deteriorating standards of motorway driving. Most motorway accidents are caused by a minority of drivers who fail to react sensibly to changing road, traffic and weather conditions. However, we must not lose sight of the fact that, in terms of accidents, motorway travel is much safer than travel on other main roads. The accident rate for the M1 is not out of line with the average rate for motorways nationally, but I understand the anxiety about accidents in Northamptonshire and Bedfordshire which my hon. Friend mentioned.

Although the overall performance on motorways is the best of any roads, I accept that any accident is one too many. Offering advice and guidance is straightforward, but it is less easy to persuade road users to act on it responsibly. Our existing media coverage by press, radio and TV fillers is designed to do just that. We are currently running a campaign on motorway lane discipline and 23 million leaflets are being sent out by the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Centre at Swansea with vehicle tax renewal reminders over the 12-month period from May 1984 to April 1985.

My hon. Friend mentioned that he felt that we should have a full scale national publicity campaign on motorway driving. It would be very expensive and not necessarily cost effective. It is vital that we continue to direct our efforts towards road user groups known to be most vulnerable to traffic accidents. Our current campaigns on child pedestrian safety, cyclist safety and against driving after drinking are most important. I am afraid that generalised messages such as "Drive carefully" regrettably tend to be less effective. I assure the House that the Department will continue to co-operate with local initiatives to encourage safe driving. Much good work has been done in that respect, and it continues to be done, mainly by the police. I am sure that my hon. Friend will be glad to know that the police are considering a nationwide motorway safety campaign this year. One of the main points that we keep on trying to press home is that it is only by keeping an adequate distance behind the vehicle in front, sufficient to stop under all weather conditions, that one can be sure of not going into the back of another vehicle when an unexpected hazard arises.

Motorists who are concerned to remain safe on our roads would be well advised to take an advanced driving course and the Institute of Advanced Motorists or ROSPA advanced test, and to keep those qualifications up to date.

My hon. Friend spoke about the motorway speed limit. The raising of the 70 mph limit to 80 mph on motorways was rejected last year because of the likelihood of increased casualties. However, the possibility has been raised again by the Select Committee's report, which we are considering, and I know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport will look carefully at what it says.

My hon. Friend the Member for Halifax also said that he hoped we would consider making mandatory the temporary speed limit signs on motorways, which are currently advisory. I have already said in answer to questions in the House that we are considering that matter at present.

I should like to refer to lighting the M1, which is of such concern to both my hon. Friends, particularly my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels), who has been unrelenting in his pressure on behalf of safety through lighting on motorways. I think that he knows that we already constantly monitor accident rates on our motorways, and if a serious night-time problem develops on a particular length of road, lighting is automatically considered. A study is made, taking account of the possible accident savings, and capital running costs. I should remind my hon. Friend that I am reviewing road lighting policy following the serious multiple accident on the M25 in December, and in view of the recommendations of the House of Commons Committee on Road Safety in its recent report.

As I told my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax in answer to his question on 14 December, 68 miles of the M1 is lit out of a total length up to junction 43 of 194 miles. A further 16 miles of lighting is to be installed between the Newport Pagnell service area and junction 16, and we hope to complete that work by the end of 1986. The decision to light that stretch was taken in view of the night accident problem. It will fill a gap between stretches already lit and mean that the motorway will be lit from its start to junction 17, which is the junction with the M45, at junctions 19 and 21, and from junctions 24 to 26. The possibility of further lighting will be studied, but we can do the lighting only bit by bit because of the maintenance and cone problem to which my hon. Friend referred.

I have given the go-ahead recently for the installation of closer-spaced matrix signalling at 1 km intervals on 50 miles of the M1 in Bedfordshire and Northamptonshire. We are getting on with that, and I hope that a start can be made on installation early next year. We shall monitor what happens. We hope that that will help to reduce the number of accidents, and we shall be able to evaluate the techniques that we are using for potential future use on other inter-urban motorways.

I should like to refer to reconstruction and maintenance. I was grateful for what my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax said about the improvements. Because of changing the crossovers and various other technical matters where we have to have contraflow systems, travelling has improved. But drivers still drive far too close together, and still ignore the speed advice signs.

I know how annoying it can be sometimes when, having been held up, one sees a length of cones, and apparently no work going on inside the cones. We do not leave cones out to get the sunshine or the moonlight. They are there only when necessary — sometimes for the drying out of the road surface, which, according to the time of year, can take varying times. That is sometimes annoying to the travelling motorist who has been delayed.

This has been a useful and helpful debate. I have taken careful note of what has been said. I hope that I have been able to reassure my hon. Friends—at least partially—and the House that the Government hae an active concern for the needs of travellers on the M1, and will take their needs fully into account when developing the future strategy for the motorways and, indeed, for greater safety upon them.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at Two o'clock.

House of Commons

Oral Answers to Questions

NORTHERN IRELAND

Junior Ministers (Portfolios)

1. Mr. J. Enoch Powell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will re-allocate the portfolios among the junior Ministers of the Northern Ireland Office so as to avoid the same Minister being responsible for both environment and health and social services.

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Douglas Hurd): The two portfolios have been carried with distinction by my hon. Friend since June 1983. I have no plans to re-allocate them.

Mr. Powell: Is the Secretary of State aware that this question carries no sort of imputation or criticism of the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Patten), but does not the Secretary of State recognise that the detailed part of these duties could be much more effectively carried out if it were administered by locally elected representatives?

Mr. Hurd: I accept what the right hon. Gentleman says in the first part of his supplementary questions. He is really criticising the system under which it is I who have too wide powers which in his view ought to be in the hands of an elected authority. I have a great deal of sympathy for that point of view. If it were possible to reach agreement in the Province on arrangements that would pass some of those powers out of my hands into the hands of an elected authority or authorities, and if they gained widespread acceptance in so doing, both I and the House would wish to look at them very carefully.

Terrorism (Damage Claims)

2. Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he is satisfied with the procedures followed by his Department in the processing of claims for damage due to terrorist activity.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Nicholas Scott): Yes, Sir. The present procedures enable claims to be dealt with quickly and efficiently within the framework provided by the criminal damage legislation.

Mr. Ross: But surely the Minister is aware of many cases where further information is requested from the applicant at a fairly late stage in the proceedings. Would it not be helpful to all concerned if the Government were to prepare and issue to every applicant a detailed list of the information that would be needed before the application for compensation was completed? Surely that would benefit everybody in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Scott: Almost invariably in these cases, those with any substantial claims have legal advisers to help them. Guidance is issued by the Northern Ireland Office for the assistance of claimants. Many of the delays occurring at a late stage are those related to consequential loss which requires detailed accounting information. This can take some time both to produce and then to assess.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Will the Secretary of State inform the House of the time that certain cases have been outstanding? Is it not a fact that many claimants have been waiting an extremely long time for final payment?

Mr. Scott: That is right in terms of final payment, but it is the practice of the branch concerned in the Northern Ireland Office always to issue interim payments so as to reduce the hardship suffered by individual claimants.

Mr. McCusker: I accept that interim payments are useful, but how can the Minister describe the system as speedy and efficient when it takes up to and over two years for the final settlement to be made? Surely the Minister should re-examine the entire procedure.

Mr. Scott: Final settlement has still not been completed in the Droppin' Well Inn case, but well over £500,000 has been paid out in criminal damage and criminal injury claims in that case. We want to tidy up the final details as quickly as possible.

Security

3. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the security situation in the Province.

8. Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will make a statement on the security situation in the Province.

18. Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the current security situation in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hurd: Since I last answered questions in the House on 10 January, one member of the Ulster Defence Regiment and one civilian have died in incidents arising from the security situation in the Province.

The security forces continue to combat terrorism with courage and determination. Since the beinning of this year a total of 57 people have been charged with serious offences including two with murder and five with attempted murder; and 14 weapons, 691 rounds of ammunition and 1·5lbs of explosives have been recovered.

Mr. Parry: Will the Secretary of State consider reviewing the use of weapons by these security forces, bearing in mind the killing of Mrs. Norah McCabe by the Royal Ulster Constabulary and the killing recently of a young joyrider by the Ulster Defence Regiment? Both these innocent people lost their lives unnecessarily. Will the right hon. Gentleman consider disbanding the UDR, which is a sectarian organisation with fewer than 2,000 Catholic members? Will he make a statement on the recent protests made by the Irish Foreign Secretary to his Department?

Mr. Hurd: Every soldier and police officer in Northern Ireland who goes out on an operation knows that he is subject to the law. The courts take a serious view if they find that the force used went beyond that which was reasonable. That is a serious constraint that is not always properly appreciated. I do not believe that it would be compatible with the security of Northern Ireland or with the safety of its citizens to disband the UDR. We have had various exchanges of a courteous kind with the Irish Government on several recent incidents and I am not sure to which one the hon. Gentleman is referring especially.

Mr. Latham: Is my right hon. Friend aware that on the Conservative Benches and, I suspect, on others in this place there is the hope that we shall hear no more talk of disbanding the UDR? It has been doing excellent work and it is regrettable that deaths have occurred recently.

Mr. Hurd: Yes, Sir. Talk of disbanding the UDR ignores the crucial role that it plays in many parts of the Province. It is important that by its methods of recruitment, training and deployment it is made clear that it is a force whose aim and purpose is to defend all citizens of the Province and that it is not, as has been alleged, a sectarian force.

Mr. Proctor: In the light of the proposed talks between the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) and the so-called Army Council of the IRA and the statement of Dr. FitzGerald that if the meeting takes place in the Republic he will take measures to ensure that it is broken up, will my right hon. Friend take similar measures if the talks take place within the United Kingdom? Will he give an assurance that the provisions of the Prevention of Terrorism Act will apply to all those who participate in the talks and condemn all those who take part in the talks, which are treasonous talks?

Mr. Hurd: I have expressed my view that the proposal that such a meeting should be held is not wise. Under our system it is not for me to decide or direct how the law in Northern Ireland, let alone any other part of the United Kingdom, should be upheld. That is the responsibility of the chief constables. It is clear that if members of the IRA Army Council were to meet in Northern Ireland, avowedly in that capacity, they would be committing an offence under section 21 of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisons) Act 1978 of belonging or professing to belong to a proscribed organisation.

Mr. Hume: In the light of the obvious controversy that surrounds the UDR, has the Secretary of State yet apprised himself of the numbers of members of that regiment who have been charged with or been found guilty of serious offences? Does he not think that he should have apprised himself of such figures?

Mr. Hurd: Of course I am aware of the serious cases that have occurred over the years and which have involved different members of the security forces, not solely the UDR. Those cases have been taken very seriously by the judiciary and the courts. I am also aware, because I have met them and, in some cases, their widows, of the large numbers of people in Northern Ireland who have joined the UDR at great personal risk. Under continuing tension and risk over many years they have given a great deal of selfless service to their fellow citizens. That must also be taken into account.

Mr. Peter Robinson: In view of the great controversy involved in the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) meeting murderers, and in view of the Secretary of State's statement at the Dispatch Box today that such a meeting would be illegal, does he agree that under the Criminal Law Act 1967 anyone who refused to give information about such a meeting would commit an offence that is punishable by imprisonment? Does the right hon. Gentleman agree with the golden principle that no-one —politician or pauper—should be seen to be above the law?

Mr. Hurd: No one is above the law. I am advised that under section 5 of the Criminal Law Act 1967 a person who has information likely to secure the arrest of someone who has committed an arrestable offence commits an offence if he fails within a reasonable time and without reasonable excuse to give that information to the police. That is probably the section to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

Mr. Molyneaux: Will the Secretary of State consider the use of additional units of the SAS to counter the IRA's campaign of genocide in the frontier regions—genocide which, unfortunately, has involved many members of the Ulster Defence Regiment?

Mr. Hurd: That is not directly a matter for me, but units of the Regular Army are available to the General Officer Commanding when, in consultation with the Chief Constable, he believes that they are needed.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: I welcome my right hon. Friend's denunciation of the campaign of character assassination as well as physical assassination of the UDR, but is not the reason why some people are able to misrepresent the Regiment as sectarian the systematic murder of so many Catholic members of the UDR and the systematic intimidation of their families? Was not the first fatal casualty in the UDR a Roman Catholic living in the Falls road?

Mr. Hurd: I believe that that is right. It is certainly true, regrettable and understandable that the proportion of Catholics in the UDR has declined. I have no doubt that intimidation has played an important part in that. It is essential that the UDR's role is understood and defended by those who recognise the realities of terrorism in Northern Ireland. The regiment itself, by its recruitment, training and deployment, should show to the world that it is not a sectarian force.

Mr. Duffy: What specific action has the Secretary of State taken about the partiality of the UDR revealed at the recent trial of one of its privates, Mr. Geoffrey Edwards, for the murder of a Sinn Fein election agent, Mr. Peter Corrigan? What incentive is there to abandon the bullet for the ballot if one puts one's self at risk from, of all people, men in British Army uniform?

Mr. Hurd: I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman should take that line. Under our system, it is for the courts to take a view of offences of that kind. As he knows, the courts took a serious view of the case to which he referred. There are plenty of opportunities for members of the minority community to take part in the public life of Northern Ireland, and I wish that they would increasingly do so.

Rev. Ian Paisley: May we have an assurance that every step will be taken in the Lisnaskea area to see that UDR men who are serving valiantly the cause of peace in the area get the adequate cover that they need? Will the right hon. Gentleman order an inquiry into the circumstances of the tragic murder of Mr. Jimmy Graham, who, in going to Derrylin without any cover, might as well, from the security point of view, have beeen going to Crossmaglen?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman has told me of his concerns about that case, and they are being looked into.

Mr. John David Taylor: Will the Secretary of State confirm that about 35,000 people in Northern Ireland are serving or have served in the UDR and that, on the basis of those figures, it is wholly irresponsible for the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) to call for the disbandment of the UDR? Will he remind the right hon. and learned Gentleman that the disbandment of that force could result only in the transfer of many thousands of regular soldiers from the British Army back into Northern Ireland?

Mr. Hurd: I have said that what the UDR does in the Province is indispensable for the protection of its citizens. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that it is wrong and misleading for generalised accusations to be built on the basis of particular cases. I am surprised that people with experience, particularly those with experience in the legal profession, should fall into that trap.

Mr. Spencer: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the security situation in Northern Ireland is not helped by actions such as those of the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn), who, on a day when marches had been banned in the city of Leicester, came to the city and spoke publicly in favour of the actions of Sinn Fein and spoke in an inflammatory manner?

Mr. Hurd: I am hardly surprised. I am even less surprised at my hon. and learned Friend's reaction, which I share.

Mr. Archer: Has the right hon. Gentleman had an opportunity to study the poll carried out by the Northern Ireland consumer panel, and published in the Belfast Telegraph, demonstrating that 89 per cent. of Protestants in Northern Ireland believe that the system of justice is fair, while only 36 per cent. of Catholics have a similar belief? Reverting to the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Attercliff (Mr. Duffy), will the right hon. Gentleman try to identify those aspects of the system which cause such anxiety among Catholics? Does he propose to make a beginning by introducing legislation to implement the Baker recommendations?

Mr. Hurd: I read the interesting poll which was published in the Belfast Telegraph yesterday. Although one should take such surveys with some scepticism, it showed the truth of something that I have been trying to say for some months, namely, that it is misleading to generalise about such matters as the attitude of members of the minority community to the Royal Ulster Constabulary, and such generalisations are not borne out by those findings. The right hon. and learned Gentleman is entitled to prod me from time to time about legislation to reflect decisions on the Baker review. I hope that we shall be able to make an announcement about that before long and that legislation will follow as soon as we can find a slot for it.

Nuclear Burst (Damage)

4. Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what effect a 1 megaton nuclear burst at a height of 300 miles would have on the equipment and resources in his charge.

5. Mr. Malins asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what action he is taking to harden vulnerable equipment in his charge against the effects of nuclear electromagnetic pulse.

Mr. Scott: The principal effect of a high level nuclear blast of 1 megaton would be an electromagnetic pulse. This could cause very widespread damage to telecommunications, electronic equipment, and electricity supply and appliances if they were not protected. Much work and research is presently going on throughout the world on the question of protection against the effects of such a pulse, and we in Northern Ireland will make full use of all available information to protect essential equipment such as that designated for civil defence purposes.

Mr. Hayes: I am grateful for that answer. Will my hon. Friend ensure that technical advice on those matters is available for those who need to know?

Mr. Scott: A great deal of work is going on and we shall ensure, for example, that the new purpose-built buildings in Northern Ireland, which are planned for completion by 1988, will be fully protected up to the most modern standards.

Mr. John David Taylor: In view of the serious nature of the Minister's reply, will he assure the House that the Government have no such intentions in Northern Ireland?

Community Relations

6. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has any new plans to try to bring together the two communities in Northern Ireland to discuss their fundamental differences.

Mr. Hurd: I have recently had further talks with the constitutional parties during which I urged them to seek practical arrangements for a system of government which they can agree to operate.

Mr. Flannery: Has not the killing and maiming—not just from one side—been going on for 16 years? If no initiative is taken, 16 years from now people will be sitting here still trying to solve the same problems. Are we going to bring the two sides together? I do not mean have discussions with them privately; I mean to bring them together in a proper conference to have them air their differences so that we can all share them, discover precisely what they are, and take it from there, otherwise when will there ever be an end to it?

Mr. Hurd: A public conference of the kind that the hon. Gentleman advocates would not do much good, because public positions are frequently proclaimed. It is necessary for the party leaders to find an occasion to meet, two by two, or collectively, to see whether some of the more hopeful things that have been written and said in recent months can be turned into practical proposals. That is what I am trying to encourage.

Mr. Beggs: Does the Secretary of State accept that further polarisation of the communities is undesirable, and that to date the housing needs of the Northern Ireland communities have been well satisfied and good progress has been made on that front? It is now the appropriate time for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive to maintain mixed communities where there have been good community relations and where Roman Catholics and Protestants have lived side by side, but where, because of the executive's present allocation there is a real possibility that further single community ghettos will develop, which will hinder progress and reconciliation.

Mr. Hurd: I agree with the hon. Gentleman's first point. On his main point, it is difficult for the Housing

Executive or anyone else to generalise too broadly about what is best in each case. If the hon. Gentleman has particular instances in mind which he has not yet drawn to the attention of my hon. Friend, I hope that he will do so.

Mr. Latham: Is it not clear that sectarian differences are likely to be worsened if representatives of one constitutional party in Northern Ireland decide to meet terrorist representatives?

Mr. Hurd: I have given my view on that several times recently. I do not believe that such a meeting would be wise, not least because of the setback which I believe it would constitute to the edging forward and the progress which I believe has been made towards the leaders of the constitutional parties having serious discussions.

Mr. Hume: Leaving aside the background to that affair, which requires a little more time than that provided by Question Time, does the Secretary of State agree that the reaction of members of the Unionist party and the Democratic Unionist party, who have said that they will call off the proposed talks with the SDLP because I have decided to confront a violent organisation about its violence, is dishonest and hypocritical, given that they have been openly sitting down, not to confront violent organisations, but to collaborate with them with the objective of bringing down the power-sharing executive? They were members of the council of a murderous organisation which murdered more than 500 innocent people in Northern Ireland. They did that not to stop violence but to collaborate with such organisations. It is hypocrisy to criticise me for confronting a violent organisation to get it to stop. Further, will he tell me whether he agrees with the statement that the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) made yesterday? He described an organisation which has murdered more than 500 innocent civilians as a counter-terrorist organisation and therefore not really a terrorist organisation. Does the Secretary of State agree with that statement? Will the right hon. Gentleman——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That will be plenty.

Mr. Hurd: It is for Unionist Members to explain their views about that meeting. I have explained mine. The courage of the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) in denouncing and resisting violence is, I believe, unmatched in the House. I hope that he will think again about this, as I believe that he and the other elected Members of constitutional parties in Northern Ireland had reached the stage at which definite practical discussions between them were possible and might be fruitful. I should very much regret it if that prospect were put at risk.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Is the Secretary of State aware that the leaders of Unionism in Northern Ireland have made it perfectly clear that the door is open for the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) to come and talk to them provided that he does not talk to the IRA, so it is he who is closing the door, not the Unionist leaders in Northern Ireland? Is the Secretary of State further aware that the hon. Gentleman's accusations today are totally false and that at no time did Unionist leaders sit down with murderers or the Army Council of either the UDA or the UVF, and well he knows it.

Mr. Hume: Practise what you preach.

Mr. Hurd: In my view, it is precisely that kind of exchange, taking place in the earshot of members of the British public throughout the country, from which we must get away if there is to be any real progress in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Archer: Does the Secretary of State agree that whether something might be gained for the cause of peace and reconciliation by speaking to a particular group is a matter of judgment which each of us has to make in good faith and on which we may disagree? Will he try to persuade the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) that if we refuse to speak to those with whose judgment we disagree the cause of reconciliation and the prospects of finding a solution will move further away?

Mr. Hurd: I agree that it is a matter of judgment, and we are all entitled to make our own judgments.

Local Government

7. Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what new proposals he has to strengthen the structure of local government in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hurd: The Government will consider any new proposals for regional or local administration that command widespread acceptance throughout the community.

Sir John Farr: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. May I draw his attention to the recent Assembly report, which shows that a strengthening of local government responsibility would be welcomed? As it is widely felt that certain central Government responsibilities could now be transferred to local government, will my right hon. Friend consider initiating a conference on the subject in the spring in the Province?

Mr. Hurd: I am not very enthusiastic about transferring powers to the existing district councils in Northern Ireland, for reasons which should be apparent to anyone who studies that scene at the moment. My hon. Friend is right, however, in saying that the Assembly Committee has made a preliminary report, although it did not attempt to discuss the basic matters which he rightly raises. I hope that in the coming weeks a further report, although not necessarily a final report, will be produced. The Committee is handicapped in that the SDLP is not represented on it or giving evidence to it, but a further report could examine on behalf of the parties represented on the Committee various options which they believe are worth carrying forward.

Mr. McNamara: Can the Secretary of State tell us whether, when he met the IRA, and when his noble Friend Lord Whitelaw and his hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry met the IRA, they confronted the IRA on the question of violence, or did they merely talk about local government?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That question would more appropriately have been asked on the preceding question, although I did not manage to call the hon. Gentleman then.

Mr. McNamara: With respect, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the question relate to strengthening the structure of local government?

Mr. McNamara: With respect, Mr. Speaker, I asked whether the Secretary of State discussed those matters or whether he discussed local government.

Mr. Hurd: I never discussed local government on that occasion.

Rev. William McCrea: Could not the Secretary of State's failure to proscribe Sinn Fein destroy the present local government set-up rather than strengthen it?

Mr. Hurd: No, Sir. That is a separate question, but I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman's conclusion.

Mr. Molyneaux: Would not some suggestion of an enhanced role for councillors encourage many people of real ability to come forward as candidates for all the political parties in Northern Ireland at the coming elections?

Mr. Hurd: I understand that argument. If the party leaders, of whom the right hon. Gentleman is one, or the Devolution Report Committee of the Assembly, were able to bring forward proposals that I could commend to the Cabinet and the House as commanding widespread acceptance, that would be a step forward.

Mr. Stanbrook: Is there not a role for the Assembly in serving as the upper tier of local government in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Hurd: That role would be rather different from the one given to the Assembly by the House. The Assembly is doing a good job in the scrutinising role that is its immediate responsibility. However, if the elected representatives of constitutional parties in the Province came forward with a proposal on the lines that my hon. Friend has suggested and could show that the proposal was widely accepted across the communities, it should certainly be considered.

Ancillary Medical Staff

9. Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the target norms for community doctors, nurses, psychiatric nurses, social workers and therapists set for the various health and social service boards; and whether he is satisfied that they have been met.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Chris Patten): Target norms are generally not used by the Department of Health and Social Services as a basis for determining priorities for service development, largely because they are not sensitive to local variation in service needs. The Department's existing regional guidelines for determining priorities are set out in circular HSS(P)1/80, a copy of which is available in the Library.

Rev. Martin Smyth: Is the Minister satisfied that there are enough people in post, in the western board area in particular, to serve the needs of the people? Should not more attention be paid to raising the level of provision of community doctors and workers in that area and others?

Mr. Patten: We have been attempting to do so. The Department has consistently increased funds to community services at a faster rate than those to institutional services over the past decade. We shall continue to do so, whatever the occasional difficulties.

Mr. Bell: Has not the number of unemployed nurses in Northern Ireland spiralled from about 350 when the Government took office to between 1,450 and 1,500? That is the number of qualified nursing personnel who are available for work but cannot be employed by any of the four area health boards because of insufficient funding. Is it not also true that there is a major psychiatric hospital in Antrim which is understaffed to the extent of 100 trained nursing personnel?

Mr. Patten: The hon. Gentleman will welcome the fact that the number of qualified nurses in Northern Ireland has spiralled over the past five years. There are 2,000 more of them now than there were when the hon. Gentleman's party left office. More nurses are unemployed because more qualified nurses are staying on than was once the case.

Short Brothers

10. Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will pay an official visit to the aircraft manufacturing factories of Short Brothers in Belfast.

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Dr. Rhodes Boyson): My right hon. Friend and I visited Shorts' headquarters at Queens Island last November and were shown its aircraft, aerostructures and missile manufacturing activities. I keep in regular contact with the chairman and expect to make further visits to the company in due course.

Mr. Taylor: Will the Minister join me in congratulating Shorts on its success in selling eight commuter aircraft to China, as announced earlier this week? Does he agree that that underlines the marketing strength of Shorts, which could also be used to sell the Tucano trainer aeroplane abroad on its own or with the British Aerospace model?

Dr. Boyson: I rang the chairman the following morning to congratulate him on the sale of eight aircraft to China, other sales that it has recently achieved and the option on seven more aeroplanes. I know that many people in the Province hope that the Tucano aircraft will be chosen, bearing in mind what it will do for Shorts and employment in the Province.

Mr. Stephen Ross: Is the Minister aware that there are other contenders for the RAF basic trainer? Will he convey to the Secretary of State, who I am sure will want to make the right decision, that the right aeroplane to choose is that which the RAF wants most and which can be acquired at the most sensible price? Does he agree that that is probably the PC9, which is linked with British Aerospace?

Dr. Boyson: I am well aware that there are other contenders. The fact that Shorts has done so well in the past is at least a recommendation for future contracts.

Mr. Bell: When the Minister pays his next visit to Shorts, will he take with him the appropriate copy of the American business magazine "Industry Week", which last year forecast that Shorts might be on course to becoming one of the United Kingdom's biggest industrial success stories? If that is so, why does the Minister want to inflict on Shorts the dogma of privatisation?

Dr. Boyson: I welcome the achievements of Shorts to which the hon. Gentleman referred. There are no immediate plans for privatisation, but we are taking advice on the problems, advantages and costs of privatisation. As with other denationalised industries, employees would be able to become shareholders, but it is essential that Shorts remains in Northern Ireland.

Aldergrove and Belfast Harbour Airports

11. Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the future of Aldergrove and Belfast Harbour airports.

Mr. Chris Patten: Algergrove will continue to be the main airport serving the demands for air transport in Northern Ireland. However, additional services are provided from other airports in Northern Ireland, including Belfast Harbour airport, where scheduled services recommenced in February 1983.

Mr. Atkins: Does my hon. Friend agree that the Civil Aviation Authority proposal to include Harbour airport but to exclude Aldergrove within the area operating facility list is a slap in the face for competition in the Province, which has so far forced Aldergrove to reduce its charges and then to keep them steady for the past two years? Will the Minister ensure that Harbour airport maintains its place in the interests of non-jet airlines, passengers and Shorts?

Mr. Patten: I do not recognise any slaps in the face. As my hon. Friend knows, the matter is principally one for the CAA and therefore in this House for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport.

Northern Ireland Assembly

12. Mr. Bellingham asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he intends to devolve more power to the Northern Ireland Assembly.

Mr. Hurd: I hope that the Assembly will produce proposals as soon as it can for devolved arrangements which would be likely to command widespread acceptance throughout the community and which I could therefore recommend to this House.

Mr. Bellingham: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, unless all parties take their place in the Assembly, it cannot fulfil its proposed role? Does he agree also that it would make sense to set a date by which all of the parties should have participated and that, if they have not, we should reconsider the Assembly's future?

Mr. Hurd: I am not sure that it would be sensible now to act on my hon. Friend's advice. I hope that the Devolution Report Committee on the Assembly can produce proposals, mainly in a further interim report, which could help us to work something out that would command widespread acceptance.

Mr. Flannery: Is not the Northern Ireland Assembly a farce? The minority communities distrust it so much that they do not attend it, and it is therefore completely one-sided and talks to itself.

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman is wrong. The Assembly does a good deal of practical and useful work, which has improved the quality of administration in the Province.

Job Creation

13. Mr. Couchman asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the current rate of job creation in Northern Ireland; and how this compares with Great Britain.

Dr. Boyson: An analysis of employment returns in Northern Ireland shows that at least 732 employers, employing 25 or more staff, increased their employment by a total of 11,151 jobs in the 12 months ending September 1984.

Mr. Couchman: Is my hon. Friend satisfied that this impressive rate of progress will lead to a significant diminution in the tragic rate of unemployment in the Province?

Mr. Boyson: I hope, as my hon. Friend does, that that will be the case. Similarly, we hope that there will be an increase in job creation this year, even against last year's figures.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Dixon asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 7 February.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Dixon: Will the Prime Minister find time today to apologise to the Archbishop of Canterbury for trying to steal the credit for the release of the four Britons from Libya? Now that she has seen that the Church has shown more initiative, wisdom and diplomacy about foreign affairs than her Government, will she accept its advice on domestic affairs and get the National Coal Board to negotiate a speedy and honourable settlement of this dispute?

The Prime Minister: I gladly pay tribute to the Archbishop of Canterbury and Mr. Waite, as I did on Tuesday. The hon. Gentleman will find that in Hansard. All the praise is theirs for having secured a successful outcome to the Libyan hostages problem.

Q2. Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 7 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Howarth: My right hon. Friend will have heard today that more miners going to work have again been stoned by pickets. In view of the critical part played by violence and intimidation in prolonging the coal dispute, will she set up an inquiry to examine the organisation and the financing of organised picketing and violence in the dispute?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend knows, my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has been undertaking a review of the Public Order Act, which will take account of experiences on the picket line. I agree that the strike has been prolonged by violence and intimidation. The Home Secretary's review is nearing completion, and I hope that we shall soon be in a position to make an announcement about it.

Mr. Kinnock: Throughout the miners' strike the Prime Minister has repeatedly demanded that the National Union of Mineworkers accepts the NACOD agreement. In the light of today's joint statement from the unions, which says that

"the conditions being demanded of the NUM by the NCB effectively negate the agreement reached between NACOD and the NCB" will she strongly advise the board to return to full negotiations, so that the strike can be settled?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman will be aware that the board met NACODS early this week and made it clear that it would honour the agreement with NACODS in full. The board reaffirmed that position to NACODS. It is perhaps a greaty pity that this morning NACODS was unable to persuade the NUM to accept the NACODS agreement and the spirit of it, or, alternatively, to accept the single compromise that was previously negotiated through the Advisory Conciliation and Arbitration Service.

Mr. Kinnock: The Prime Minister is either grossly misinterpreting or grossly misrepresenting this morning's events and the discussion and agreement between the NUM executive and NACODS. She has before her the joint statement issued by those unions. Now that there is a serious effort to restart negotiations for settlement, will she start to act like a responsible Prime Minister instead of seeking further to impede negotiations and being a wrecker who wants conquest at any cost?

The Prime Minister: That is absolute nonsense. The board will honour the agreement with NACODS in full. May I stress that again and again. It is not in doubt. If the NUM would also accept the NACODS agreement and the spirit of it, the coal strike could be over. I urge the right hon. Gentleman to urge the NUM to accept the NACODS agreement.

Mr. Kinnock: The Prime Minister has used exactly the words that she used last week. I urge her, because the circumstances are significantly changed by this morning's discussion and agreement between the two unions, to use the power that she knows she has to advise the board to resume negotiatioes. The National Association of Colliery Overmen, Deputies and Shotfirers has said:

"It is agreed that the conditions being demanded of the NUM by the NCB would effectively negate the agreement reached between NACODS and the NCB in October 1984."

Does the right hon. Lady not understand that the whole basis of agreement is in jeopardy because of her interference and the way in which she has sought to prolong the dispute? She has a chance to secure negotiation and settlement now. Why does she not take it?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman is trying to make out that an agreement freely negotiated between the NCB and NACODS is in jeopardy. It is not, and nothing that he says can put a freely negotiated agreement between two sides in jeopardy. That agreement with NACODS is not in jeopardy. The National Coal Board met NACODS earlier this week to re-affirm, yet again, that the agreement will be honoured in full. Why does not the right hon. Gentleman urge the NUM to accept that agreement? It will be honoured by the NCB in full, regardless of the impression that the right hon. Gentleman is trying to give to prolong the strike.

Mr. Sackville: In view of what many pensioners and chronically ill people are being told by their doctors about the future availability of medicines, will my right hon. Friend confirm that no limited list will be issued which, of itself, compels NHS patients to pay for or do without medicines for which they have a clear clinical need?

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services has gone into this matter in great detail. The proposals that he has put forward are in the interests of NHS patients and will release money for the care of more patients.

Dr. Owen: Will the Prime Minister clarify the NACODS settlement? Is it not true that the settlement allows for an independent reviw procedure, but that it also allows the NCB to close pits against the advice of the independent review procedure? Equally, there is no commitment on NACODS' part to accept the independent review procedure, and it can take strike action. The same would apply to the NUM if it signed the NACODS agreement. The unions are not bound to accept the advice of the independent review procedure. Does the Prime Minister accept that it is vital that the NCB's right to manage should not be interfered with?

The Prime Minister: Yes, Sir. The last paragraph of the NACODS agreement states:

"If, at the end of this process"— that is the colliery review procedure—

"the matter was still in conflict and might lead to a foreshortening of a colliery's life expectancy, this question, as has already happened in the past, can be referred for national consideration and, indeed, would then be subject to the Independent Review Body and full weight given to its findings, just as would be the case in any question of a distinct closure proposal."

The NACODS approach was given in evidence to the Select Committee. It was different from the NUM approach given in evidence to that same Select Committee. On 25 November 1982 NACODS made it clear that it would, as the right hon. Gentleman said, oppose closures. Its representatives made it clear that the association would normally agree to closures only when reserves of coal had been absolutely worked out. It went on then to make the right hon. Gentleman's other point:

"In other circumstances, the decision to close will be made by the National Coal Board."

The right hon. Gentleman is correct. NACODS may oppose all the way, but in the end it will accept the National Coal Board's right to manage, and of course it is perfectly free to use the strike weapon should it choose. [Interruption.] Right hon. and hon. Gentlemen do not want to hear the agreement or the evidence that was given. An agreement cannot be negated by things said outside the room in which it was reached.

Q3. Mr. Wilson asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 7 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Wilson: With the renewed onset of severe winter weather, will the Prime Minister read the letter sent to her by her own Solicitor-General for Scotland criticising the unfair and unjustifiable fuel allowances system that caused so much concern three weeks ago? Is she not aware that there are rumours circulating that, instead of conducting a review intended to bring in fairer allowances, the intention of the DHSS and the Cabinet is to abolish heating allowances altogether? Since the average electricity heating bill in the north of Scotland is £290, compared with £204 in the south of England, will she take action to deny the rumours that the DHSS does not intend to reach a fairer fuel allowance system and pledge that the Government will introduce one as soon as possible?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that we have already announced a review of these provisions, and that is being undertaken by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security. I have in front of me the letter to which the hon. Gentleman refers. It says:

"Although every Scottish MP knows that more than four hundred million pounds is spent on heating allowances throughout the United Kingdom each year, that fact is being conveniently overlooked."

It also says that I should "be aware that the SNP as well as the Labour Party have been outspoken in their support for this very damaging, costly and violent strike. They ignore the fact that the potential effect of this industrial action on pensioners' fuel bills is far greater than anything this additional heating allowance could ever cover."

Mr. Speaker: Order. I appeal for shorter questions, please. [HON. MEMBERS: "And shorter answers."]

Q.4 Mr. Stokes asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 7 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Stokes: Has my right hon. Friend noticed in yesterday's and today's newspapers the great success story of a firm in the north-east of England, Tyne Shiprepairers, which, since privatisation only a year ago, has turned a loss of £13 million into a profit, has gained new orders of £19 million and has doubled its labour force—all in the space of one year? Is there not a moral here?

The Prime Minister: I congratulate the Tyne Shiprepair company on an excellent first year. It took 500 people on to its payroll. It has done extremely well under the spur of privatisation and has now 1,200 on its payroll. Success and privatisation — [Interruption.] — create genuine jobs—and how the Opposition hate that.

Mr. Foot: Reverting to the mining dispute, does the Prime Minister appreciate that what changed the situation last week was the issue, by the Coal Board with her approval, of a demand that the National Union of Mineworkers should sign a document before it came to the negotiating table? Does she not understand that it was that demand that also wrecked the position with NACODS? Does she not understand this, and will she say why she and her Ministers did not consult NACODS before they gave approval to the document that injured the negotiations? As she has played such a prominent part in injuring those negotiations, will she at last make some effort to get decent negotiations going?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman is, I believe, under a fundamental misconception. An agreement negotiated between two bodies holds and is reaffirmed and can never be upset, except by further agreement between those two bodies. The NCB met NACODS earlier this week and reaffirmed that the agreement that they had previously negotiated still stands. It cannot be upset by what is said elsewhere.

Mr. Flannery: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Does it arise from questions?

Mr. Flannery: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Is it in order for the Prime Minister to adopt a completely new habit of reading from the pamphlets that she brings with her, so much so that Back Benchers now have less time available to ask questions because of the amount of endless and boring reading in which the Prime Minister engages?

Mr. Speaker: As the House knows, I take a particular interest in ensuring the protection of Back Benchers. My view is that at Prime Minister's Question Time a little too much time is now taken up by the Front Benches, thereby denying time to Back Benchers.

Mr. Kinnock: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) was referring to a very recent habit — repeated again today — of reading from a lengthy statement of Government policy, on this occasion in response to a question from an Opposition Member. However, on Tuesday the Prime Minister did so in response to a vital question on Gibraltar from a Conservative Member.

As you are concerned about the time taken by the Front Benches, I invite you to go through Hansard for the last few months and to compare my subscriptions with the responses of the Prime Minister. I am sure you will discover that the House has been preoccupied much more with the right hon. Lady's long answers than with any of my questions.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We have a busy day ahead of us and I do not think we should get into any dispute on this matter. I simply say to the Leader of the Opposition that I leave him wide discretion to rise more than twice — mostly on three occasions — for that very reason. I realise that a very important issue was discussed today.

Mr. Loyden: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it not an abuse of the House and of the protection afforded Back Benchers who are entitled to question the Prime Minister — who is already under considerable protection, given that she answers questions for only half an hour each week — for the right hon. Lady to use Back Benchers' time to avoid responding to questions?

Mr. Speaker: It is a question of balance, and in the past we have done rather well. On one occasion we got through 15 questions to the Prime Minister.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Would not some of these points be met, and would not we all get on much better, if the Opposition abandoned their consistent attempts, Tuesday after Tuesday, Thursday after Thursday, to prevent the Prime Minister from being heard, thus adding to the time it takes for my right hon. Friend to inform the House of her views?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that it is generally acknowledged — and I say this with sadness — that the noise during Prime Minister's Question Time has increased. I have mentioned this in recent weeks. I hope that the House will take that very much to heart.

Mr. Skinner: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is not only a matter for the Front Benches of the Labour party and a question of the Prime Minister taking up more time than my right hon. Friend. You should also take into account, Mr. Speaker, that whenever the Leader of the Social Democratic party is called he speaks with the same voice as the Prime Minister, so, in effect, you should subtract his time and add it on to the Government's.

Mr. Speaker: I do take that into account, and I did so today.

Business of the House

3.35 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): May I ask the Leader of the House whether he will state the business for next week?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): Yes, Sir. The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 11 FEBRUARY—Private Members' Motions until seven o'clock.

Afterwards, timetable motion on the Local Government Bill.

Motion relating to the Control of Industrial Major Accident Hazards Regulations 1984.

TUESDAY 12 FEBRUARY — Second Reading of the Transport Bill.

Motion relating to the Housing Benefits (Amendment) (No. 4) Regulations 1984.

WEDNESDAY 13 FEBRUARY AND THURSDAY 14 FEBRUARY—Committee stage of the Representation of the People Bill.

FRIDAY 15 FEBRUARY—Private Members' Bills.

MONDAY 18 FEBRUARY — Second Reading of the London Regional Transport (Amendment) Bill.

Mr. Kinnock: First, I understand that all Governments have to introduce guillotines, but the timetable motion for next Monday is an outrage because it concerns a Bill which will deprive 13 million electors of democratic rights over an important tier of local government. I express the hope that Conservative Members who are opposed to the measure will join us in our efforts to prevent the guillotine falling on this Bill.

Will the Leader of the House clear up the matter of when the House will debate the White Paper on public expenditure? On 17 January the right hon. Gentleman told me during business questions that he hoped that the House could proceed to debate it in the normal manner. Will he confirm that the debate will take place therefore in the normal manner well before the Budget on 19 March?

Finally, I ask the Leader of the House whether the Government will provide time as soon as possible for a debate on the proposed closure of one third of Britain's network of skillcentres. We know now that the Manpower Services Commission came to its decision to recommend the closures by the narrowest of margins. It is therefore vital that hon. Members whose constituencies will be seriously disadvantaged by closures should have the opportunity to express their views in the House before a final decision is made.

Mr. Biffen: On the first of the three points that the right hon. Gentleman has raised, I hope that, when he appreciates the time that has been taken on the legislation, the care that has been given to opposing viewpoints and the fact that 80 clauses remain to be debated, he will realise that what is proposed on Monday in no sense can be regarded as converting the House of Commons into a Reichstag.

I notice also that the right hon. Gentleman intends to pit his charm and appeal against that of my right hon. Friend the Patronage Secretary in recruiting the loyalties of the Conservative Back Benches; we shall see who will be the winner of that glamour contest.

As to the White Paper on public expenditure, I am as ever anxious that we proceed to a debate which should take place before the Budget, but preferably with the benefit of the report of the appropriate departmental Select Committee.

Finally, I note the points that are made upon skillcentres. This is a matter that we might consider through the usual channels.

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point): My right hon. Friend will know that this week marks the 40th anniversary of Yalta. Has his attention yet been drawn to early-day motion 320?

[That this House recalls that Mr. Winston Churchill, when Prime Minister, was a signatory, together with President Franklin Roosevelt and Marshal Joseph Stalin, to the Yalta protocols in February 1945 which guaranteed self-determination, sovereignty and democracy for the peoples of Central and Eastern Europe; notes that Marshal Stalin, despite being a co-signatory, used his military power and political influence to frustrate those intentions; deplores the resultant widespread and systematic abuse of human rights which still continues to this day; supports peaceful endeavours by the peoples concerned to regain their rights; and urges Her Majesty's Government, on the fortieth anniversay of the Yalta Protocols, to declare its refusal to accept the division of Europe into spheres of influence and to reaffirm the right of the peoples of Central and Eastern Europe to genuine self-determination.]

This has been signed by no fewer than 227 hon. Members of all parties, and condemns the denial of self-government, independence and democracy to 125 million of our fellow Europeans. Can my right hon. Friend give us some sign that this massive demonstration of feeling, which is shared in the country, can be expressed in a debate on foreign affairs dealing primarily with European security matters?

Mr. Biffen: I take account of the interest in having a foreign affairs debate, and am only sorry that there is no time for one next week. When it occurs, it would be appropriate for the House, if it is to engage in reminiscence, to place on record the foresight of that handful of Members that voted against the Yalta agreement.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): Does the Leader of the House recall that last week, on the day that the university of Oxford refused to honour its most distinguished daughter, the Prime Minister, I drew the attention of the House to the fact that the Droylsden Littlemoss boys county secondary modern school had not honoured its most distinguished son, my hon. Friend the Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts). Will the Leader of the House take note of early-day motion 367?

[That this House congratulates the Droylsden Littlemoss Boys High School, formerly Droylsden Littlemoss Boys County Secondary Modern School, on its decision to honour its favourite son, the honourable Member for Bootle, following the attempt of the honourable Member for Houghton and Washington to raise their failure to do so in the House; notes that the presentation ceremony is to be held at the school on 15th March; hopes that this event will be used to recognise and publicise the valuable role in the education system of the nation that over the years has been carried out by secondary modern and comprehensive schools; and further fails to understand why so much importance is attached to honours handed out by less important, status-ridden educational establishments.]

Will the right hon. Gentleman also note that the university of Oxford has not changed its mind about the Prime Minister but that the Droylsden Littlemoss boys school has changed its mind about my hon. Friend the Member for Bootle? Will he join me in my appreciation of the services that secondary modern schools and comprehensive schools have done for hon. Members and in congratulating the school on changing its mind?

Mr. Biffen: The Droylsden Littlemoss secondary school better deserves the esteem of this House than to be constantly compared with Oxford university. That said, I think that nothing more should occur next week.

Mr. David Crouch (Canterbury): Is my right hon. Friend aware that there are many questions hanging over the nationalised industries these days? Is it sufficient for hon. Members to have to consult documents in the Library on this question and to resort to the negative procedure ? Has not the time come to give serious consideration to the reconstitution of a Select Committee on the nationalised industries, so that we can give full consideration to these problems?

Mr. Biffen: I have no doubt that the working composition and responsibilities of a Departmental Select Committee are matters that the House would wish to consider from time to time. However, what my hon. Friend proposes constitutes a fundamental change, and I do not think that it should be contemplated in isolation.

Mrs. Renée Short (Wolverhampton, North-East): In view of the Government's confusion over the problem of limited lists for prescribing, and of the change in their attitude since 1981 and 1983, when Ministers expressed their view on the Greenfield report, is it not time that the House had an opportunity to debate the Department's proposals so that we could put forward views to help the Government out of this mess?

Mr. Biffen: I take account of all that the hon. Lady says. I am happy that the Greenfield recommendations are brought into the debate. She will appreciate that what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services proposes will be the subject of regulations that will be the subject of regulations that will have to be confirmed by the House by means of a debate.

Sir. Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): My right hon. Friend mentioned regulations on the limited list of prescribed drugs. As the constituents of all hon. Members are seriously concerned, will he give earnest consideration to a much longer debate than is usual on these kinds of regulations, to enable all views to be reflected?

Mr. Biffen: Without making a commitment, I can say that I shall look into this point with some sympathy.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): Does the Leader of the House accept that, in normal circumstances, I would agree that the request I am about to make is unreasonable? However, will he not accept that at Question Time the Prime Minister displayed a serious lack of adequate understanding of the coal dispute and of the position of the association with which I am involved? Would not the right hon. Gentleman accept that the Prime Minister's misunderstanding is so great that it almost certainly causes further peril and protracted difficulty?

Would not the right hon. Gentleman accept that the dispute has gone on long enough to justify urgent and positive steps to achieve a negotiated settlement and that that settlement is now being blocked by no other person than the Prime Minister? If the right hon. Lady allowed the National Coal Board to open the door, a settlement could be achieved and peace could reign in the coalfields of Britain, as it certainly needs to reign. Will not the right hon. Gentleman accept that the House should be given a further opportunity next week to debate this matter?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman warned me that I might just conceivably find his proposition unreasonable. I have to confirm at once that from such a reasonable source the proposition is eminently unreasonable. I believe that the words spoken by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister were well chosen. My right hon. Friend, like every other Member of this House, wishes that there should be a speedy resolution of this dispute. Last-minute attempts to try to fluff it will not be conducive to that end.

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): One of the most important items of the age is the progress being made by the European Space Agency, the European co-operation on the Columbus space laboratory, the latest announcement that we are to co-operate with the United States on a space platform and the very important announcement in the American budget of the strategic defence initiative in the United States. Surely all this must mean that it is about time that we got into the 20th century and started to talk about this very important matter.

Mr. Biffen: Alas, the only, rather narrow-minded, advice that I can give to my hon. Friend is that in his early essay or attempt to get into the 20th century he should look for an Adjournment debate, when he will be able to make this very important point.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): On limited list prescribing, is it not essential that we should have a full debate before any regulations are brought forward, because the regulations will be incapable of amendment by the House? On the Local Government Bill guillotine, what evidence does the right hon. Gentleman have that the Bill has been unduly delayed in the discussions so far? Would he not in his younger days, had he been on this side of the House, have complained that the guillotine was being brought forward only because of the overloading of the Government's legislative timetable by an indigestible Bill?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman has overlooked a very signal and important factor: that I am no longer on that side of the House. As for limited list prescribing, I shall look at that point.

Mr. Robert Jackson (Wantage): May I draw the attention of my right hon. Friend to early-day motion 104 on the possible taxation of lump sums?

[That this House would find unacceptable any change in the tax system which devalued the 'lump sum' which members of occupational pension schemes can now anticipate receiving on retirement; notes that, over many years, pay has been negotiated, contributions have been paid and, sometimes, financial obligations have been assumed on the good faith of receiving such payments in due course; and would regard it as totally inconsistent with the declared principles of Her Majesty's Government to change the present procedure which makes a real and useful contribution to a more widespread capital earning democracy.]

Since the number of signatures has now risen to 210 and in view of the continuing concern that is expressed in our postbags, would it be possible to have a debate on the subject before the Budget?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend makes a very fair point. There is no doubt that the early-day motion reflects widespread concern about this topic. However, there will be every opportunity to discuss it in the Budget debate, and even, possibly, subsequently.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): Reverting to the question put by my hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) about the mining dispute, in view of what many of us consider to be the grievous misunderstanding of the present situation which the Prime Minister revealed at Question Time in response to questions from my right hon. Friend and other hon. Members, if the right hon. Gentleman cannot arrange a debate on the matter, can he ensure that the Prime Minister shall come to this House on Monday and answer questions on this subject? We wish to make absolutely certain that what the Prime Minister said today does not block an agreement, just as what the right hon. Lady said a week ago blocked an agreement. Therefore I urge the right hon. Gentleman to ask the right hon. Lady to come to the House of Commons on Monday and make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: There is never a more touching moment than when the right hon. Gentleman is anxious to disabuse my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister of some misunderstanding under which she labours. I shall convey to her the matters that he has requested should be drawn to her attention.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): Would my right hon. Friend like to register his place in history in the House by being the Leader of the House who brings in timetable motions for all major and controversial Bills, so that the House is able to discuss such Bills clause by clause from beginning to end? It is ridiculous that half these Bills are never properly discussed without the introduction of a timetable motion.

Mr. Biffen: I am the Leader of the House who does not even want to appear in a footnote in "Erskine May", let alone have a place in history. My hon. Friend must await the report of the Procedure Committee, which has been considering Public Bill procedure. Perhaps the printing of the report will be the occasion when he can take his arguments further.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): In view of the appalling and damaging implications of the Arts Council grants which are to run at 1·9 per cent. against an inflation rate of 4·6 per cent., will the House have an opportunity to debate this very important matter in the near future?

Mr. Biffen: I do not disparage for one moment the importance of the topic, but no provision has been made for such a debate in the immediate future.

Sir Anthony Meyer (Clwyd, North-West): In view of the continuing difficulties facing Members of the European Parliament in seeking to attend meetings in this building, will my right hon. Friend re-examine the matter on the ground that the Labour party, which has hitherto blocked all such suggestions, is likely now to modify its views in its anxiety to make contact with, among others, Mr. Les Huckfield?

Mr. Biffen: This is too serious a matter to be trivialised by the inclusion of Mr. Les Huckfield. The issue is considered from time to time.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): Will the Leader of the House read early-day motion 345 on the Government's intention to publish new advice on food production in the aftermath of a nuclear war?

[That this House notes the findings of the study of Messrs, Turco, Toon, Ackerman, Pollack and Sagan concerning the likelihood of a prolonged period of darkness and severe cold as a result of the obstruction of sunlight by smoke in the atmosphere following a nuclear conflict; further notes that the Minister of State for Agriculture told the House on 24th January that the Government would not wish to dismiss the nuclear winter out of hand; considers that it would be absurd for the Government to publish a new booklet on home defence and the farmer without referring to the fact that food production could be prevented by the climatic consequences of nuclear war in addition to the devastation caused by blast and radiation; and calls on the Government to postpone further consideration of this issue until the findings of the International Scientific Committee on Problems of the Environment have been debated in the House.]

The motion has been signed by over 100 Members of virtually every party which is represented in the House. Will the right hon. Gentleman ensure that the House will have an opportunity to debate the SCOPE report on the nuclear winter theory before the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food publishes any further advice on the subject?

Mr. Biffen: I understand that the matter is the subject of a study which is awaited by my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. I shall convey the hon. Gentleman's comments to my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): My right hon. Friend will be aware that during the passage of the Hong Kong Bill it has been suggested that there should be an annual debate on Hong Kong. As we almost never discuss any other part of our dependent territories, will my right hon. Friend consider allocating a day annually for the discussion of all the United Kingdom's dependent territories as well as Hong Kong?

Mr. Biffen: From my standpoint I see already a great deal of parliamentary time pre-empted for specialised topics. I would be reluctant to see that trend accentuated, but I shall consider what my hon. Friend has said.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Will the Leader of the House review the answer that he gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) about the Prime Minister making a statement on Monday on the coal dispute or the allocation of a day's debate on that issue? It was put to me the other day that, although an archbishop's envoy can go to the hard-faced Colonel Gaddafi and manage to release four prisoners and arrange negotiations without preconditions with that regime, it seems that every archbishop, bishop and leader of a church of all denominations has been banging on the doors of the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Energy, only to be met with the response, "Get lost." One is bound to come to the conclusion that the Prime Minister is more hard faced that Colonel Gaddafi.

Mr. Biffen: In certain circumstances that would be proffered as a compliment. However, I shall ensure that that comment is passed to the Prime Minister, like all the others about the coal dispute which the House wishes to be referred to her.

Mr. Nell Thorne (Ilford, South): Has my right hon. Friend yet had the opportunity to read the Hansard report of the debate on civil defence in another place yesterday which was introduced by Lord Renton? Will he please note that the contributions from all sides of that Chamber were extremely supportive? Does he have any plans for such a debate in this House in the near future?

Mr. Biffen: I must confess that I have no plans for that, but I shall bear in mind my hon. Friend's particularly perceptive comments.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): Since one of the functions of the House is to address its mind to matters of great public concern, and in view of the early-day motion signed by hon. Members of all parties and from all parts of the United Kingdom about the need for a comprehensive fuel allowance, will the Leader of the House promise an early debate on the subject, so that opinions can be ventilated before the social security review comes to an end?

[That this House believes that the present system of exceptional heating allowances which is supposed to ameliorate the effects of severe weather conditions is completely ineffective in its application; and requests the Secretary of State for Social Services to replace this inadequate provision with a comprehensive scheme which takes into account the general climatic differences within the United Kingdom and associated heating costs so that all those in receipt of supplementary benefit can afford to heat their homes adequately regardless of which part of the United Kingdom they live in.]

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman will appreciate that there is to be an Adjournment debate initiated by the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) on 13 February. We had better see how we go from there.

Mr. Peter Fry (Wellingborough): May I refer my right hon. Friend to notice of motion No. 24 on the Order Paper, and to early-day motion 358, which between them were signed by every available member of the Select Committee on Transport yesterday and which express concern that the House is to proceed on Tuesday with the Second Reading of the Transport Bill without awaiting the Select Committee report which is imminent?

[That this House should commit the Transport Bill to a Special Standing Committee so that the members of that Committee may have the opportunity of jointly studying the imminent report of the Transport Committee and the evidence submitted to it on what is the most fundamental upheaval in the bus industry for over 50 years.]

Is my right hon. Friend aware that it is possible that hon. Members selected to sit on the Standing Committee will not be in possession of the Select Committee report or of all the evidence which is relevant to the most major change in the bus industry for over 50 years? Does he agree that the House and the Standing Committee should have that evidence before they begin their deliberations on the Bill?

Mr. Biffen: I am sure that my hon. Friend will be fair-minded enough to acknowledge that a balance of factors has to be assessed when choosing the time for the Second Reading of a Bill. My hon. Friend might be able to make his point at greater length during the Second Reading debate.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): Will the Leader of the House find time for us to discuss the wearing of Her Majesty's uniform by persons not entitled to do so, especially in view of the limited military experience of the Secretary of State for Defence?

Mr. Biffen: I am not in a position to do a comparative assessment of the military experience of my right hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers), but I have noted his intriguing proposition.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): Has my right hon. Friend noticed that today marks the start of the electrification of the east coast line—the biggest British Rail development in 25 years, involving an expenditure of £300 million and the employment, mainly in the private sector, of about 3,000 people, including many from my constituency? Since this clearly shows that, despite their critics this Government do invest in and are interested in the infrastructure, can we please have another debate on the subject soon?

Mr. Biffen: I note with great approbation the record related by my hon. Friend. I cannot be forthcoming in promising additional parliamentary time for debating the topic, but with a modicum of ingenuity my hon. Friend might be able to comment further during the Second Reading of the Transport Bill.

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): Since the right hon. Gentleman seems to be blaming the Select Committee for the delay in arranging a debate on the public expenditure White Paper, will he have a word with the Chairman and ask him to get a move on?

Mr. Biffen: It is not true to assert that I implied that any blame should attach to the Select Committee.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): Before we have the debate, which my right hon. Friend half promised, on the regulations limiting the list of NHS drugs, may we have a statement explaining what will be on that list and, more seriously, what will not be on that list?

Mr. Biffen: I shall certainly convey that request to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State so that he may consider it when assessing how best to proceed with the parliamentary handling of the matter.

Mr. Sidney Bidwell (Ealing, Southall): May I refer the right hon. Gentleman again to the attitude taken by his two predecessors in relation to Select Committee work and again refer to the early-day motion on the Order Paper signed by members of the Select Committee asking for the presentation of the Transport Bill to be delayed until the Select Committee's report is completed? I raise the matter with the right hon. Gentleman as a matter of principle and so that he can ensure that this does not happen again—that is, if he attaches any importance to Select Committee work at all.

Will the right hon. Gentleman take on board the growing feeling that, when the Bill proceeds to Committee it should be dealt with under the new Special Standing Committee procedure? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware of the widespread concern about the Bill, which will cause the biggest upheaval in the bus industry for 50 years? Since there is anxiety across the political boundaries, does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the Bill should be considered under the new procedure so that evidence can be taken from interested parties?

Mr. Biffen: I recognise the desirability—when, from all viewpoints, it is practical—of having the views of the Select Committee ahead of the Second Reading debate. That is why I have been particularly anxious to establish that in no sense was I implying that there were any faults with the Select Committee in this matter. As I say, a number of factors help to weigh with the timing of a Second Reading debate, although I take the point that is made to me. The point made by the hon. Gentleman in the second part of his question will be considered, although at first sight it does not seem to be a Bill which falls within the original criteria which were appropriate for legislation. We will see how we go.

Mr. Tim Yeo (Suffolk, South): Although I readily recognise my right hon. Friend's reluctance to grant time for a further debate on the coal mining strike, does he agree that an aspect of it that deserves the attention of the House is the way in which NUM members were denied a ballot and are now voting in increasing numbers with their feet?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend makes a pertinent point, but I hope that he will excuse me when I say that we do not need a day's debate to demonstrate it.

Mr. William O'Brien (Normanton): Is the Leader of the House aware that this is International Youth Year? If so, will he find time for the House to discuss unemployment among the youth of the nation? Does he agree that we should be considering ways of developing employment, particularly for the long-term unemployed, and that we should be crushing unemployment and poverty rather than people?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right to draw the attention of the House yet again to the significance of unemployment in the totality of economic policy. As we approach the period of the Budget and all the debates that flow from that, I am sure that many of the points that he has in mind can be made in that context. I note what he says and I underline the importance of it.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): As the majority of hon. Members on both sides of the House, privately if not publicly, share the view of my hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding (Sir K. Lewis) that it is better to put a timetable to any controversial measure at the beginning, rather than part way through its progress through the House, is he surprised that the Leader of the Opposition should be spouting the old gobbledegook about outrage against democracy? Is it not rather sad that tomorrow's man should still be trying to purvey yesterday's myths?

Mr. Biffen: The matter does not quite have that clean simplicity. I must ask my hon. Friend to show the proper sense of deference to the Select Committee on Procedure, the observations of which will, I am certain, form part of an interesting debate which awaits the House.

Mr. Allen Adams (Paisley, North): It is said that last year the Secretary of State for Scotland authorised more than 70 phone tappings in Scotland. Will the Leader of the House arrange a debate on the subject of interference with private communications? This is clearly a matter of grave national concern, on which a White Paper has been presented?

Mr. Biffen: Perhaps we should proceed one step at a time in these matters. As the hon. Gentleman will realise, once I sit down, I am but John the Baptist for a much more significant statement that will shortly come from the Home Secretary.

Mr. Kinnock: John the Baptist?

Mr. Biffen: Yes—we know what happened to him!

Mr. Robert Atkins (South Ribble): May I press my right hon. Friend for an early debate on the Royal Air Force? The debate that we were to have had was delayed for reasons which were really the fault of the Opposition. Urgent and early decisions relating to the RAF need to be taken. We had debates on the Army and Navy in the latter part of last year. The need for a debate on the RAF is now pressing.

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend was the first to make the point to me when I announced the alteration in business, and I am happy to give him now the answer that I gave on that occasion—that arrangements will be made for such a debate in the reasonably near future.

Mr. Robert Parry (Liverpool, Riverside): In view of the great concern of the National Union of Public Employees and other Health Service unions about the contact that some of their members may have had with people suffering from acquired immune deficiency syndrome, and in view of the worries of nurses, ancillary staff and ambulance personnel, will the Leader of the House urge the Secretary of State for Health and Social Services to make an early statement to the House about the action that the Government intend to take to allay the fears that exist?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman raises what I believe to be an immensely important and deeply disturbing problem. I shall at once report his question and observation to the Secretary of State for Health and Social Services.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): In view of the splendid efforts of the Royal Engineers, particularly the sappers of the Royal School of Military Engineering, yesterday at RAF Molesworth, which contrasted starkly with the shambles at Greenham common, will my right hon. Friend grant time to the House to debate the security for the perimeters of our defence establishments against marauding bands of anarchists and apologists from Moscow?

Mr. Biffen: After such a demonstration, why such a debate?

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): Will the right hon. Gentleman find time next week for a statement to be made about how the Prime Minister comes to be so muddled about the settlement applying to the National Association of Colliery Overmen, Deputies and Shotfirers in relation to the National Union of Mineworkers? There seems to be a clear contradiction, with the Prime Minister saying that the situation is still open, and NACODS this afternoon condemning what it regards as nothing short of a ripping up of that agreement by the National Coal Board, and everybody knows that the NCB is supported by the Government.

Mr. Biffen: I appreciate that the hon. Gentleman is doing his best to salvage what he can from a difficult afternoon—[Interruption.] I shall of course see that his anxieties are represented to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Will my right hon. Friend accept that I speak as a confirmed non-smoker when I explain that this week I met a number of the 718 constituents of mine who work in the tobacco industry and who are concerned about the pressure that is being placed on people as they choose whether to smoke? While they accept that smoking should be taxed and that there should be a reasonable degree of propaganda explaining the dangers connected with smoking, they are concerned lest they suffer unreasonable pressure in their jobs as might come from the removal of the royal warrant which has been applied to some companies. Will my right hon. Friend arrange for an early statement to be made on the subject so that it may be discussed in a balanced and fair way? People's jobs are at stake.

Mr. Biffen: I am not sure whether the House has authority in the matter; therefore, I cannot be forthcoming in my reply to my hon. Friend, except to say that I will look into the point that he raises.

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): May I impress on the Leader of the House the seriousness of the decision that has been taken by the executive committees of the NUM and NACODS today? Is he aware that, if the Prime Minister does not now allow the NCB to negotiate an honourable settlement to the mining dispute, there could be a complete closure of the mining industry? Is he aware that the best possible answer would be for the Prime Minister to take the reins of the NCB and that, if she does not do that, she should tell the House why?

Mr. Biffen: I have told several Opposition Members, not least the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot), that I would pass their anxieties to the Prime Minister. I shall add to those the anxieties now expressed by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Michael McGuire (Makerfield): Will the right hon. Gentleman endeavour to get the Minister responsible for the mining industry—the Secretary of State for Energy—to make a statement to the House next week? Will he impress on him the fact that NACODS is now joining the NUM in demanding open negotiations without preconditions? It is to be hoped that that demand will not be—as it has been in the past—contemptuously spurned by the Prime Minister, remembering that NACODS has a statutory duty for maintenance and for the safety of men underground.

Is the Leader of the House aware that, if the NACODS men withdraw their Labour—this was pointed out in the debate on Monday — the consequences will be disastrous? I urge the right hon. Gentleman to see that a statement is made by the Secretary of State for Energy to the effect that the Government welcome with open arms the resumption of talks without preconditions. Is anybody seriously suggesting that if NACODS and the NUM withdrew their labour, the Government would still insist that negotiations could be resumed only with preconditions? In such a situation, they would welcome with open arms any offer of talks. They should be giving such a welcome to the resumption of talks now.

Mr. Biffen: Everyone in the House — on the Conservative Benches as well as the Opposition—is anxious to see a settlement to that dispute. I do not believe that it would be a proper use of next week's business for me to engage in a debate on the various and somewhat contentious points raised in the hon. Gentleman's preamble, but as it was attendant upon the proposition that I should refer the matter to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy to secure a statement next week, I shall, of course, make that request.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): Will the Prime Minister arrange for a statement next week from the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry about the way that the Association of British Travel Agents works, in the light of the fact that the people who liquidated Budget Holidays only a few weeks ago are now floating a new travel company that will operate out of Scotland and which has obviously been bonded by ABTA? Will he get the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to explain also how Buckingham palace has an ABTA number? It seems that "Her Majesty's bucket shop" is being run from Buckingham palace without any bonding or high street shops. I am not suggesting that the royal family books cheap flights to Mustique, but the staff are avoiding the rules and regulations, and ABTA must be involved in that. I am proud to be receiving an honour from my school, because after this I do not think that I will get one from Buckingham palace.

Mr. Biffen: It is nice to know that that deprivation causes grief. I shall of course refer those points to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): Is the Leader of the House aware that the Government have now guillotined in Standing Committee more Bills in five years than previous Governments guillotined in 20 years? Given the fact that good progress has been made in Committee—there has been no filibustering from the Opposition; the longest speech has come from Ministers and his hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow)—and that this is a major constitutional measure which would on current progress get through within this parliamentary Session, how can he justify curtailing discussion at this stage?

Mr. Biffen: It is kind of the hon. Gentleman to reinforce his article in The Times with yet another preview of the speech that he hopes to make on Monday. I am afraid that I cannot extend a similar courtesy.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Will the Leader of the House ask the Secretary of State for Social Services to make a statement to the House on why he has directed that the south Cumbria district health authority gives the cleaning contract for south Cumbria to a private Blackpool cleaning operator when the in-house tender by the Roose hospital authorities in Barrow-in-Furness was cheaper? As the Government are supposed to be pursuing the cheapest course, why does not the district health authority take the cheapest tender and allocate the contract to the National Health Service in-house contractor? Is that not an abuse of the rules and of the Secretary of State's position?

Mr. Biffen: I am in no sense in a position to comment upon the merits of the case raised by the hon. Gentleman, but I shall refer the point that he makes to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Does the Leader of the House agree that if the allegation is true that a Minister in the Department of Employment referred to black Britons as people from Bongo Bongo Land, he is unfit to serve in even this Government? Will the right hon. Gentleman take this opportunity to confirm or deny that allegation? If it is true, will he tell the House that the Minister's letter of resignation is now on the Prime Minister's desk?

Mr. Biffen: Everything that has been associated with that incident, including that question, persuades me that the silly season is starting somewhat earlier than usual.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): May I endorse the calls made by my right hon. and hon. Friends for a statement on the miners' strike on Monday next week, as that is the day when hundreds of thousands of workers in Humberside, Yorkshire and the south-east will be taking industrial action in support of the miners? Secondly, the Leader of the House replied to an earlier question on International Youth Year. If he is thinking of a statement or debate on youth issues, will he arrange it for Thursday the 28 of this month—three weeks today—on the subject of the disgraceful proposals coming out of the Department of Health and Social Security to remove 234,000 16 and 17-year-olds from the right to supplementary benefit? I can promise him something—there will be over 5,000 youngsters outside the House on that day to show that young people will not take that suggestion easily.

Mr. Biffen: On the second point, we had a good-natured exchange last week, and I have nothing to add to what I then said. On the first point, I shall, of course, add the hon. Member's voice to the others when making the observations that I will to my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Energy.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): Since the Government's policies are increasingly driving new sections of industry, as well as the miners, to desperation and into industrial action—a vote for the Tories now seems to be a vote for industrial action—and since the teachers, who are normally well-behaved people, have been driven to the point of desperation—their industrial action is developing and will develop on a grand scale—will the Government consider making a statement on that industrial action as well as on the others that they have caused, so that we can discuss the matter properly?

Mr. Biffen: I hope that the hon. Gentleman is neither encouraging nor exhorting industrial action. I shall, of course, draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science to the points that have been raised.

Mr. Terry Lewis (Worsley): Will the Leader of the House consider providing time for a debate upon the closure of the DHSS resettlement centres, which was announced a day or two ago? Will he take it from me that many of us are dismayed, to say the least, that such an important announcement was made through the device of a written question?

Mr. Biffen: As the hon. Gentleman will appreciate, next Tuesday the Department of Health and Social Security is first for questions in the House, but I shall of course draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services to the point that has been made.

Interception of Communications

4.16 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Leon Brittan): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement on the interception of communications on which the Government have undertaken to introduce legislation in this Session.

I am today presenting a White Paper on the interception of communications in the United Kingdom. Copies are available in the Vote Office. The White Paper sets out the present position on interception authorised by all the Secretaries of State concerned. It outlines the main features of the Bill which the Government will introduce next week in fulfilment of their undertaking, and it describes how effect will be given to the legislation. It supplements the White Paper published in 1980 and gives the figures for the number of warrants issued by the Home Secretary, the Secretary of State for Scotland and the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in recent years.

I should stress at the outset that the Government are not through the proposed legislation in any way either seeking or permitting the extension of the present scope of interception. The Bill will, however, establish a comprehensive statutory framework for the interception of communications, which are defined for these purposes as all forms of telecommunications in the public networks and also the post. It will incorporate into the law the existing stringent controls and limitations. It will define the grounds on which a Secretary of State will be empowered to authorise interception. These are in line with existing practice and are narrower than those specified in the European convention. They will be national security, the prevention and detection of serious crime, and the safeguarding of the economic well-being of the United Kingdom. In the latter case interception will be permissible only when it is for the purpose of obtaining information about events outside the country. Unauthorised interception will be made a criminal offence.

The legislation will also greatly increase the existing safeguards, not only by creating the new criminal offence, but also by providing a means of redress for those wishing to complain that interception has been improperly authorised. An independent tribunal will be established to adjudicate on complaints. It will be able to get at all the facts, and if it concludes that the issue of a warrant does not come within the statutory criteria it will be able to quash the warrant and award compensation. The post of the existing monitor of interception arrangements will be replaced by a statutory commissioner. He will be given the task of keeping under continuing review the exercise of the Secretary of State's powers and all the arrangements to do with the issue and execution of warrants. The Bill will lay down requirements to secure the proper handling of intercepted material.

Communications of the kind covered by the Bill merit special protection because they are committed by somebody into the custody of a carrier over whom he has no control. Legislation to deal with other aspects of privacy, such as surveillance, gives rise to quite different and so far unresolved issues.

Parliament will shortly have the opportunity to consider the provisions of the proposed Bill in detail, though hon. Members will appreciate the constraints which must inevitably apply to what can be said about some aspects of these matters. The interception of communications is always distasteful but sometimes essential if serious crime is to be thwarted, terrorism effectively combated and our national security adequately safeguarded. But it is right that the extent of interception should be strictly limited and a means of redress provided where it has wrongfully taken place.

I commend the Government's proposals to the House. I believe that they strike the right balance and that they will ensure that that balance is effectively maintained.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): I thank the Home Secretary for letting me see an advance copy of the White Paper published today. In view of the issues involved, I suggest that when the legislation comes before Parliament the use of the Special Standing Committee procedure should be considered.

I pay tribute to Mr. James Malone, without whose court action and application to the European Court of Human Rights the Government would not have felt obliged to introduce the legislation foreshadowed in the Home Secretary's statement.

The White Paper refers to the backstop safeguard to be built into the Bill in the form of the tribunal. Who will appoint that tribunal, and how will its essential independence be safeguarded?

I suggest that the Government's proposals should be judged in accordance with the statement of Mr. Justice Megarry in the Malone case. He said that

"telephone tapping is a subject which cries out for legislation . . . in any civilised system of law the claims of liberty and justice would require that telephone users should have effective and independent safeguards against possible abuses."

In the light of those words, the Government's proposals arouse some profound misgivings rather than allaying them. As the White Paper makes clear, telephonic interception is carried out by "British Telecommunications and any other public telecommunications operators licensed under the Telecommunications Act 1984".

Any form of surveillance gives rise to anxiety, but there has been a change since the 1980 White Paper. BT is no longer a public corporation, and under the legislation privately owned licensed operators will be able to tap telephones. We have the gravest misgivings about authorising private agencies to intercept the communications of private citizens or democratic organisations.

The White Paper also does not cover providing access to the results of telephone metering. Yet the European Court in its judgment six months ago specifically said:

"Metering amounts to interference with the exercise of a right guaranteed by Article 8" of the convention. How does the Home Secretary intend to deal with that aspect?

Above all, we are extremely worried by paragraphs 21 and 22 of the White Paper. Referring to the issue of warrants

"in support of the Government's defence and foreign policies", paragraph 21 uses phraseology not previously used in any White Paper or public document on this matter. The incorporation of such a provision into legislation would open the way to surveillance for almost any purpose. For instance, it could be used in connection with the grotesque and ominous operation at Molesworth, in which the Secretary of State for Defence has been disporting himself as a bargain basement version of John Wayne.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): He bought himself out of the Army for that.

Mr. Kaufman: He has the funds.

Paragraph 22 also arouses great concern. It states:

"The legislation will empower the Secretary of State to issue warrants where they are necessary for safeguarding the economic well-being of the United Kingdom, but only if they are for the purpose of acquiring information about matters outside the country. It is an important part of the Government's foreign policy to protect the country insofar as it can from adverse developments overseas affecting the well-being of the economy. Foreign intelligence which may be necessary in support of the Government's foreign policy will on occasions include foreign intelligence which is necessary for the protection of the economic well-being of the country."

I appreciate that the phrase "economic well-being" is covered by the European convention, but how far will that be expanded in the legislation and in the exercise of the powers? Will it be used, for example, for the surveillance of communications by currency dealers as the level of the pound is a matter of economic well-being? Will it be used for the surveillance of international trade union links in connection with, say, the miners' strike? It could be used for partisan political purposes disguised as the national interest.

What the legislation contains and omits is fundamental to civil liberties and human rights. We shall scrutinise the legislation minutely to ensure that it does not open the door to the expansion of Big Brother State.

Mr. Brittan: On the last point, far from expanding Big Brother State, the legislation will for the first time put on a statutory footing the exercise of a power which has very properly been exercised by Governments of all political complexions for many years. The addition is not a broadening of the exercise of power but the provision of safeguards—effective safeguards, in my view—which did not previously exist. It is therefore in a spirit of readiness to have the legislation measured against the kind of test described by Mr. Justice Megarry that I present the Government's proposals to the House.

I am not sure that this legislation is best suited to the Special Standing Committee treatment, but I shall discuss the matter with my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House. My only comment on the Malone case is that the Government were committed to legislate in this area before the European Court made its judgment. The case for legislation did not arise merely as a result of the litigation before that court.

The Bill will provide that the tribunal should be appointed in the same way as the Ombudsman. The Crown, on the advice of the Prime Minister, will make the appointment by letters patent. Members of the tribunal will be distinguished legally qualified people chosen because they will command the confidence of both the House and the country.

British Telecom will be merely the agent of the interception ordered by the Secretary of State. The operations of British Telecom will be controlled and regulated by law in a very firm way. I do not believe that the change in commercial status will make any difference to that regulation.

I draw the attention of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) and the House to paragraph 17 of the White Paper, which deals with access to metering in a reasonable way.

The right hon. Gentleman expressed anxiety that paragraph 21 would permit surveillance for any purposes. He made an number of hypothetical suggestions. I do not think that he is right. The requirement of national security, for example, has appeared in no fewer than 50 different statutes without definition and has been regarded as acceptable by Governments of both political parties. Several of the statutes were introduced by Labour Governments.

The right hon. Gentleman referred to the criterion of safeguarding the economic well-being of the country and asked how much that would be expanded in the Bill. The answer is that it will not be expanded at all. That will be the criterion. What is more, the Secretary of State will have to judge that information relating to events and information overseas must necessarily be intercepted for the purpose of the economic well-being of the country. There will be further protection. If it is felt that interception has taken place that is not necessary for that purpose, the tribunal will have full power to look at the facts, quash the interception and award damages.

Sir Edward Gardner (Fylde): Can my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that any legislation restricting the use of telephone tapping will apply to the police special branch? Further, is he satisfied that the operations of the special branch are effectively co-ordinated and properly controlled?

Mr. Brittan: Yes, I can confirm that the special branches will be subject to the legislation. They operate under the guidelines that I issued last December. Under the previous guidelines, the terms of reference of the special branch were not made public. The Government decided to make the guidelines public, and also decided that they should involve a considerable tidying up of the operations of the special branch in that area.

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): As someone who has had to authorise interceptions, I welcome the introduction of this legislative framework. It is long overdue that administrative discretion should in some way be checked and safeguarded.

I am concerned about the appointment of the independent tribunal. The tribunal is the most crucial safeguard in the legislation. The tribunal is unlike an ombudsman, in that it will in effect investigate the judgment of the Secretary of State. There is a strong case for saying that the House should authorise the appointment of the members of the tribunal. At the very least, there should be a mechanism for consultation among the parties so that the appointments are not seen as an aspect of Government patronage when it is the Government themselves and their decisions that are to be scrutinised. These important appointments should be made objectively.

Mr. Brittan: I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman, with his experience of such matters, welcomes the proposed legislation.

I shall, of course, consider what the right hon. Gentleman said about the tribunal, but I do not think that in practice that aspect of the matter will cause any great difficulty. We are talking about the appointment of a body which will essentially exercise judicial functions, deciding whether or not an interception which has been authorised falls within the statute.

The courts of this country scrutinise the operations of the Government and, as Ministers of all Governments have found, do not hesitate to strike them down, although the appointments are made in the normal way. It will not be difficult to find a way of appointing people who will command general confidence. There would be no point in any appointments which did not have that effect.

Mr. John Wheeler (Westminster, North): I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on introducing proposals that are important from the point of view of civil liberties. However, can he confirm that the important decisions to be made in connection with these issues will be made by him personally and not by officials?

Mr. Brittan: I can give my hon. Friend that confirmation. That has always been the case, and will continue to be the case. I scrutinise each application made to me to make sure that it meets the relevant criteria. The procedure is the same for the Secretaries of State for Scotland, Northern Ireland and Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs. Such applications are prepared at a high level and scrutinised personally by the relevant Secretary of State—not even by any other Minister in the Department.

Mr. Bruce Millan (Glasgow, Govan): I welcome the Government's intention to put the whole business on a statutory basis. However, the criterion of the economic well-being of the country is new. It has not been necessary before. Why is it necessary now?

Secondly, someone who may have legitimate cause for complaint may not be aware that his telephone is being tapped, so the case will never come before the tribunal. Is the tribunal to investigate only authorised interception, or will it be able to inquire into possible unauthorised interceptions by, for example, the police or the security services? It is in that area that many of us feel the greatest disquiet. There is a feeling that a good deal of unauthorised interception takes place, regardless of the authority of any Secretary of State.

Mr. Brittan: The economic criteria have not been publicly stated in this way before, but they are not new. Right hon. Members on both sides of the House who have exercised such responsibilities will be aware of that and will be able to confirm that that is true. Such power has not been exercised by the Secretary of State for Scotland but, as the White Paper makes clear, the power has been exercised by the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs. The Bill will not extend in any way the area in which those powers are exercised.

It may well be that someone will not know whether or not his telephone calls, for example, have been intercepted. It has been the practice of Governments of both political parties never to confirm or deny whether an individual interception has taken place. Whichever answer was given, the consequences would be obvious to people who might be involved in drug trafficking or terrorism. That would be very dangerous. Anyone who has suspicions will be able to refer them to the tribunal, which will have access to the relevant information and will be able to establish whether there had been interception—authorised or not—and whether, if the interception was authorised, that authorisation was properly given.

Sir Paul Bryan (Boothferry): I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on a commonsense approach to a sensitive problem. To what extent will the provisions of his statement affect the strict guidelines already issued to the police on the issue of surveillance equipment? Does not telephone tapping frequently play an effective part in the detection of criminals?

Mr. Brittan: It does indeed. The legislation and the proposed scheme fit in entirely with the tightened-up guidelines on surveillance. The guidelines on the use of equipment in police surveillance operations were issued on 19 December 1984, and a copy was placed in the Library of the House. The guidelines laid down detailed criteria and procedures for the authorisation of the use of surveillance devices. Further, the guidelines are especially designed to ensure that police surveillance is not used as a back-door method of securing interception of telephone communications without a warrant from the Home Secretary.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Does the Home Secretary agree that the citizens of Britain ought to have more confidence than they now have, or can now have, that their communications will not be intercepted unless their activities, on overwhelming evidence, represent a great threat to their fellow citizens? Ought not the ultimate determination of what constitutes such a threat lie in the hands of other than those of politicians? Is the Home Secretary satisfied that, within the Bill and existing provisions, there is sufficient safeguard against the interception of communications by other countries operating in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Brittan: Safeguards against improper interceptions which are not in any way authorised by any agency of the Government cannot be guaranteed by legislation. That might be a matter of concern, but any interception that takes place outside the authorisation procedures of this legislation will, from now, be a criminal offence. That is new. Until now, a criminal offence has been committed only, for example, if it has been done improperly by British Telecom employees. There has not been a general criminal offence of unauthorised interception. This is a major step forward in the interests of protecting citizens.

I fear that politicians have to act in these matters, but those who have exercised such a responsibility agree that there is no exercise of ministerial responsibility which is looked into with greater care, and which is exercised in a less partisan way. This legislation provides, for the first time, an opportunity for an independent tribunal to express its view on whether the interception has been proper, and to quash the interception and award damages if something has gone wrong.

Mr. John Gorst (Hendon, North): Does my right hon. and learned Friend recall that, on April Fool's Day 1981, his predecessor, Lord Whitelaw, as he now is, told me before I voted against the Government on this matter that statutory provisions would be unworkable? His reason was that interception must be secret and that the judicial process must be open. On those grounds he rejected the amendment which I and a couple of my hon. Friends tabled to achieve what my right hon. and learned Friend has now advanced. What has changed since then to make statutory provisions workable? Will it now be possible for an individual to take the Home Secretary, or the relevant Secretary of State, to the tribunal to discover whether his telephone is being tapped?

Mr. Brittan: An individual will be able to complain to the tribunal if he thinks that his telephone calls have been improperly intercepted and the tribunal will tell him whether the telephone calls have been intercepted improperly. It is important that individuals should not be told whether their telephone calls have been intercepted. Indeed, there are many circumstances in which it would be quite wrong for them to be told. The tribunal will consider whether there has been interception, whether it has been authorised and whether the authorisation was proper. If there has been improper interception, that will be made clear, compensation can be given, and the order can be quashed. If there has been authorised interception, the tribunal will merely say that there has been no breach of the Act.

As to what my hon. Friend said about my right hon. and noble Friend the Lord President of the Council in 1981, producing a legislative framework has not been easy. The difficulties to which my right hon. and noble Friend referred were real and should not be underestimated. I hope that, now that my hon. Friend has got the legislation that he sought, he might look forward rather than backwards, when the difficulties seemed greater.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): The statistics concerning annexe 2 are explicit but, to complete the picture and to advise the House and the country how widespread the practice is, could the Home Secretary give the number of applications for warrants which were made and refused, rather than those which were made and granted? If he does not have those figures to hand, will he make them available? Has he refused to grant any applications for a warrant?

Mr. Brittan: I do not have the figures to which the hon. Gentleman asks, but I do not think that producing them will be quite as easy or helpful as the hon. Gentleman suggests. I shall explain why. The process is not a straightforward one by which the agency says, "Here is an application. Yes or no?" Unless there is urgency, there is much interchange between the agency and those who advise the relevant Secretary of State. An application might not be made formally if it is made clear that it is unlikely to be granted.

Mr. Michael Mates (Hampshire, East): I warmly welcome my right hon. and learned Friend's proposals. Will he remind the House of the crucial importance of proper interception of communications in the battle against terrorism? Will he take this opportunity to confirm that any part of the legislation that he produces will not make that difficult job even more difficult?

Mr. Brittan: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his comments. He is right in saying that the role of interception in the battle against terrorism is extremely important. The Government's proposals provide a framework in which the carefully controlled use of interception can continue to play an important part in combating terrorism. I assure my hon. Friend that the safeguards and advances that I have described will not prevent the proper use of this weapon, where necessary, against that evil threat to our society.

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon): Is the Home Secretary aware that the Post Office Engineering Union, which sponsors me, welcomes his intention to legislate on this matter? Indeed, it has been calling for such legislation for more than five years. Is he further aware that his answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) about refusal to grant interception warrants makes me more worried about this legislation than I was when I came into the Chamber? Is he also aware that his saying that an application would not come forward when it would not be granted can only confirm what right hon. and hon. Members have been saying for years—that the interception is done in any case? The legislation does not cover that. Is the Home Secretary further aware that what he suggests in paragraph 21 of the White Paper would have made the Watergate affair legal if it had happened in Britain? We cannot tolerate that for long. He could have avoided all of this by accepting the amendment in which the hon. Member for Hendon, North (Mr. Gorst) and I had a hand in 1981.

Mr. Brittan: I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's latter point. As to his first one, there has been a genuine misunderstanding. I said not that the application would not come forward because the interception is made anyway, but that the application would not come forward because, in the circumstances to which the hon. Gentleman referred, it would clearly be refused.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): I welcome my right hon. and learned Friend's proposals. Can he reassure people who might question the need for interception in any circumstances by outlining some of the achievements and progress in the battle against crime and drug abuse, for example, as a result of the controlled use of telephone interception?

Mr. Brittan: It is difficult to do that without quoting individual examples. However, the police in England and Wales estimate that, in the past 10 years, they have been able to make more than 5,000 arrests, to recover about £40 million-worth of stolen property and to seize drugs valued in excess of £50 million as a result of interception.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): I welcome the move towards legislation, but will the Home Secretary say whether in the matter of surveillance, for which guidelines were issued before Christmas, the Government intend to move towards a legislative framework? Is he aware of the misgivings about paragraph 21, which effectively says that the Secretary of State may issue warrants in support of the Government's defence and foreign policies? Is that not a licence to tap the telephone of any member of Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament?

Mr. Brittan: The answer to the hon. Gentleman's first point is that the legislation deals with interception, not with surveillance. I hope the hon. Gentleman will feel that the guidelines published in December, which amount to a considerable tightening-up of the previous arrangements, show that we recognise the concern about surveillance, and are prepared to take action to the extent that that is possible. It would be wrong to hold out any prospect of legislation in that area.

With regard to CND, the hon. Gentleman was present in the House when on another occasion I said that there was no question of special branch interception or interest in any organisation which campaigns in a legitimate way for legitimate political objectives however contrary they may be to the interests and policies of the Government.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe): I welcome my right hon. and learned Friend's announcement, but can he clarify the nature of the European Court's ruling? Was objection taken to the current practice or to the manner in which the power has been exercised, or was it simply to the absence of a statutory basis for the power?

Mr. Brittan: My hon. and learned Friend raises an important point. The European Court made no criticism of the procedures by which interception is authorised, nor did it comment on the merits of the use of interception in the case before it. Its only criticism was that the law in the United Kingdom did not spell out sufficiently clearly the scope of the power to authorise interception or the criteria for its exercise. Our proposal will meet that criticism and go further by reinforcing the safeguards against abuse and by providing a remedy for the individual.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): May we take the Home Secretary's statement as a retrospective apology to the House, because he and his immediate predecessor have stood at the Dispatch Box and told the House that nothing is wrong with the way in which telephone tapping is carried out? As he will legislate on the matter, will he tell the House whether complainants will have a right to be legally represented at the proposed tribunal?

Mr. Brittan: There is no question of apologising, because there is nothing for which to apologise. As I have said, the area covered is the same as that which has existed until now. Nothing improper was done in past practice. This legislation provides for a statutory framework within which to operate, and extra safeguards for citizens. Therefore, I feel no need to apologise for myself or my predecessors, on either side of the House. We may consider legal representation when we deal with the Bill.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that former Home Secretaries have told the House that they signed between 200 and 300 applications for warrants to tap telephones each year, yet it is common knowledge throughout the United Kingdom that we have specialised units capable of tapping thousands of telephone calls every day? I welcome the legislation, but will my right hon. and learned Friend give an undertaking today that, because of public anxiety about people having their telephones tapped, we shall be as flexible as possible with the legislation in Committee and will not make it a matter of political dogma, and that between us we shall try to get the legislation right for the sake of the British people?

Mr. Brittan: My hon. Friend is right to express the anxieties that undoubtedly exist about what I described in my statement as a disagreeable practice. I assure him that the figures set out in the White Paper are accurate. We shall debate the Bill fully and, I hope, in the spirit that has been shown in our exchanges so far this afternoon.

Mr. Skinner: Will the Home Secretary give a categorical assurance from the Dispatch Box that none of the trade union leaders involved in the miners' strike have had their phones tapped during the past 11 months?

Mr. Brittan: The hon. Gentleman will know why it is impossible to give such an assurance. As I said in answer to a previous question, it is never the practice in the case of individuals either to confirm or deny whether interception has taken place.

Mr. Derek Spencer (Leicester, South): Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that during the Malone case the European Court accepted that the present procedures were effective in keeping the number of warrants at a low level, notwithstanding the increased use of the telephone and the increase in the level of serious crimes?

Mr. Brittan: My hon. and learned Friend is right. The figures published in the White Paper must be taken in the context of a massive increase in the use of the telephone. It is fair to consider them in that context. If they are considered in that way, they show a greater degree of restraint than if the absolute numbers are considered cold.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware of the anxiety felt at the time of the European Court's judgment on James Malone? Conservative Members greatly supported the independence of the Home Secretary that day. Will he therefore confirm now that his powers will in no way be hampered to secure and ensure the protection of this country in the interests of national security?

Mr. Brittan: I believe that the framework that I am announcing will enable me, and my other right hon. and hon. Friends who exercise these powers, to do what my hon. Friend wants. At the same time, it will provide a satisfactory statutory framework and enhance protection for individuals.

Water Authorities (Return on Assets)

Mr. Speaker: Before I call on the hon. Member to move the motion in the name of the Leader of the Opposition, I should say that today's debate is not one of those in which I am empowered to use my discretion to impose a limit of 10 minutes on speeches in the early evening. However, it is clear that many right hon. and hon. Members wish to speak and, therefore, I appeal for reasonably short speeches.

4.57 pm

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): I beg to move,

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Water Authorities (Return on Assets) Order 1984 (S.I., 1984, No. 1995), dated 17th December 1984, a copy of which was laid before this House on 7th January, be annulled.

I hope that it is convenient for the House to debate the second motion on the Order Paper:

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Water Authorities (Return on Assets) Order 1985 (S.I., 1985, No. 78), dated 24th January 1985, a copy of which was laid before this House on 24th January, be annulled.

I shall wish to move it formally later, Mr. Speaker, and we shall seek to divide the House upon it.

Mr. Speaker: If that is the wish of the House, so be it.

Mr. Rooker: We should not commence the debate without being aware that water is a natural resource and that we have today received the report of the Health and Safety Commission on the tragedy of the Abbeystead pumping station, in which many people lost their lives. Although we shall argue about finance, we should remember that in that tragic case we paid a high cost in human terms for ensuring that water reached our constituents' taps.

The water authorities are executive boards of Government. Members are appointed by Ministers of the Crown. They are subject to ministerial direction and control, and Ministers are accountable to Parliament. That brief description was given by a Minister at the Dispatch Box last Friday. The first question that will have to be disposed of is why we are here in mid-February—less than two months from the end of the financial year—debating whether to give Ministers retrospective approval for the directions and financial control they gave to water authorities behind closed doors at the end of 1983 and early 1984 for the year 1984-85, which is almost at an end.

The House is simply being asked to act as a rubber stamp on the first order. The effect of annulment within a few weeks of the end of the financial year was never contemplated by Ministers. There have been complaints about that in the past. In response to the complaints, the Government said in February 1984 in Cmnd. 9138:

"The Government accepts the desirability of laying before Parliament at the earliest opportunity the Orders which set the financial targets for water authorities."

That abuse of the House must stop. It is useful to put it on the record that we do not expect the House to be asked in future merely to be a rubber stamp.

We cannot stop the abuse today, but for 1985-86, which is what the debate is about, the award for making Ministers accountable to the House in time for us to take action must go to Mr. Roy Watts, the chairman of Thames water. With single-figure inflation, he and the other chairmen are being asked to increase water charges by double figures. Most want and need increases at about the rate of inflation. Thanks to Mr. Watts's insistence that he would not increase water charges beyond 3 per cent. without an order from Parliament, we are having this debate today. I should add that he is supported by his board of ministerial appointees.

The question that we must ask ourselves today is whether Parliament should give its approval to tax water through the orders. Can we all defend the proposal to our constituents, all of whom use the commodity?

Perhaps we are all here by mistake—a mistake of the Chief Secretary to the Treasury. It was reported in the Financial Times yesterday that during the bilateral negotiations with the Department of the Environment he lost,

"the Treasury's fall-back position."

He stuck to his initial demand because he forgot what his second demand would be, and apparently the Environment Ministers gave way to him. I am sure that some time today we shall be told that a highly respected journalist on the Financial Times, Mr. Robin Pauley, got it wrong. However, we may be here by mistake.

We must decide whether the 1985-86 order taxes water, and I submit that it does. The CBI takes that view, as does the National Farmers Union. In the words of the Water Authorities Association, the water industry is being asked to "make more money than is necessary to run the industry."

A reason given by a previous Secretary of State for the Environment, now the Secretary of State for Employment, for the reorganisation of the water authorities, and which was repeated in the 1983 Conservative election guide at page 289, was:

"Customers have not felt that they were really represented." —[Official Report, 7 July 1982; Vol. 27, c. 293.]

Following that reorganisation, dozens of water consultative committees were set up. They were meant to be a voice for the consumer, especially the industrial consumer. But they were not consulted about this proposal, and, so far as I am aware, none is in favour of it. Indeed, given that the water authority chairmen learnt of the proposed change only from television and radio after the Chancellor of the Exchequer's autumn statement, it is hardly surprising that the consultative consumer committees were completely ignored.

It is clear—I hope that it will not be a point of argument—that income collected on rateable value, as is half of water authorities' income, is a charge based on a taxing instrument, not a charging device. That is not an unimportant point. This is neither the time nor the place for a seminar or a long debate on current cost accounting. I for one would not be qualified to participate in such a debate, let alone to lead it on behalf of my hon. Friends. Anyone who compares the replacement cost of reservoirs with that of aircraft and says that it should be handled on the same basis will, in many people's view, be nothing less than a water wally. The attempt to revalue assets each year can be futile. There were not too many aircraft around when many reservoirs were under construction. It is easy to check the current value of an aircraft and its replacement —one telephones the British Aircraft Corporation or Boeing. We would need a time machine to do that for the water industry.

I suspect that, as yesterday, we shall be told that Price Waterhouse claims that current cost accounting for the water authorities is, "soundly based and sensible". Of course, as a partnership, Price Waterhouse does not publish accounts, so we cannot tell how it would cope with such a procedure. I rest my case on the report of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, which in 1981 examined a water authority. That was the year in which the Price Waterhouse report was published. It stated:

"All the regional water authorities have encountered problems in assessing the present day replacement values of their substantial and in many cases highly specialised fixed assets. . . Knowledge of the extent and condition of the water industry's mains and sewers is incomplete, and uncertainties surround both the probable operational lives of these assets and the techniques that may be employed to facilitate renewal and refurbishment in situ."

That report on the Severn-Trent water authority and two private water undertakings was published as House of Commons Paper 339.

The Labour Government's White Paper on nationalised industries in 1978 cannot be prayed in aid in respect of water authorities. No targets were fixed at that time. In any event, if people wish to use that White Paper to prove their case, why have we not heard about it before? That argument will not stand up.

The current cost accounting techniques—I apologise to the House for going into some detail, but several points must be put on the record—involved in the statement of standard accounting practice No. 16, which has just lapsed, might be applicable to fixed assets such as aircraft, computers, machine tools and even buildings, but can they apply to Victorian-laid sewers, mains and reservoirs? The National Water Council, which no longer exists, set up a steering group to consider accounting techniques. It gave different estimates for the life of service reservoirs, mains and boreholes to the accountants Deloitte Haskins and Sells, which did the same job for the statutory private water companies. There was a difference of opinion even before the system began.

It is worth noting that the private water companies, which are not controlled by Ministers and whose borrowing is not included in the PSBR, were planning modest increases in charges of 2 to 3 per cent. The Essex water company is an example of that. But what are they doing? They are tagging along on the coat tails of the regional water authorities and jacking up their prices by double figures. That is Government-led inflation. There can be no other description of what is proposed by the private water companies.

The accounts of Thames water show it to be more profitable than ICI, Esso or Bowater, on any system of conventional accounting. That cannot be denied. Current cost accounting is disliked by private industry, and it has not gone unnoticed by the water authorities that, on the privatisation of British Telecom, one of the first actions was to scrap current cost accounting and to return to historic accounting.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): Before 1979, did the Labour Government accept the principles of current cost accounting in relation to water authorities?

Mr. Rooker: The White Paper published by the Labour Government at the end of 1978 forecast changes in the financial structure of nationalised industries. That was never put into operation, but there was nothing in the White Paper about water authorities. No targets were set, as they are now, for a return on the assets of the water authorities. Since then, the water authorities have been reorganised. The system for those authorities was completely different before reorganisation.

I do not know—I challenge any hon. Member sitting on the Government Front Bench or on the Back Benches to give the House examples — of a private sector company that bases the figures on which it arrives at the prices of its products on a system of current cost accounting. They would not have a market for their products, whether it was ICI or British Steel or anybody in the private sector. Nobody does it. If they do, I think that we should have some examples today.

The system of current cost accounting is used—and in this case, we think, abused—as a cash generator, and in respect of a monopoly, of course, even more cash can be generated. Price is not a factor for water authorities. It is not for my constituents, and I doubt whether it is for the constituents of any hon. Member on the Government Benches. Obviously, in terms of industrial use, where there is large-scale metering, it would be. But the charge for water is not based on consumption, and the provision of water is a monopoly — this was reinforced by the Prime Minister in a written answer last week, in column 292 of the Official Report for 31 January, when she described it as a natural monopoly. She then seemed to dismiss privatisation of the water authorities because they were a natural monopoly of a crucial commodity.

From 11 million people, which is a quarter of the English electorate, in the Thames area, their water authority needs to collect and generate only £292 million in the coming financial year. This order demands that those 11 million consumers be charged £505 million, and this will still leave £12 million less for capital spending than had been originally planned. It is absolutely crazy.

Under this order, present-day customers will definitely pay more than the true cost of the service. That is taxation; it cannot be denied; it is a tax on taps; it is even a tax on toilets. We know that the Government's aims are lower inflation, increased capital spending and, we thought, more commercial freedom for the public sector. We are all aware that the Treasury has a Bill—or an owner's charter, as it has been described by some nationalised industry chairmen—to get even more control over the public sector than it has at present. The Bill was not mentioned in the Gracious Speech, but it is quite clear that one is being prepared for the next one. So we must take as our criteria for today, as the present state of the art, the five objectives for water authorities set out by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary for the Environment, the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Macfarlane), in the Adjournment debate on 19 December 1984, at column 454. These were higher investment, greater efficiency, a reasonable rate of return, moderate charges increases, and a reduction in borrowing.

As far as higher investment is concerned, the Thames water authority, for 1985-86, will be able to invest under this order only £114 million against its planned £126 million—a drop of £12 million. In 1987-88 it will be able to invest only £129 million against its planned £166 million—a drop of £37 million.

For the North-West water authority, planned investment of £195 million in 1987-88 is cut under this order to £170 million, which is a drop of £25 million. That is what the chairman told me—I say this in case there is any argument about it—in writing before Christmas. The chairman of the North-West water authority, George Mann, says that the effect of the order

"in view of the state of the economy here in the north-west is extremely worrying".

The Lancashire water services council has told the CBI and right hon. and hon. Members that without this order charges in the north-west would be increased by an amount only marginally above the forecast for inflation. With this order it will be over 13 per cent. What a slap in the face for the north-west.

On the second point, greater efficiency, no one denies —and we applaud the fact— that virtually every water authority has achieved greater operating efficiency in the last two or three years. We congratulate them on that.

The third point which the Minister made was about the rate of return. This can deliberately be made to look artificially small with current cost accounting, when the assets on which the accounting is based are as specialised and as old as those in the water industry, 80 per cent. of which are under the ground. On profit against turnover water authorities are among the most successful 1 to 2 per cent. of businesses in this country. I repeat that, because it needs saying again and again. It is a tribute to those who run the industry and work in it. The water authorities are among the most successful 1 to 2 per cent. of businesses, based on profit against turnover.

On the fourth point, the Minister's objective of moderate charges increases is destroyed completely by the order. Thames planned 3 per cent., the Minister says 10 per cent.; Yorkshire planned 4 per cent., the Minister says 12 per cent.; the South-West planned 4 to 5 per cent., the Minister says over 10 per cent.; the North-West planned around 5 per cent., the Minister says over 13 per cent. And this goes on and on through every water authority in the country.

All authorities—I qualify this because I am not sure about Wessex—will increase their charges by double figures. I do not know whether the Wessex increase is in double figures or not. This is what each chairman told me in writing before Christmas. I regret that those chairmen, with the notable exception of Roy Watts of Thames, have accepted the Treasury line. I bet that some consumer consultative councils have been asking some very embarrassing questions of their authorities in the past few weeks because of the lead by the Thames water authority.

The Severn-Trent authority is even trying to stop paying its £100,000 rates on its luxury offices, which, if this order and the Government's machinery in respect of financial control go through, will be another £100,000 going to the Treasury instead of paying for home helps and road mending in Birmingham. The idea that water authority luxury head offices can be de-rated because they are somehow connected with the supply of water is ridiculous beyond belief and I certainly hope the Minister will support the line that the Inland Revenue is taking in opposing this kind of change. The Inland Revenue might be doing that, but the Treasury, of course, wants the money back.

Thames water will see its charges rise by a massive 29 per cent. in the next three years—we know that because of what is in the order and the financal figures—when the Government are targeting zero inflation.

The Minister for Housing and Construction (Mr. Ian Gow) indicated dissent.

Mr. Rooker: The Minister shakes his head.

Mr. Gow: I did.

Mr. Rooker: I always understood that the Government's target was zero inflation. That is what steady prices mean. Steady prices mean zero inflation. This brings with it many technical problems that we cannot go into today. Thames water is to have a 29 per cent. increase in charges, and North-West water is even worse. The North-West will have cumulative charge increases in the next three years of 40 per cent. That is what the authority is saying to hon. Members.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): The hon. Gentleman is basing most of his argument upon the specific example of the Thames water authority—at least, that, for him, provides the most striking example of his thesis. But is it not a fact that we all want greater financing of the infrastructure in this country, and that includes water supply? Therefore, should he not welcome the fact that in these areas where costs are low, where extra revenue can be raised for finance for the infrastructure, charges should be so raised?

Mr. Rooker: I was conscious in preparing my remarks for this debate that I must not concentrate solely on Thames. The North-West, as I have highlighted, will be affected even more badly than Thames over the next three years in the cumulative effect on charges. It is devastated by its capital expenditure. The North-West will have less money for capital expenditure in two to three years' time than it is planning for. We all want increased expenditure on the infrastructure in the water industry, as elsewhere, but my figures show that the authorities I have cited will have less than had been planned even though they have to increase their charges. That is the point of the argument.

Mr. Michael Grylls (Surrey, North-West): Is not the logic of all the hon. Gentleman's argument pointing towards the flaw in the theory of nationalisation? The real trouble is that while Governments own industries like the water industry Ministers of all parties will be tempted to interfere where perhaps they should not do so. I hope that he will agree that the solution to get everybody off the hook is to take the industry out of the public sector. Investment can then go ahead. If we can privatise the successful authorities the interests of the consumers and the people who work in those authorities will be best served.

Mr. Rooker: I shall await the hon. Gentleman's speech with interest, and I shall look with even more interest at the Lobby that he enters at the end of the debate.

What effect will this policy have on industry? There will be a 40 per cent. increase in the north-west and a 30 per cent. increase in the Thames area. There is a considerable amount of industry in the Thames area, and a quarter of the English electorate lives there. The CBI says that it will be a serious blow to manufacturing industry. That is not exactly bare knuckle stuff, but it is clear that the CBI is not happy about it and considers these increases to be a tax. We cannot understand why the Government are seeking to generate extra cash over and above that required from this vital industry.

We shall no doubt be told that water does not cost very much—only 21p per day for the average consumer. If the order is approved, that will increase by only 2p per day. However, I remind Conservative Members that for many millions of people the need to watch the pennies in order to allow the pounds to take care of themselves is a fact of daily life. The argument, "It is only 2p" simply will not wash.

The fifth target announced by the Minister in the Adjournment debate before Christmas was that of less borrowing, which clearly affects some authorities more than others. I do not deny that. Given the history of the authorities, their borrowing structure varies. I again use Thames as an example because it is a fair one. It is also a foretaste of what will happen to the other authorities in two or three years' time. In addition to the fact that Thames will have to increase its charges vastly over what is needed and cut its capital expenditure plans, it will have to pay back £61 million against a planned £18 million. Will any penalty be involved in early repayment?

In 1987-88, Thames will be required to pay £113 million, but it will have only £1 million of debt. For 11 million water users that will amount to forced lending to the Treasury. That is a tax and there is no other way of describing it. We shall be faced with complete self financing, debt redemption and a nice annual surplus to the Treasury. The 1985-86 order will mean that more than £100 million will be siphoned off from all the water authorities to the Treasury. That is what the Treasury will gain cumulatively. Much of it will come from Thames as some authorities will not be affected in the first year.

Current customers — our constituents — will in the next few years have paid off all the past debts and provided the assets for the 21st century. As well as stupid financing, that is absolutely unfair to elderly people who will not use the assets. It is also unfair on the working poor for whom there is no relief, given that the rateable value based system of water charges carries no rebate arrangement. I emphasise "the working poor" — there are millions of them — as opposed to those on supplementary benefit. So long as we maintain the present crazy rating system for property, those who suffer from that regressive system of taxation, such as single people, widows and small families, will be hit even harder because of the changes in water charges.

I know that we shall also be told that water authorities pay no VAT or corporation tax. Does anyone suggest that they should? Following implementation of the order, everything will be done at arm's length from the Chancellor. This measure flows from the Chancellor's autumn statement and the demands of the Treasury, and VAT is hardly needed when this technique is used. One does not need to introduce a Bill to levy VAT on water if a technique such as this is used, and I warn the House and the country that the same is in store for gas and electricity.

If I am doubted, I suggest that hon. Members look at the paper that the Treasury deposited in the Library on 20 December. No press notice accompanied it, but since then I have discovered that 70 copies went to the Press Gallery and that every political editor received a personally addressed copy. Obviously, on 20 and 21 December, the professional journalists of Britain were otherwise occupied.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): Not with water.

Mr. Rooker: It is quite clear from the proposals that have gone out for consultation that this procedure, which will levy a back door tax on water in order to avoid the need for VAT, will be used in respect of gas and electricity.

Mr. George Park (Coventry, North-East): I merely remind my hon. Friend that exactly the same tactics have been used in the case of the Post Office, which has been asked to double its profits despite the fact that the Government have already creamed off scores of millions of pounds in excess of what the Post Office needs.

Mr. Rooker: I remind my hon. Friend that the Post Office is on the list in the consultative paper. It is clear that the Treasury intends to tighten the screw even further.

Water charges are based on rates, and for the vast majority of the British people rates are a tax. Is it seriously suggested that we should tax a tax? That is what the order amounts to.

The Government got control of the water authorities — in reality, consumer co-operatives — in 1973 without giving a penny of compensation to the many local authorities which ran the previous set-up. In exchange, half the membership of the boards were allocated to councillors. But now we have executive boards which are all appointed by Ministers and which meet behind closed doors. Someone in the Treasury has decided that they are ripe for plucking, and consequently they are asked to levy a tax on water. I invite the Minister to bluff his way out of this and the House to reject the second order.

The Minister for Housing and Construction (Mr. Ian Gow): I begin by responding to the request of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) in relation to the dates on which the House is invited to approve these orders. I give the hon. Gentleman and the House an undertaking that in future these orders will be introduced before the start of the financial year to which they relate.

I also wish to comment — some of my hon. Friends would want me to do so — on the story which appeared in yesterday's Financial Times. It was a hilarious story. Neither the author of the article nor the hon. Member for Perry Barr was present when these discussions took place. I have the advantage of having been present. I must tell the House that I have never known a Treasury Minister to mislay a paper of that kind, and most certainly my right hon. and learned Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury would not, and did not, mislay the paper.

This is a serious debate. It is one about which many of my right hon. and hon. Friends feel deeply. It is clear from the speech of the hon. Member for Perry Barr that it is an issue on which he too feels deeply.

The debate is essentially about four issues. First, it is about the rate of return which should be earned by the water authorities. Secondly, it is about higher investment in the water industry, something for which hon. Members on both sides of the House have been calling. Thirdly, it is about the reduction in borrowing by the water authorities. Fourthly — a matter to which the hon. Gentleman rightly referred — it is about charges.

Mr. Andrew Bowden (Brighton, Kemptown): I apologise for intervening so early in my hon. Friend's speech. When he was talking about the substance of the debate, he mentioned charges and those who have to pay the charges. Many of his hon. Friends wish to go into the Lobby with him tonight, but, unless he can give an assurance that he will consider carefully the possibility of introducing rebates for water rates, it will be difficult for me and I believe for some of my hon. Friends, to join him in the Lobby. The proposed increases will have a devastating effect upon many pensioners and those on low incomes. Under the previous system in which rate rebates were applicable, general rates and water rates were taken together, so that rate rebates were available to pensioners and others on low incomes. Will he not at least consider and discuss this with his right hon. and learned Friends?

Mr. Gow: My hon. Friend is characteristically persuasive, and of course I shall consider what he says. However, I must remind the House of one matter, which will be the subject of part of my speech later. I think that a distinction can be made between general rates and water charges. The charge made for water is for services provided. My hon. Friend will know also that, in the calculation of entitlement to supplementary benefit, water charges are taken fully into account and some 3 million households already receive help with their water charges through the supplementary benefit system.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I think that the hon. Gentleman is misleading the House in two ways. First, although it is a charge for service, everybody in Britain receives the service. Secondly, it is only partly and not entirely in relation to supplementary benefit that the charges are taken into account and, as the Minister well knows, for those not on supplementary benefit, as his hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Kemptown (Mr. Bowden) said, there is no rebate. On that basis, the premise of the Minister is inaccurate and, at least in part, misleading.

Mr. Gow: I accept of course that almost everybody in the United Kingdom is in receipt of piped water, although many are not on mains drainage. That is not in dispute. I repeat that, when entitlement to supplementary benefit is calculated, water charges are taken into account, and some 3 million households receive help in that way.

Mr. Anthony Steen (South Hams): I am sure that the Minister will wish to enhance his reputation by helping the House in this way. If old-age pensioners will not, or may not, receive a rebate, can he assure the House that they will not pay more and that an upward adjustment will be made? Can he also say something about those who are retired and on fixed incomes, because they too will suffer extreme hardship unless there is provision in the Budget for a tax rebate for those who just do not have the money to pay a 12 per cent. increase?

Mr. Gow: It is of course the case that increases in charges for water in the coming financial year will have to be paid by pensioners. I was referring only to the 3 million households which already receive help through supplementary benefit. For them, supplementary benefit will reflect the higher charges that will be imposed next year.

Mr. Gordon Oakes (Halton): Will the Minister give an undertaking to the House that he will introduce a rebate on the water rates of those pensioners and other poor people who currently receive rebates on their general rate and are not on supplementary benefit?

Mr. Gow: No. I made clear in response to my hon. Friend the Member for Kemptown that I was not able to give that assurance. Indeed, the position is that, although rate rebates are given because rates are regarded as a kind of taxation, there is no rebate of water rates. Water charges, as I prefer to call them, are taken into account when calculating entitlement to supplementary benefit.

Mr. Michael Shersby (Uxbridge): Is my hon. Friend aware that many pensioners who live on fixed incomes just above the level of entitlement for supplementary benefit, housing benefit and, no doubt, other benefits will find an increase of 9 per cent. intolerable? What justification can there be for imposing such a charge on them when the Government have a policy of reducing inflation?

Mr. Gow: As my hon. Friend knows, the charges made for water are included in the retail price index. An increase of 1 per cent. in water charges has the effect of one hundredth of 1 per cent. on the RPI. I shall return to that matter later.

I deal with the rate of return. This afternoon we are debating the fourth and fifth orders which have been laid under section 29 of the Water Act 1973. That section enables my right hon. Friend to direct that water authorities shall achieve such a rate of return on the value of their net assets as he considers to be reasonable.

The first order was made in respect of the financial year 1981-82. In that order, the current cost value of net assets was adopted as the basis of the calculation, and that change was agreed by the House without dissent. Since 1981, the same basis of asset valuation has been used in all subsequent orders, including those before the House today.

The House will have noted, not with surprise, that the hon. Member for Perry Barr made only a passing reference to the Labour Government's White Paper on the nationalised industries presented to Parliament by the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) in March 1978. I wish to repair his omission.

Paragraph 3 of the White Paper affirmed:

"The Government must be concerned . . . in ensuring that there is an acceptable return on the public capital invested".

Mr. Rooker: Yes, they must.

Mr. Gow: I am glad to have the support of the Opposition.

Paragraph 4 affirmed:

"It was the Government's policy to treat the nationalised industries as commercial bodies so far as the expected return on investment was concerned".

My third and last quotation from the 1978 White Paper comes from paragraph 55:

"An adequate level of nationalised industry profits is essential to the continuing well-being of the industries and their customers and of the economy as a whole. They provide some of the funds for the very large investment programmes necessary to maintain supplies and services to the public. This keeps down the industries' new borrowing requirements, thus helping to reduce the burden of taxation and enabling the Government to maintain other important public expenditure priorities."

The House may think that the hon. Member for Perry Barr would have been more candid if he had pointed out that the Government are now following policies on water authorities that are precisely the same as those that I have quoted from the 1978 White Paper — a White Paper fashioned after even the Labour party had learned, with some humiliation, lessons taught it by the International Monetary Fund.

[Mr. Gow]

The average rate of return set for the water authorities in the 1984 order, for the current financial year, is 1 per cent. The 1985 order increases the average rate of return to about 1·4 per cent. for the coming year.

Mr. Robert Jackson (Wantage): The White Paper that my hon. Friend has been quoting talks about a 5 per cent. rate of return being expected from the nationalised industries. When does my hon. Friend envisage that the water authorities will have such a rate of return, and how much will charges have to be increased to bring such a rate of return about?

Mr. Gow: The Government have set targets, as my hon. Friend knows, only for the next three financial years. For the year 1985-86, the average rate of return for the water authorities goes up from 1 per cent. to 1·4 per cent. In the following year, the average goes up from 1·4 per cent to 1·7 per cent. and in the third year it goes up to 1·9 per cent. Thereafter the Government have set no targets.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): The Government reorganised water authorities. Arising out of that reorganisation, they expected greater efficiency and productivity. I am assured by my water authority that it is providing greater efficiency and production, and that this will increase. Therefore, why should it not be able to increase its return on capital, arising out of that reorganisation and increased productivity and efficiency, without interference from the Government? What is the use of that increased productivity and efficiency if the water consumer gets no advantage?

Mr. Gow: I understand my hon. Friend's point. There is a passage later in my speech which deals with efficiency. I give him an undertaking. If, after that passage, my hon. Friend is still dissatisfied, I shall give way to him again. I wish to make a little progress in my speech, not least because some of my right hon. and hon. Friends may want to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The targets differ from authority to authority because of differences in the rates of return presently being earned, and because of differences in investment levels, but the general policy will be the same for all authorities. Even next year's average of 1·4 per cent. is low when compared with a rate of return of 2·75 per cent. for the electricity supply industry and 4 per cent. for British Gas. As for the private sector, the Bank of England recorded that in 1983, for major non-oil industrial and commercial companies, the current cost return was 9 per cent.

The higher financial targets set by the Government will fund higher investment next year of about £90 million, bringing the total to £814 million, an increase of 12·5 per cent., as compared with the provision for this year. This extra investment in the infrastructure is something for which demands have been made within and without the House, and not least after last year's drought. Those demands have come from Labour Members, including the Leader of the Opposition, and from my right hon. and hon. Friends.

On 1 August last year, in a debate in the House, my hon. Friends the Members for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) and for Devon, North (Mr. Speller) and the hon. Member or Truro (Mr. Penhaligon), who uncharacteristically is not in his place, called for greater investment by the South-West water authority. This is exactly what the South-West will now get. Investment next year will increase by 15 per cent. from £33 million to £38 million. Investment in the North-West water authority, mentioned by the hon. Member for Perry Barr, will rise by 11 per cent. or £16 million. For Wessex, investment will rise by 40 per cent., from £35 million to £49 million. For the Welsh water authority, investment will rise by 19 per cent., from £47 million to £56 million.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): I note what the hon. Gentleman says about investment increasing in the Welsh water authority area. Is it not true that the rate of return for which he is now looking is similar to that of last year, and that the borrowing limits are being substantially lowered? The lowering of the borrowing limits, together with the allowing of the capital investment, will lead to an increase in water prices of 12 per cent. next year and of 30 per cent. over the next three years.

Mr. Gow: I hope that the House will understand that I have ministerial responsibility only for the nine water authorities in England. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Wales, who has responsibility for the Welsh water authority, will, if he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, wind up the debate. I would prefer it if he dealt with the Welsh water authority.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): My hon. Friend mentioned that I and some of my colleagues from the south-west called for extra investment in infrastructure. Can he confirm that, although the capital programme of the South-West water authority may be increased, that increase will be used mainly for meeting the extra burdens that central Government have put on the authority through the Control of Pollution Act? It will not improve the basic infrastructure for the ordinary consumer.

Mr. Gow: Mercifully, I am able to say that to diminish pollution is one of the most worthwhile tasks that can be carried out by water authorities.

The extra investment to which I referred will enable the water authorities to make more progress with the maintenance and renewal of sewers and water mains and further improvement in the quality of rivers, estuaries and coastal waters. Those who call for higher investment in the water industry are sometimes too ready to overlook the truth that, if money is to be spent, it has first to be found. That brings me to my third point about lower borrowing.

When the Labour party was in power, one of its most disastrous characteristics was that it believed that it was possible to finance extra spending by resorting to deficit financing on a massive scale. The author of the 1978 White Paper, from which I have quoted with approval, was the same right hon. Gentleman who, when Chancellor of the Exchequer, wrote his celebrated letter to the International Monetary Fund 15 months earlier. In that letter — [Interruption.] It is all very well for Labour Members to yawn. I want to remind them what happened when the right hon. Member for Leeds, East wrote to Dr. Johannes Witteveen on 15 December 1976.

Mr. Dobson: Does the hon. Gentleman propose sending details of this letter with every water rate demand?

Mr. Gow: That intervention makes me realise that I should not have given way.

I shall quote from the letter. It says:

"It is also essential to reduce the public sector borrowing requirement in order to create monetary conditions which will encourage investment and support sustained growth and the control of inflation".

Next year's higher rate of return permits the external finance limit for water authorities to be set at £203 million compared with £284 million this year. That is to say that there will be £203 million of additional borrowing next year by the water authorities as a whole. Only in the case of Thames, to which I shall turn in a moment, will there be a reduction in borrowing. By the end of this financial year, the total debt of the water authorities as a whole will be no less than £4·75 billion.

My fourth point is about charges. Understandably, there has been concern. Increases for next year will vary from authority to authority. So far, only three authorities have fixed their budgets. Our estimate is that the average increase will be rather more than 10 per cent. As I explained in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Kemptown (Mr. Bowden), a 1 per cent. increase in water charges adds one hundreth of 1 per cent. to the retail price index. For this year, the average bill for domestic customers of water authorities is £77 a year, or 21p a day. Assuming an increase in charges of 10 per cent. next year, the average bill would rise from £77 a year to £85 a year, or from 21p to 23p a day.

In the case of Thames—easily the largest authority, serving 11·5 million people — the average bill for domestic customers is at present £73·41, or 20p a day. If next year's increase for the domestic customer should turn out to be 9 per cent., that would mean an annual bill of £80, or 22p a day. Even then, the charges made by Thames to its domestic customers would be below the average in England and Wales.

Mr. Roger Freeman (Kettering): Is the Minister aware that the Thames water authority has considered the introduction of compulsory metering for all households? Is not this the sensible solution to the problem? It would provide a fairer, more equitable basis for charges and would enable investment decisions to be more sensibly made.

Mr. Gow: At my invitation, the chairman of the Thames water authority has agreed to serve on a committee that is considering the introduction of metering. I hope to receive the first report from the committee chaired by Mr. Roy Watts before the end of next month. Both the Government and this committee are considering the introduction of metering. Of course, water authorities' charges also reflect their operating costs.

I wish to deal with the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding (Sir K. Lewis). The House will remember that, under the Water Act 1983, we reconstituted the authorities with small, businesslike boards. We have taken vigorous action to improve efficiency. We have agreed objectives with water authority chairmen. We have set performance aims which are agreed targets for reductions in operating costs. Efficiency as been improved, as the hon. Member for Perry Barr acknowledged. In the three years to 31 March 1984, all 10 authorities reduced their operating costs in real terms. All have reviewed their organisations, streamlining their headquarters staff and in most cases cutting the number of their divisions. Since 31 March 1979, the numbers employed have been reduced by 10,400 to 52,000. The largest reduction, of nearly 3,500, was achieved last year.

The Monopolies and Mergers Commission has just reported on the Yorkshire water authority. The report said:

"We have no doubt that the level of efficiency achieved by the Yorkshire water authority in its early years"— that is when the Labour party was in power—

"fell far short of what might reasonably be expected in a large public enterprise. However, we are satisfied that there has been a substantial improvement in recent years and that the pace of improvements has increased since the authority was reconstituted in October 1983."

Mr. Geraint Howells (Ceredigion and Pembroke, North): I am sure the Minister is well aware that in 1973 many water authorities inherited a large debt. If the proposals are put into effect, when does the Minister envisage that the Welsh water authority will pay back to the Treasury its debt of £100 million?

Mr. Gow: If I may, I shall leave that question to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Wales, as he has responsibility for the Welsh water authority. I shall deal later in my speech with the general point about repayment of debt.

Mr. William O'Brien (Normanton): The Minister referred to the Yorkshire water authority. As a member of that authority, may I ask the Minister to be honest with the House and explain the work that the authority had to do because of the introduction of new technology and the grid system? It also had to ensure that sufficient water supplies were made available in the county. Will the Minister also explain that it took a number of years, because of the resources that were available upon reorganisation, to achieve those results? The Minister ought to be fairer to the Yorkshire water authority.

Mr. Gow: I was quoting with approval from the recent report of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. Following the quotation that I have just read out, I hope that the House will join me in paying tribute to the chairman of the Yorkshire water authority, who is a doughty Welshman, Mr. Gordon Jones, to his board and to his employees for what they have achieved. The same tribute can be paid to all of the water authorities.

I turn now to the system of current cost accounting adopted by the water authorities.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): Before he leaves this point, could I remind the Minister that he has not answered the question asked by his hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding (Sir K. Lewis) about why increased efficiency has not resulted in lower charges?

Mr. Gow: I said that I was going to deal with that point later in my speech. I gave an undertaking to my hon. Friend and I give a similar undertaking to the hon. Gentleman. If he is still unhappy when I have dealt with that matter I shall give way to him again.

Prior to 1981, the authorities produced historical cost accounts only. Those accounts suffered from two limitations. First, in common with all historical cost accounts they failed to reflect inflation — a factor of special importance in the case of water authorities with their very long-lived assets. Secondly—this applies to water authorities only — the way in which assets inherited from predecessor organisations in 1974 had been valued for accounting purposes compounded this weakness.

The following note appears in the accounts of Thames for the year ended 31 March 1984 — accounts which were approved by the board, signed by the chairman and the director of finance and audited by Arthur Andersen and Co.:

"Pre-vesting tangible assets are included at the net book value recorded by the various predecessor authorities at 1 April 1984. In the majority of cases these values represented only the amount of loans outstanding on debt-financed assets, thus excluding assets that had been financed from revenue, internal funds and capital grants and contributions, or for which doubt had been redeemed."

A similar note—I believe that this is the point which the hon. Member for Perry Barr raised—appears in the accounts of the other nine authorities.

What that means in plain English is that a significant part of the assets of water authorities do not appear at all in their historical cost accounts. Calculated on that basis, it is hardly surprising that water authorities appear to show a reasonable rate of return. It is equally clear that historical cost accounts are not a sound basis for assessing a water authority's financial performance.

There is no need to take my word for that. Hearken to the present Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee when, in an earlier incarnation, he was Financial Secretary to the Treasury. On 1 August 1978, replying to a debate in this House on accounting practice in the nationalised industries, he said:

"For the avoidance of doubt, let me reaffirm what my colleagues have said on previous occasions — that the Government wholeheartedly support the concept of current cost accounting in the private and public sectors". — [Official Report, 1 August 1978; Vol. 955, c. 670.]

The shortcomings of historical cost accounts were recognised by the water authorities themselves. In 1980, it was decided that water authorities should publish supplementary current cost accounts in accordance with the inflation accounting standards issued in that year. In the following year, the Department of the Environment, with the approval of all 10 water authorities and all of their auditors, asked Price Waterhouse to review the current cost accounting principles adopted by the authorities. Price Waterhouse, as the House would expect, carried out a most thorough review. In its report dated November 1981 it concluded:

"The approach to current cost accounting which has been adopted is both soundly based and sensible."

The report acknowledged that a considerable amount of further CCA research and refinement needed to take place in future years. That is a continuing process and a further element of it is the working party on CCA asset valuation, whose chairman is Thames's director of finance. I hope that the working party's report will be available in the summer.

In setting the financial targets of individual water authorities for 1985-86, the Government have been guided by three considerations. The first is the need to bring the various rates of return on existing assets from their present level to a common figure over the next three years. That is a policy of convergence. Secondly, there is a need to ensure that new investment earns a rate of return of 5 per cent. The third consideration is to allocate the investment levels broadly in line with the differing needs of each authority as expressed in its corporate plan.

I do not think that I am overstating the case when I report to the House that none of the authorities was enthusiastic about the Government's policy of raising rates of return. However, all save Thames have accepted our decision and most have welcomed the scope for increased investment, which they see as necessary to improve services and standards in their regions.

I promised earlier to return to Thames, and I shall do so. The current cost valuation placed on its tangible fixed assets by Thames, and confirmed by its auditors, was £4,425 million at 31 March 1984. At the same date, the value of its tangible fixed assets at historical cost was £826 million and its debt amounted to £423 million. It is fair to say that neither my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State nor I was aware of any dissatisfaction by any of the water authorities with the system of current cost accounting until after the Government had announced that they would seek a higher return next year. The proportion of the debt of Thames to its assets is very much less than that of any other authority. That is why the setting of a higher rate of return for Thames and for all the other authorities—Thames has been repaying debts since last year—takes the form of an earlier repayment of debt next year. Debt repayment in 1985-86 will be £60 million compared with £34 million in the current year.

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): It is true that Price Waterhouse recommended current cost accounting in 1981. Whether it was right to do so is a matter for debate, but surely it did not recommend also the imposition of a financial target on the basis of CCA, which when translated into historic costs, as is the system in most of private industry, would lead to a rate of profit above that earned by ICI, even though Thames is a monopoly. Surely Price Waterhouse did not do that.

Mr. Gow: In 1973 my right hon. Friend was a Member of this place and I was not; he was also a member of the Government and I was not. Under section 29 of the Water Act 1973, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is empowered to set the rate of return for water authorities. If my right hon. Friend and his colleagues were right to introduce that measure, I think he might accept that which appears in the recently published report of the Comptroller and Auditor-General. If the Comptroller and Auditor-General had thought we were wrong to set financial targets on the basis of current cost accounts, possibly he would have referred to it. However, my right hon. Friend will have studied the report closely and he will know that the Comptroller and Auditor-General made no such reference.

Some of my right hon. and hon. Friends have suggested that the water authorities might be transferred to the private sector, and I understand that that prospect would not be unwelcome to the chairman of Thames. There is a precedent, at least in part, for such a course. There are 30 private water companies in England and Wales supplying 25 per cent. of that area's customers wth fresh water. Although the companies are subject to financial controls by statute, they raise their money in the market place. Their funding is not included in the public sector borrowing requirement.

In our manifesto, we promised to transfer more public sector businesses to independent ownership. The transfer of water authorities, which form a natural monopoly, presents special problems, not least because of their regulatory functions. Nevertheless, my right hon. Friends and I will be examining the possibility of a measure of privatisation in the industry.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): I am grateful to the Minister for allowing me to intervene. It is unfortunate that his political views on these matters are not up to his courtesy.

The measure to which he referred when responding to the right hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) put together for the first time the organisation of water supply, water disposal and sewerage. All that we have been discussing applies as much to water disposal and sewerage as it does to water supply. Is the Minister suggesting that the regional water authorities and their subsidiary parts, which used to be local authority operations and funded by the Exchequer to the extent of £100 million a year in rate support grant up to 1974, be similarly transferred to private enterprise?

Mr. Gow: The House knows that the function of the 30 water companies is only to provide fresh water and that the function of the water authorities is to provide fresh water, take away foul water and deal with other environmental and regulatory services. My right hon. Friends and I will be examining the possibility of a measure of privatisation in the water industry, and that means the water authorities.

Mr. Spearing: Fresh water or foul water?

Mr. Gow: Fresh and foul.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): I represent an area which is largely supplied with water by an efficient private enterprise company. I hope that the Minister will not delude his hon. Friends into thinking that private enterprise water companies within the present system are immune from the burden of debt which is brought to them by the regional water authorities. For example, the Newcastle and Gateshead water company has to increase its charges to consumers because of the amount that it has to pay for what is provided to them, supposedly in capital, by the regional water authority.

Mr. Gow: I take the hon. Gentleman's point, which is well known to the House.

The House has been patient and I am almost done. I have something to say particularly to my right hon. and hon. Friends. All of us, faced with a choice between lower or higher increases in charges, would opt for lower. But the Government have to take a broader view, not least because of the principles set out in the 1978 White Paper, which have been endorsed by this Government—and not by this Government alone but by Parliament.

On 6 December, the House approved the autumn statement presented to Parliament by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. On page 21 of that statement, the external financing limits for the nationalised industries were set, including £203 million for the water authorities. Having approved the whole, we have also approved the parts.

So far as the water authorities are concerned, we have followed a policy which has been consistent and persistent. It is a policy which has meant streamlined boards, a commitment to greater efficiency, better service, a realistic return on public assets, and now more investment.

The journey to a Britain of sound money and honest finance is, in many respects, a painful one, but that journey has to be made and these orders are an essential part of that strategy.

6.11 pm

Mr. Gordon Oakes (Halton): As my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) so clearly told the House, for the first time in the history of the realm the Government are imposing a tax on water —a basic commodity. That is what the orders mean. Conservative Members are as worried about that as we are. In the Minister's final words he sought to sell the concept of a tax on water on the basis that he would privatise the nationalised water industry. A tax on water is as repulsive to Conservative Members as it is to us.

The Minister talked about water companies and the extent of their operations. It occurred to me to ask whether the order is hybrid. Does it affect the water companies or only the water boards?

Mr. Gow: The orders apply only to the water authorities.

Mr. Oakes: Some of the water companies supply water. One part of the supply of water is involved, but not the other. That smacks of hybridity.

Government Back Benchers must be puzzled at the Government's action. Last night there was a three-line Whip on the rate capping of local authorities because they are spending too much. Today Tory Members are operating on a three-line Whip to order water authorities to charge the consumer more.

I shall be brief because many right hon. and hon. Members wish to take part in the debate. I want to discuss the nature of water rates. One has control over the consumption of gas or electricity, but no control over the consumption of water. Even if one does not limit the amount of water one uses, one still pays the same rate. The whole rating system tends to be regressive, but water rates are particularly so.

I sympathise with the poor people who are not on supplementary benefit and who will have to pay this Government-imposd levy without rebate. The Minister said that he is unable to allow rebates. For the average household the increase will be £11 or £12 a year. That will be a considerable increase for all our constituents.

People are being taxed but cannot fight back. That is why hon. Members will resist the order. In a cowardly way the Government are trying to place responsibility for their tax on the already unpopular water authorities. The public should realise that we are talking about a tax. For the first time a Government are taxing water. They are trying to push it through the Lobbies tonight by promising their hon. Friends privatisation.

6.15 pm

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction will take the Government's proposal for 1985-86 back to the Treasury and change it, although I realise that he cannot because he is bound by the writ of the autumn statement on public spending.

I regard the Minister as one of the most courteous in the Government. He is scrupulously attentive to the worries of the House, but this time he has been sold a pup by the Treasury. He now has the miserable duty of trying to sell it to the House. I should have no qualms if we were dealing with a matter which was unpopular but for which the intellectual foundations were right. All Governments have to put forward unpopular measures which are difficult to sell and it would be absurd if Government supporters ran away every time that that happened, no matter how difficult the sales task.

I do not hesitate to support a policy that seeks to improve the financial organisation of nationalised industries and to establish a proper basis for recovering their long-term costs, provided that those costs and the assets which have to be financed are properly valued. I fear that in this case that proper evaluation has not been worked out.

As the Minister said, Price Waterhouse recommended current Government accounting for nationalised industries in 1981, and that was accepted by the Government at the time. However, that is four years ago and since then the accounting profession has split about the virtue of CCA. We are also living in a far less inflationary age—thank goodness—so the situation is different.

It was agreed four years ago that CCA was right and the water boards accepted it. However, there was no agreement about setting a financial target which produces, when translated into historic costs, a rate of return on capital higher than that earned by ICI and other major industrial companies when that organisation is a monopoly. CCA has the effect of vastly uprating the value of the capital assets of any organisation, particularly a water authority.

What would happen if those rules were applied in the private sector? Parts of ICI have a natural monopoly, but great care is taken not to push up to astronomical heights the rates of return on a historical basis. The question of whether CCA should be used involves a different debate. The key difficulty lies in the use by the Government of the words "adequate rate of return."

The figure of 1 per cent. sounds miserable when applied through current cost accounting to the colossally inflated value of the assets of some gigantic organisation such as the Thames water authority. However, in the language of historical costs, that produces a return higher than that earned by ICI. In applying financial targets, caution and balance have to be used. I cannot see where the caution and balance are being used in this application of policy.

The current cost accounting method, which is now under intensive dispute among accountants, must be treated cautiously. It inflates asset values enormously and it inflates the depreciation which must then be covered by income to finance those asset values. In the case of the Thames water authority—I am concentrating on that authority not only because my constituency comes within it but because it is such a glaring case of all that can go wrong when one applies this sort of policy too rigidly—the amount of depreciation that is required by what is proposed is three times what Thames believes it needs fully to replace its assets and maintain them in high quality order.

Under the Government's plans, the authority will be investing less than it would otherwise wish to do.

Mr. Jackson: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the net asset value of British Telecom is £8·4 billion, which, on the basis of the valuation of Thames water authority's assets, means that that authority is more than half the size of BT?

Mr. Howell: That illustrates the absurdity of the approach. CCA may be the general basis on which nationalised industries operate, but it must be applied with great sensitivity to different types of industries.

Even in the case of water authorities, there is a convention by which the value of assets, certainly those in place before 1981, is abated by 40 per cent. I suspect, however, that even that asset valuation is highly doubtful because one must bear in mind the replacement cost of a sewer, reservoir or installation, which has a life of perhaps 800 years. Is the replacement cost to include the cost of digging another hole for another reservoir or a new sewer?

One need only ask such questions to see the basic absurdity of building up a gigantic capital value, on which a rate of return is then calculated and which inevitably looks minuscule. It is clear that a mistake has been made somewhere in the Whitehall machine. I do not blame Ministers at the Department of the Environment in particular—they have had a heavy load to bear in other areas—but it looks as though they missed this one.

The Minister of State says that he has been even-handed as between water authorities, and I see his feeling about the virtue in that. But why was the Treasury even-handed as between what are very different concerns? The Thames water authority is by far the largest. It is a gigantic outfit and a wholly different business proposition. It is much better equipped than the other water authorities and, above all, it is paying off its debt and returning money to the Government. It has what is called in the jargon a negative EFL—a negative external financing limit—so that it is a different proposition.

It would have been a happier outcome for these affairs if, instead of even-handedness in the literal sense of applying a broad and unsatisfactory formula to all authorities, more sensitivity had been shown as between the different water authorities, some of which operate under completely different conditions. Hon. Members in all parts of the House could speak of the different problems that affect water authorities in different parts of the country.

I fear that this issue has been handled carelessly in the bowels of Whitehall. I do not like to see the Minister of State loaded with the duty of having to present such a weak case. It sounds as though it has been formulated not on the basis of rational argument, discussion and understanding of the nature of the industries concerned, and not even on the basis of trying to establish, within the overall framework of the Government's correct policy for the nationalised industries, different details for different industries. It has been settled on the basis of saying, "Do not bother me with facts. These are the figures. You make them fit."

I do not like to see policy made on that basis and I hope that it is not symptomatic of anything deeper inside the policy-making machine in the Treasury and Whitehall. The position should be corrected, although the Minister explained that unfortunately he is not free to correct it. At least let us hope that next year the same unhappy and intellectually unsound basis for dealing with the accounts of a body such as the Thames water authority are corrected. In the meantime, I would find it impossible to support the Government in the proposals as set before us.

6.26 pm

Mr. William O'Brien (Normanton): I join the right hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) in saying that some gross errors have been made in the Treasury's book-keeping relating to the water industry. I hope that his hon. Friends noted what he said about the financing of regional water authorities.

I support the motion for a number of reasons, not least because of the 4·5 million people in the Yorkshire and Humberside area who will be affected by this legislation a substantial number will suffer hardship. The Labour group for the region is strongly opposed to the order because, as has been pointed out, many householders will not qualify for supplementary benefit or other help towards the additional costs that will be imposed upon them. Housing benefit does not include a refund in respect of water charges. It is clear that the Government are deliberately creating hardship for many people.

Hon. Members, including Conservative Members who represent Yorkshire constituencies, have been asked to oppose the order. I hope that they will heed that appeal. Whatever may be said about the possibility of privatising the water authorities in the future, we must consider the costs that will fall on consumers now. There was no more than a hint from the Minister that privatisation might come in due course. It is clear that before that stage is reached the consumers will be paying dearly.

Even the CBI, a friend of the Government, states in its parliamentary brief that industry, already struggling for survival in the competitive world in which we live, will be caused additional expense, perhaps of as much as £100 million a year, as a result of the order. The Minister said that it was hoped that in future years the regional water authorities would be given more notice of orders such as this. It is clear, therefore, that water charges will increase and that there will be greater hardship for those who rely on the regional water authorities.

The CBI warns that, unless industry is buttressed against the proposed increases, the additional cost could cause further unemployment. That is a stark warning from an organisation which has supported the Government throughout. The CBI confirms what my right hon. Friend the Member for Halton (Mr. Oakes) said about this being a tax on water. It says that the regional water authorities will be tax collectors for the Government. One way to change the proposal is by supporting the motion, and I hope that Conservative Members will give that serious consideration.

Reference has been made to average increases and the way that they will affect householders. The Minister mentioned averages. We were not told the average rate assessment that was taken into consideration. In the Yorkshire area the increase is based on an average rateable value of £135. What will happen to people on fixed incomes, and pensioners who will not qualify for rebate and whose rateable assessment is above that? Their increases will be substantially more.

The Minister said that the increase for domestic consumers in Yorkshire would be 12·5 per cent. and that the overall increase would be 10·5 per cent. Some Yorkshire domestic ratepayers will have an increase of 19·6 per cent. in their water charges because of the way in which the rating system is applied. Is that a fair or just tax to impose upon consumers?

Consumer councils have been mentioned. When the local consumer council was told that the decision had been taken to increase charges, there was a call from the consumer council for all members of the Yorkshire water authority to resign because the increases would have serious consequences for users in the Yorkshire area. The anxiety expressed by the consumer council should not be underestimated. Consumer councils were set up to tell water authorities of the views of consumers, but no notice has been taken of the anxiety that they have expressed.

Consumers in Yorkshire are worried about the way in which the regional water authority and the Government are attacking consumers. Domestic consumers will suffer in a number of ways from the increases. First, there is an average charge, and it has been pointed out that the average increase in many cases will be three times greater than the rate of inflation. On numerous occasions we have been told by the Prime Minister and other Ministers of the importance of keeping inflation low and under control. In some areas the increase will be five times greater than the rate of inflation. Where is the justice and fairness in that approach to water consumers?

I should like the Minister to take note of a further injustice being caused to domestic ratepayers. The Yorkshire regional water authority is transferring charges for treating foul water and sewage from commercial undertakings to the domestic consumer. That kind of decision can be made without any explanation or notice because the public and press have no right of admission to the meetings of the regional water authorities. Ratepayers and consumers in Yorkshire should be given an explanation of why that transfer is necessary. I ask the Minister to inquire into the circumstances of that decision in the area.

Domestic consumers suffer more than others because they have to pay two standing charges. One is for water, and one for sewerage. We have been told that in the Thames area there is a suggestion that the installation of meters should be mandatory. When I was a member of the Yorkshire water authority, we talked about meters. We said that by using a percentage of the water that had gone through the meter we could assess charges for sewerage and for treating foul water. If that is done, the domestic consumer has to pay one standing charge only. Two standing charges are a great injustice to domestic consumers.

The Minister talked about the Water Act 1973. Section 30 gives water authorities comprehensive powers "to fix, and to demand, take and recover such charges for the services performed, facilities provided or rights made available by them".

That section has been superseded by the Government's action and by the way in which they are instructing water authorities to fiddle the charges that they are imposing on industry, commercial undertakings and domestic consumers.

The Minister also mentioned the matters that affect charges throughout the nine English regions and the area of the Welsh water authority. I received a copy of a newspaper which highlighted the dramatic rise in water charges and spoke of them as being double the rate of inflation, and referred to consumers paying more towards capital investment. That was not the Daily Mirror or The Sun; it was the Yorkshire water authority's newspaper. The author of the article was the chairman of the authority. The Minister paid him a tribute. The chairman decried the Government's action and the way that they are forcing all water authorities to increase charges by more than they want to.

I find it strange that Gordon Jones, the chairman of the Yorkshire water authority, is criticising the Government for the way in which they are imposing their wishes upon regional water authorities, because the Minister said that, although some water authorities were reluctant to accept the increases, his own chairman had done so without reservation. The chairmen of water authorities must decide whether to support the consumers or the Government. They cannot tell the Minister that they accept the increase and then go back to their regions and criticise the Government. That is why I take off my hat to the chairman of the Thames water authority for his action on this issue.

I remind Conservative Members that their constituents, too, expect their support in seeking to annul the order. I appeal to all of them to vote accordingly today.

6.40 pm

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South) : I have the good fortune—or misfortune, however one cares to look at it—of being a graduate of Oxford university. One of the intellectual games that we played when I was there was to take a subject to which one felt strong emotional hostility and try to argue in favour of it. That was my approach to today's debate. Having done some reading on the matter, I now conclude that there is a great deal of sense in what the Government are trying to do.

When I used to serve in local government I was responsible for some very large capital programmes, some of over £100 million. But the capital expenditure levels in some water authority reports show an astonishing complacency about the need to repair and replace existing systems, and particularly about the need to provide new systems in areas of population growth and new industrial development. The figures for the past 10 years show no growth at all. Most water authorities seem to have gone backwards.

My husband's family lives in the area of the South-West water authority. Ten years ago that authority's capital expenditure was £18 million and it blithely went on spending roughly that amount for the next decade, although to maintain its programmes at 1974 levels it should have been spending about £38 million by 1979-80.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Will my hon. Friend give way as she is referring to my area?

Mrs. Currie: No, I should like to get on. When we spent our holidays there and visited Lundy Island, there was not even any water for the sheep.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: If my hon. Friend knew anything whatever about the south-west, she would know that the water authority's programme of reservoir building was disrupted time and time again by objectors to new reservoirs.

Mrs. Currie: I defer absolutely to my hon. Friend's knowledge of the area, but I took the trouble to read the authority's annual report. The report for the subsequent year, 1977-78, is full of photographs of the chairman, who referred to a feeling of anti-climax and pointed out with great complacency that the reservoirs of Devon were still half full at the end of the subsequent rather wet summer. The figures do not bear out his complacency. I suspect that the £20 million per year being spent would be just about enough to provide a water service for a place like Lundy without taking account of the increase in housing and industry in the area.

Last summer there was another drought and my family and friends again had to use standpipes.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Sheer ignorance.

Mrs. Currie: My hon. Friend should ask his constituents what they think of the water authority.

Mr. Harris: Will my hon. Friend give way as she is referring to my water authority, too?

Mrs. Currie: No. I have sat through several debates in the past couple of weeks and no one has given way to me. Not one water authority has managed to maintain its 1974-75 capital programme in real terms.

Mr. Steen: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mrs. Currie: The worst region is Wales, which is spending about £50 million per year when merely to maintain the 1974-75 level would require more than £100 million. It is no wonder that there are problems there. All the water authorities are culpable and it is worth considering why.

In the past, the water authorities' finance has been split between the consumer and the Government. Effectively, the consumer has paid for current expenditure, including debt charges, but as this is not a labour-intensive industry and much of the debt has been written off over the years, we have had cheap water and sewerage on a day-to-day basis. Capital expenditure has been financed at least in part by borrowing. That is part of the public sector borrowing requirement whether we like it or not, and I certainly do not.

Part of the reason why the water authorities have failed to respond to need is that throughout the 1970s pressure on the public sector borrowing requirement by the Labour Government, who had to go cap in hand to the IMF, led to sharp cuts in capital expenditure, not just for the water authorities but for the Health Service, housing and virtually everything else. As my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction said, in 1978 the Labour Government introduced a White Paper putting the first financial restrictions and constraints on the activities of water authorities. It is sheer humbug for Labour Members to talk about hardship, because they started it.

It has therefore been decided, as I understand it, to cut the water authorities loose from the public sector borrowing requirement. There are several ways of doing that. The Government have chosen to shift the burden of finance entirely from the Government to the consumer and to reduce the present borrowing requirement of £286 million to nil by 1986-87. That is quite neat. It is claimed that it is not inflationary. On the figures that we have heard today, a 12 per cent. increase in water charges will add just one tenth of 1 per cent. to the retail prices index and only £7 to the average domestic bill, so talk of hardship is to a large extent sheer humbug. The effect is certainly far less than that of the recent increase in mortgage interest rates.

The rate of return chosen is 1·9 per cent. by 1987-88 on current cost accounting. That is extremely modest compared with the levels set for other public utilities. The electricity supply industry is being asked to find 2·75 per cent., the gas industry 4 per cent. and British Airways 5·75 per cent. in 1983-84. It is certainly far lower than the 9 per cent. average on current cost accounting reported in the Bank of England Quarterly Bulletin last September for the average of all industries and sectors. The best in the consumer goods sector is the health side, which is returning 16 per cent. in current cost accounting terms and 25 per cent. in historic cost terms; so much for the worries of my hon. Friends about the effect on this sector of limited list prescribing.

I do not know where my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) got his figures for ICI, but if he got them from the Thames water authority he might consider asking that authority to read the accounts again, as the latest available return for ICI—1983-84—was 6·2 per cent. in current cost terms, which is a great deal more than is being asked of the water authorities.

Mr. David Howell: I got them from Conservative Central Office.

Mrs. Currie: That might explain a good deal.

The only industrial sector to show a return of around 1 per cent. is the car industry. The best that one can say about that is that at least that industry is now beginning to make a profit, and thus a positive return rather than a negative one.

Mr. Freeman: I am following with great attention what my hon. Friend is saying. Can she explain how the water authorities can make sensible judgments about investment decisions without a sensible basis of charging? Without some price-sensitive method of charging, how can the industry judge whether or not to build a reservoir in a particular area?

Mrs. Currie: The water authorities, with their background knowledge of what it costs to replace their assets, are in a better position than anyone else to make such judgments. That is the root of the problem. If they do not allow for adequate depreciation in the cost of replacing their assets, they have to come cap-in-hand to the Government for the money.

I understand—I defer to the professional competence of my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman)—that we are trying to shift the burden from the Government to the consumer. There are other ways of doing that, and perhaps we should ask our hon. Friends to consider them. I suggest that it is intelligent to borrow long term to finance long-term assets. In housing, we borrow over 60 years. I am not the only hon. Member who has had the privilege of climbing on to a JCB machine and pulling down property for which we will still be paying well into the next century.

We could, and should, take the water authorities out of the PSBR all together. I suspect that we could do that by fiat, in much the same way as we decide week by week which measurement of money supply—M1, M2 or M3—we will use that week to make a judgment about the growth or decline in the money supply.

However, it would be better to do it properly. I should prefer to see those bodies returned to the private sector altogether. They could then borrow to their hearts content at whatever rate they could get. They could make a profit, and that would be financially lucrative for the Government—if the water authorities are as profitable as they say they are—because they would then pay corporation tax, which they do not now pay.

If we were to privatise the water authorities, irate consumers could become shareholders. Nobody loves the water authorities. There might even be lower charges. Much of my constituency is served by the South Staffordshire water company. That company's charges for water supply are increasing by only 2 per cent. in 1985-86. I commend the company. We might avoid the silly situation that often arises in Derbyshire, which is blessed with the sweetest water in the world, in which local users of traditional springs have to pay a tithe to the Severn-Trent water authority before they can use them. The effects of privatisation on other industries such as freight and shipbuilding have been entirely beneficial.

The Government should decide whether the water authorities are part of Government—in which case they do not need to make a profit, but they should be public and allow the public into their meetings — or they are businesses. If they are businesses, why do the Government own all the capital and set targets of any kind, whether spurious or worth while? I call on the Government to make up their mind.

I set myself a target and I have tried to fulfil it. In all honesty, I say that a Government who are committed to keeping down inflation should be cautious of any price rises and of any increases in taxation, in whatever form they masquerade. The public services require a steady, well-organised and well-funded programme of investment. We should beware of fiddling around with the accounts at the behest of the annuality fiends in the Treasury. The Government have my support tonight, but I look forward to more radical thinking in future.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): This debate is about the Government's proposal to tax people more for what they drink and, among other things, what they flush. It raises significant constitutional issues about how we should deal with proposals for taxation. The Minister was right to say that on the first three occasions when orders under the 1973 Act came before the House they went through without debate. This is the first occasion on which there has been a challenge to the executive action of fixing the real rate of return — the Government's power to decide how much profit the water authorities should make in the coming year.

There have been protests in the past. Those protests have mounted. The most recent protests were heard, I believe, in the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee at the end of last year, when my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Wainwright) asked the civil servants who were giving evidence for the Treasury in answer to questions on the Chancellor's autumn statement what was the basis of the accounting for the water industry. It seemed to my hon. Friend and to others, including the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark), that it was inappropriate to apply the same tests as elsewhere. Amazingly, the civil servants did not know the basis of the accounting method. If the Minister does not believe me, I refer him to page 34 of the Select Committee minutes of 26 November 1984. That is a worrying start.

As newspapers have made clear, by these orders the Government are taxing through the back door. This is yet another example. They have gradually increased backdoor taxation in the cases of gas and electricity and they are now increasing the proportion of it in the case of the Post Office. When, instead of the finite or relatively finite resources of gas and electricity, or the commercial context of the Post Office, what is involved is—thank God—an infinite resource, people feel that the sticking point has been reached. Water is a resource that everyone gratefully receives and uses. The same principles, therefore, do not necessarily or properly apply to water as apply to gas or electricity.

Some people do not use gas. A few people are not customers for electricity.

Mr. Jackson: The hon. Gentleman says that everybody uses water. Would he not agree that if we were considering this measure as a form of tax it would be highly undesirable, because it would hit the businesses that are heavy consumers of water and discriminate against them in comparison with businesses that are not heavy users?

Mr. Hughes: Yes. There is also a valid question about the relation between how much a customer uses and how much he should pay. However, the fundamental point of the present debate is that what the customers are being asked to pay is far more than the cost of running the service at a profit — the cost of properly managing the water authorities that process and supply the water.

There is another constitutional point. The Minister referred to it in his opening speech. The proposals involve differential levels of taxation. I accept that there may by an argument for making sure that the real rate of return in different water authority areas is similar. It could be justifiably claimed, however — no doubt the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) will do so in a moment—that the Welsh people should be asked to pay for what they receive but should not be asked to subsidise what other people across the border receive. There are arguments about the proper relationship between services received and the charges paid. My hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) has told me that, in his area, customers of the private water company in Newcastle contribute half what they pay to the regional water authority's costs of the Kielder dam and all its works, which do not benefit them at all.

There are many discrepancies. However, if there is to be an equivalence of charges, why should it be at an ultimate rate of 5 per cent. in real rate of return as opposed to 1·5 per cent. or 2 per cent., which would itself be more than the rate of return for any water authorities at the moment?

The House normally deals carefully with taxation matters. To protect the rights of citizens, we ensure that we scrutinise carefully anything to do with finance. The injustice here is that we have only an order, debatable for a little more than one hour, concerning a form of taxation that is at its highest ever level for unjustifable reasons. Moreover, the taxation is not being imposed by the Government, who are chosen from Parliament — an elected body—but by bodies that are appointed and the meetings of which, with the excepton of Wales, are closed to the public. The consumer consultative bodies that have been set up to protect consumer interests oppose the tax and we cannot resort to the Audit Commission to get it to investigate what is going on. The only accountability that is available is through the House, and we are given invalid arguments.

The Minister has to make much of the accountancy techniques. Current cost accounting has been used in the past too, but that does not make it any more valid. In the gas industry, pipes must be identified because of dangers that might arise from them. As the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) said, the assets of the aviation industry are obvious. The assets of water authorities—in the case of Thames, 80 per cent.—are underground. Many water authorities do not have plans of their assets and they certainly do not have detailed knowledge of them. The Government are applying an unrealistic exaggeration of the value of such assets in assessing the current cost. It is no more than an estimate and it is based on an inaccurate and unverifiable premise.

The proposals are amazingly inconsistent with Government policy. The Minister said that everyone must increase their payments to reduce their borrowing. I should like to quote from a letter that the chairman of Thames water sent to hon. Members. He wrote:

"Ministers frequently argue that repayments of debt followed by a continuing paying to Treasury are only to be expected in the case of Thames because we have a relatively low level of outstanding debt—in other words a low interest burden. The impression is given that we enjoy a 'windfall' advantage. The simple reason why Thames has a low level of borrowing is because Thames and its predecessors followed prudent spending and financing policies for years. We avoided the costs of borrowing. Ministers appear to be saying that past efforts don't count. It is rather like saying that I have a low mortgage, partly paid off. My neighbour has a newer and higher mortgage. Since we are equally wealthy we should pay the same. My mortgage is quickly paid off but since I can obviously afford to pay I have to continue to pay out the money."

It is also inconsistent to argue that, although Thames water has a lower debt burden, it must accelerate its rate of repayment. Like other water authorities, Thames is a commercial enterprise and does not need to repay that amount of money.

There is another constitutional argument which shows how flawed the Government's arguments are. We still have private water companies. If, with the same level of profits, they increased their charges to their consumers by the same level — 10 per cent. — they would be acting illegally. It is wrong to have different standards and the Government should ensure that the monopolies—water authorities—do not exploit their position.

Like other water authorities, Thames water has made it clear that it needs money to invest in infrastructure. We know that 25 per cent. of the water that is gathered is lost as it flows round the pipes. It is ludicrous to require water authorities to reduce capital investment because the Government want money to be paid back. All the demands are for investment in infrastructure to increase. All hon. Members will have seen local press reports outlining water authorities' need for more money to spend on infrastructure. I have a press cutting for 30 January which says:

"Huge spending cuts in flood-protection and land-drainage by the Severn-Trent Water Authority have come under attack."

The Lynn News and Advertiser reported:

"Threats of delays in providing long-awaited sewerage schemes in West Norfolk have been strongly criticised . . . Anglian Water has suggested that schemes at Castle Acre . . . could be postponed".

The Grantham Journal reported:

"A major review of all new water supply, sewerage and sewage treatment projects in the region is being carried out by Anglian Water because of the financial squeeze."

Sheffield's Morning Telegraph reported:

"Repairs to Sheffield's Victorian sewerage system have been delayed by cash shortages."

Building reported:

"Sutton is having talks with Thames Water Authority" to ask it to divert more money because there is not enough money for the sewage replacement works in its area.

During the recent freezing weather, people in Rotherhithe had to use standpipes in part at least because we have not the investment necessary to provide the perfect service.

The Government's policy does not work socially or economically. Consultative committees have written to hon. Members saying that, although they were set up to be consulted by the Government, the Government seemed determined to ignore their views. We also conclude that the Government's policy has no logic in economic terms. They rate cap local authorities one minute and then rate up water authorities the next. There is no incentive for management in water authorities to do the job that they have set out competently and professionally to do. The fight against inflation will suffer, the commitment of board members in water authorities will be impaired, employee motivation will suffer and eventually customers will suffer as they will have to pay more. The Government will be the only possible beneficiary. They are making an unjustified claim and I hope that the Minister realises that the logic of the Government's case is clearly flawed.

7.7 pm

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): I was interested to hear from my hon. Friend the Minister the advice that that eminent firm of consulting engineers—Price Waterhouse—has given. Its knowledge of the condition of mains pipes throughout the United Kingdom must be second to none. That is what we are talking about—wholly spurious figures which might seem convincing to Messrs. Price Waterhouse but which are meant to represent a perceptible reality when they appear in the books of water authorities. If they are not meant to represent a perceptible reality, they are not a sensible base on which to attach a return, whatever the figure might be.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister for bringing me a glass of water.

Mr. Harris: No charge.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: We need not waste time on absurd speeches such as that we have heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie), who seems to be under the impression that Lundy is the responsibility of the South-West water authority. If she reads the Water Act 1973, even her own eyes will tell her that it is not.

Mrs. Currie: May I——

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Yes, she may go and read the Act. If my hon. Friend were familiar with the history of the South-West water authority of the past decade and a half, she would know that delays went into years, not months, for example at Meldon reservoir. Plans for Swincombe reservoir were frustrated, and it did not come into existence. If those reservoirs had functioned when they should have, the picture of drought would have been wholly different. The delay at Roadford reservoir prevented it from functioning during last year's drought. She made no reference to that, although she claimed some expertise.

Mrs. Currie rose——

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: I shall give way as often as my hon. Friend did, which is once, and when I come to a suitable point. To import such deplorable ignorance about the South-West water authority into such a debate is not a service to the House. I shall give way when I have finished dealing with such nonsense.

The debate is not about how one costs aeroplanes or visible things with a known maintenance cost and visible attrition. It is about what are technically termed assets, but which can be a liability because the cost of replacing them can be even higher than starting the scheme de novo, which obviously is not the case. We are dealing with a historic network that in many cases bears no relationship to the pattern of the authority which exists today, and which at hideous cost links the disparate parts of the system so that they relate the pattern of population and demand today to the resources.

Mrs. Currie: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for the gracious way in which he has given way. It was no part of my case to suggest to him anything other than my ignorance of his area and his considerable knowledge of it. I did not say that Lundy was part of that water authority area, but merely that the cost of providing a service to such a place would have taken the entire capital programme of the water authority at the time. Does my hon. Friend agree that the kind of capital programme that he advocates, and, indeed, which is needed in the South-West water authority, would cost a great deal of money and result in a substantial increase in charges to his constituents, whatever accounting system is used?

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: We could have had three times the capital programme for the same cost if the water authority had been allowed to conduct itself as a business, which is what Ministers often exhort it to do. The previous chairman of the South-West water authority wanted to borrow money at 8·5 per cent., but was forced to go to the Public Works Loan Board and borrow at up to 22 per cent. Exhortations to behave like a business are followed by interdictions on so doing.

An authority is still not allowed to behave like a business or to borrow money as a good business man would. It is forced to adopt accounting practices which attach a wholly artificial value to what are not assets. They are not assets if they require extra reservoir capacity because they leak like sieves, and cause constant complaints about discoloured water because they are made of old flaking pipes that are scaled up, and if they are subject to variations in pressure at times of low flow from some sources, or when demand is highest when it is swollen to three times its normal size in the summer. To treat those as assets, as in the ridiculous computation by Price Waterhouse, and to expect a putative return on them is the sort of nonsense that I do not expect from a Conservative Government, and which I do not intend to support.

A dangerous heresy was nearly expressed—that was, of regarding water authorities as if they were owned by the state. They are not. The component parts of the South-West water authority were owned by the local authorities concerned, and have never been owned by central Government. There is no parallel between the financial disciplines, in terms of yielding a net yield to central Government, imposed on gas or electricity, which are owned by central Government, and those of local water authorities, which are not. The Government are endeavouring to generate employment, especially in the peripheral areas, by holding down avoidable costs in local authorities in the form of rates. It is wholly counter to that policy artificially to force up the costs of the charges imposed by water authorities. The costs are not confined only to supplying water and removing foul water and sewage, but include environmental charges, which are pure taxation. The decisions that lead to environmental charges are political, not business decisions. Yet they take place in secret and with the press excluded from the deliberations leading to them. That is an undeniable fact.

We are dealing with a matter that runs counter to much of the Government's policy — which I support — to minimise costs, generate new enterprises, and reduce as far as possible the capital requirements on new entrepreneurs. That is cut away if, with the other hand, one imposes on them wholly avoidable costs.

It is not good practice to say that capital equipment with a long service life should be financed from revenue rather than borrowing. That is exactly what borrowing is for. The borrowing of which we disapprove is the borrowing from a failure to balance current accounts: it is borrowing in substitution for income on current account, not capital account. We must let the authorities behave like businesses and exercise business acumen about where to borrow. We must not force them into the public borrowing sector. There is no earthly reason why they should not have borrowed on the continent instead of from the Public Works Loan Board. That is the crux of the matter. We do not get out of nonsense of that kind—the Government have it in their power to rectify it by a stroke of legislation —by supplementing it with nonsense of this kind.

As statutory instruments cannot be amended, the best thing to do is to invite the Minister to withdraw them. That is always open to him, and it is the sensible thing to do. Other Ministers have done it in the past. The sensible thing is to treat the statutory instruments as though they were presented in draft form to the House, to collect the views of the House, and to withdraw them. The orders should not be passed into law. If the Government seek to do that, they will do so with the opposition of many hon. Members, not with their consent.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): As hon. Members will recall from previous debates, water in Wales is a burning issue. Indeed, it is hot water that has become even hotter today. Wales is in the unenviable position of suffering from excess rainfall, which leads to floods, and of having inadequate reservoir and water networks, which leads to drought in summer. It exports water to regions such as the Severn-Trent water authority and the North-West water authority, but Welsh consumers pay twice as much rate poundage as the consumers in those areas. Wales seems to get the worst of all worlds.

Perhaps I may describe the background against which we are considering the orders. In Wales, water rates are considerably higher than those in the rest of the country, and have been twice as high as those in nearby areas. It is interesting to consider the report of the Comptroller and Auditor General for 1983-84, which shows that in the average household bill in Wales water charges account for £47·76. That compares with an average in England of £33·87, and it is interesting to note that the figure for Severn-Trent is £30·27 and for the north-west is £31·15. A 10 per cent. increase in Wales, which will also be hard hit by the orders—we are agreed that they are bad for everyone—will mean an increase in real terms of £4·76. In the north-west area, the increase will be £3·03. Therefore, the increase in Wales will be 50 per cent. higher in real terms than the increase in the north-west area, yet in Wales disposable income is lower than in many regions of England. The position is extremely bad.

The position could be improved in two ways. First, the Welsh water authority could obtain adequate payment for the water that it exports to other areas. The recent High Court case against the Welsh water authorty, to which Plaid Cymru was a party, was settled out of court, with the water authority recognising that it had the right to charge more for the water that it sends to other authorities in England. The Welsh water authority may have been a little slow in catching on to that, but the Severn-Trent authority was not. The Western Mail of 21 January, under the headline, "Water bills for city trebled by authority", states:

"Birmingham is trebling the price of Welsh water . . . and selling it to Liverpool. Birmingham — which has always insisted that Wales cannot make a profit out of selling water to England, has increased its bill to Liverpool from £360,000 to around £1 million."

The other way of getting a fairer deal, if we must have a near uniform rate of return on capital to which the orders refer, would be to have an even scale of charges in England and Wales. We pay the same price for a Mars bar whether we buy it in Birmingham or in Caernarfon; why do we not do that with water? It would be more equitable. But Wales gets neither a fair price for the water taken out nor equal charges. As I said, Wales gets the worst of both worlds.

The increases have been introduced against that background. For the first time, there is a statutory requirement on water authorities to make specified profits that are higher than many of the water authorities would have wished. Many hon. Members have referred to the rebellion of the Thames water authority. That rebellion is partly because the increase is a tax. It is a tax without representation, because the water authorities that impose such charges are not elected bodies. That is a bad principle.

The chairman of the Welsh water authority led us to expect a decrease in real terms in water rates this year. In a letter that he sent on 30 November to the local advisory councils in Wales, he said that, although the authority had hoped for a 2·5 per cent. decrease in real terms, the Government's policies announced in November had made that impossible. The letter stated that the proposals of the Government are to do this

"by a combination of higher target financial returns and much lower borrowing limits. As a result of this Governmental policy decision, the Authority can no longer restrain the increases in charges below the increase in the RPI. The new financial constraints are such that we will have to raise charges by considerably more than this in each of the next three years."

That is, indeed, bad news.

Mr. Donald Coleman (Neath): Will the hon. Gentleman care to comment on the other position adopted by the Government? If this were a local authority that wished to increase its charges, it would be rate capped.

Mr. Wigley: That is the great irony. Only last night the House was debating rate-capping legislation which stops authorities increasing their charges, yet here is a specific provision to increase charges. Not surprisingly, there has been a massive reaction in Wales and elsewhere. One is reminded of the water rate rebellion in Wales three years ago, when 20,000 people withheld their water rates. The Government are heading towards stirring up a similar reaction.

In a letter of 22 January to the Secretary of State for Wales, the consumer advisory committee of Gwynedd says:

"At a special meeting of my Committee held yesterday members expressed their great personal concern, and the concern of the consumers they represent, at the Welsh Water Authority's proposal to increase their charges by 30 per cent. over the next three years. They were further incensed when they recalled statements made last year by the Chairman of the Water Authority that it was the firm intention that annual increases be kept within the level of the retail price index. Members were given to understand that this undertaking could have been fulfilled but for the intervention of the Government in November 1984 . . . It is the stated hope of my committee that there will be less Government intervention in future in the operations of the Water Authority."

That letter is signed by Mr. Vernon Hughes.

The National Farmers Union also wrote to me, and perhaps I may quote from the original:

"Mae ein aelodau yn methu a deall sut mae yr Awdurdod yn medru cysdiro codi y pris cymaint dros ben lefel chwyddiant yn y wlad."

—[Laughter.] Hon. Members may laugh. I am used to that reaction from certain hon. Members but for the benefit of hon. Members I shall translate the letter. It states:

"Our members fail to understand how the Authority is able to consider increasing the price so much above the level of inflation in the country."

That is especially pertinent in Wales, because many farmers are milk producers, who have been clobbered from another direction because of the ineptitude of the Government.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Wyn Roberts): The hon. Gentleman will realise that we do not yet know precisely by how much the Welsh water authority will increase its charges next year, because it has yet to meet to decide that. However, there will be at least three elements in the decision. The authority must allow for inflation when it decides the increase in charges. Another factor in domestic charges relates to the transfer of costs from the non-domestic sector, and there is also the factor caused by the change in Government targets. The change in targets amounts to only about 2·75 per cent. of the proposed overall increase in charges.

Mr. Wigley: Once again, the Minister's figures do not add up. Of course, there are swings and roundabouts, and some people will have higher increases than others because of the move towards an equalising of charges within the Welsh water authority area. Everyone recognises that, but the chairman of the authority was talking about an average increase of 30 per cent. over three years, not about a maximum increase. The Minister says that there is inflation. Of course, there is, but the Welsh water authority has been especially effective in keeping down costs, and, without the Government's interference, it would have increased its charges by about half the retail price index for the coming year. That argument is disposed of.

Sir Anthony Meyer (Clwyd, North-West) rose——

Mr. Wigley: I have not quite finished with the Minister yet. His third argument was the effect of the Government's proposals, and I shall come to that in a moment.

Sir Anthony Meyer: One reason why the Welsh water authority has been so effective in keeping down costs is that it was reorganised by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales, in the face of intense opposition.

Mr. Wigley: There have been reorganisations and some have been beneficial. Some have led to problems for the consumers, but they have led to lower operating costs and we should be seeing the benefit of that in our water bills. We are not, because of Government policies.

What we are seeing is an increase in the water capital investment programme in England and Wales for the next year from £686 million to £769 million. That is an increase of £83 million in the investment that the Government recognise is needed in the water industry.

The hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) referred to projects that need to be undertaken. We in Wales know from last summer's drought and from the floods of a few years ago of the expenditure needed, and I recognise that other areas have needs as well. There is recognition by the Government of a need for £83 million more in capital expenditure, but at the same time the Government, because of their monetarist and cash limits policies, have decreased the external financial limit from £264 million to £183 million, which is a drop of £81 million. Taking those two together, this is a difference of £164 million that has to be met; a shortfall of £164 million.

So the Government say that they are going to increase the rate of return from 1 per cent. to 1·4 per cent. That is an increase of 40 per cent. The return last year was some £400 million over England and Wales, and 40 per cent. of £400 million is £160 million. That more or less balances the books. But the Government cannot escape the criticism being made from this side of the House particularly that it is their policy of cash limits and reducing the available capital that is leading to the need for the excuse of getting a higher return on capital. It is not a matter of following a theoretical conception—or perhaps it is. I will come back to that. It would appear that there is a need to find £160 million and therefore there has to be this theoretical justification of a required return on capital.

Responding to the Minister's point that it was not the Government that caused the problem with increased charges in Wales, they most certainly made things worse. In Wales, the return last year was already 1·47 per cent. Therefore, one can expect little additional revenue to come from the return on capital of 1·45 per cent. stipulated in this order. But there is a need next year for £14 million more in terms of the capital expenditure that the Government have sanctioned for Wales, and by 1987-88 there is a need for £35 million more. If that £35 million is to be funded by increasing the profits generated by the authority and retained for capital expenditure, that needs a return of over 2·5 per cent. on the assets of the authority by 1987-88. That is the logic of what the Government have sanctioned on the one hand by the capital investment programme that they have boasted of in Committees and elsewhere and which is needed, and on the other hand by the restrictions that they announced last November in the external financial limit. Therefore, there is a need for an increase of £35 million, which is equivalent to some 30 per cent. over the three years. That has come directly from the Government's own policies, and the Minister cannot escape from it.

[Mr. Wigley]

Turning to the background of this whole issue, it is a move towards privatisation. As the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), who opened the debate for the Opposition, said, we have to consider it in the context of the "Nationalised Industries Legislation Consultation Proposals", which were lodged in the House only five days before Christmas. This is directly relevant to what we are discussing, because it refers to the private sector companies being regulated by a common set of statutory provisions and says that "the Government considers that it would be advantageous if a single Act set out the core framework to be applied to nationalised industries."

It goes on—and this is very important—to say that one of the six elements that it refers to in such legislation would be

"the formation of companies and privatisation."

If we look at the list of the industries that would be privatised we see, in annex A, the Welsh water authority.

In other words, what we are seeing tonight is the first step along the road towards privatisation. What we have in the document lodged five days before Christmas, when some people were in an alcoholic haze, apparently, according to comments heard earlier tonight, is a framework to get the accounts of water authorities in a format that will be transparent to those who may want to make a take-over bid, that is, these proposals are meant to make the road to privatisation easier.

There we have it. These orders are not just a pragmatic response to a shortage of cash in the water industry; they are a step towards the privatisation of the industry, not only in Wales but elsewhere, as part of an overall privatisation package which, side by side with cash limits, is giving the problems which Wales and other areas will have to pay for by a 30 per cent. increase in water charges.

7.35 pm

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): I think it might be helpful if I were to review briefly some of the principles on which these orders are based. The Government, in putting them forward, wish to achieve, among other things, three things in the water industry. First, they wish to see increased investment; secondly, they wish to reduce public borrowing; and, thirdly, they wish to encourage water authorities to achieve on publicly owned assets what the Government consider to be a reasonable rate of return. It occurs to me, particularly listening to the debate tonight, that, far from being criticised for these aims, the Government could almost be criticised for not going hard enough for them. Let me just elucidate that point.

We are all in favour of increased investment in the water industry. I have heard that cry many times from both sides of the House. What it would seem the Opposition parties are against—indeed, they seem to have struck a chord of sympathy in one or two of my hon. Friends—is not so much the investment as paying for it. I have often wondered, particularly in the years before I entered the House, why it was that it was always future generations that seemed to be being caned for the fact that past generations had put in investment and not paid for it. I am beginning to understand why, because there is this reluctance to link the two necessary facts, that investment is not going to drop into our laps from on high, and that it has to be paid for. So, when we talk tonight about increased investment, should we be surprised that there are going to be increased charges to pay for it?

One of the objectives of these orders is to reduce public borrowing. I am not surprised that the Opposition parties are against the orders, because they are not very keen on reducing public borrowing. All the Opposition parties fought the last general election on the basis of increasing public borrowing. They were soundly defeated. I hope, for the sake of the political careers of myself and my hon. Friends, that they will be so again. Nevertheless, the aim of the orders is to reduce public borrowing. That inevitably brings with it the possibility that charges will go up.

The third objective which is a basis for these orders is to produce what the Government consider a reasonable rate of return on net assets. The Government have set as a reasonable rate of return 5 per cent. on new investment, and 1·4 per cent. rising to 1·9 per cent. in 1987-88 on existing assets valued on current costs. We have heard many protests at this rate of investment tonight. I assure my hon. Friends—the Opposition parties will not be interested, because they do not believe in a rate of return on public assets—that if we are looking at privatisation of parts of the water industry, with the exception of the Thames water authority, we have a long way to go before we will produce a rate of return which the market will find attractive to enable us to privatise these public assets at the proper price. The rates of return quoted by the Government are by no means exceptional in large companies which are trying to utilise their assets. If anything, in my view, as a practising accountant, the Government have been over-generous to the water authorities in the past and are sensibly taking the view that it will take time to catch up.

Those are the principles on which these orders seem to be based. We have heard a lot about those authorities which object to the orders, but there was one authority which was referred to by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) as not having sent in any information. That is not surprising, because it is an authority which totally disproves his case. It is the authority which covers my constituency—the Wessex water authority.

I wish to comment briefly on the effect of the orders on the Wessex water authority to show that, far from being the gross attack on water authorities that they have been painted, the orders highlight the effect on an authority which for a number of years has run on a sound financial basis. It has invested sensibly over those years and has conducted all possible economies, and after these orders the Wessex authority will be able to go into the world perfectly able to offer a reasonable service to its customers.

The chairman of the Wessex water authority, Mr. Malcolm Anson, points out:

"we have a compelling need to increase the level of investment above that which has been permitted in recent years and, particularly, above the level permitted in the current year, if we are to arrest the decay of old assets, maintain, let alone improve, our levels of service, provide for growth in the region and meet our statutory duties under the Control of Pollution Act and other regulations. This has been recognised by the Government"— in the external financial limit which has been set.

"the setting of the financial target for Wessex at 1·4 per cent. simply provides another reason for doing something which we would have needed to do in any case . . . I hope . . . you will feel that the Return on Assets Order 1985 is beneficial in its implications for your Wessex constituents and that you will feel able to support it."

I reassure the chairman that I have every intention of supporting this order.

The amazing difference between a well-run authority such as Wessex and some of the complaints that we have heard today is also revealed in a reply which the chairman of the Wessex authority has given to the CBI, whose views were quoted with approval by several hon. Members. He said:

"I do not believe that it is generally true that the setting of financial targets in the form of return on assets is unnecessarily adding to charges. It is not so in Wessex . . . It is past capital expenditure on storage, mains, telemetry and automation that has enabled us in Wessex, in the last ten years, to get through two droughts, a strike and exceptionally severe winter storms without any real inconvenience to industry or our other customers, and at the same time to reduce operating costs by 2 per cent. per annum for the past four years—a trend which is continuing. For the future, I believe that the levels of investment now proposed are what industry should be asking for and supporting."

It is clear that there is a dichotomy of views between the water authorities about the effect of these orders. Following the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop), I hesitate to dare to comment on other authorities, but although some may have particular problems because of the way they have been managed in the past and the effects of financial targets, with the exception of Thames, the position by and large cannot be nearly as bad as some hon. Members have tried to make out.

It is only fair to remind the House that I speak as a practising accountant and a member of the firm of Harpern and Woolf, which has been involved in the debate on current cost accounting. I also speak as an opponent of current cost accounting, and have consistently opposed SAP 16. I was delighted when it was withdrawn. Although there is no black and white in accountancy, I believe that one or two industries are perhaps less inappropriate for current cost accounting than others. Those industries can be distinguished by the fact that, whether we use the term "fixed assets" or "fixed negative assets", their assets have extremely long lives. As a result, the depreciation charges included in their accounts which are based on those assets are totally meaningless if based on historical costs.

As an opponent of current cost accounting, I accept that CCA has at best been an imperfect substitute. However, in the case of industries such as water authorities, CCA is probably a better substitute than historical costs. I was delighted to see that, in his financial report in October, the chairman of the Thames water authority agreed.

Any chairman of a body such as a water authority has an opportunity either to use current cost accounting or to say in his report that he believes it to be inappropriate for his industry. That opportunity was not taken by the chairman of the Thames water authority, who signed the accounts without such a rider. Indeed, his auditors, Arthur Andersen—not consulting engineers, but nevertheless auditors used to looking at accounting principles—approved those accounts despite the fact that the chairman and his director of finance did not add a rider about current cost accounting.

That report states:

"the current cost convention is not a system of accounting for general inflation, but allows for price changes specific to the Authority's operations".

In other words, the chairman is agreeing with me and is saying that, although CCA is imperfect, it is appropriate to the operation of a water authority. The chairman adds:

"In the current cost accounts, all fixed assets are depreciated over their estimated useful lives".

Those lives are set out in the report.

Therefore, I was somewhat surprised to read in a letter from the Thames water authority that there has been a conversion on the road to Damascus and that the chairman now totally disagrees with the report that he signed four months ago. He now believes that the asset lives included in his authority's report are inappropriate for the purpose of fixing rates of return. I am not sure, however, to what other purpose accounts should be put in an authority of that size. Despite the chairman's absence of adverse comment four months previously, he also believes that CCA is wholly inappropriate to the operations of Thames Water and the relationship between accounts and the rate of return which is inevitably based on those accounts.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) said that CCA was an imperfect tool and that it should not be used as a method of fixing a rate of return. His point was echoed with greater force by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes). However imperfect CCA may be as a means of fixing rate of return, it is the best guide we have. It is certainly far better in the case of a water authority than the historical cost convention, which on asset lives of about 200 years is wholly inappropriate. I accept that current cost accounting must be treated with caution, but nevertheless it is far better than anything else available.

Mr. Jackson: What is my hon. Friend's estimate of the effect on charges in his area of the application of a 5 per cent. rate of return on a current cost accounting assessment of the assets?

Mr. Stern: In the Wessex water authority, the charges next year are expected to rise by 11 to 12 per cent. after the application of the required rate of return to assets valued under the current cost accounting practice.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: I have the impression that the form of argument of my hon. Friend is that an aeroplane with one wing is better than an aeroplane with no wings, whereas I would say that neither was any use for flying.

Mr. Stern: My hon. Friend, with his customary humour, has slightly twisted my point. I was saying that the only way of fixing a rate of return and of measuring the public's use of the public's assets is by valuing the assets that are being used. I do not agree with my hon. Friend about aeroplanes because they have far too short a life for current cost accounting to be wholly appropriate. We are discussing assets with a life of between 100 and 200 years. In that case, current cost accounting can be appropriate. In adopting a financial target and in conducting a financial exercise we must use a financial tool, and current cost accounting is the best tool available.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Will the hon. Gentleman accept that one of the reasons that the chairman and the board of Thames water are unable to accept the Government's present policy is because, the higher the rate of return, the greater the inadequacies of the accounting mechanism that are revealed, particularly with this mechanism, although it may be better than others. However, I take the point of my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) that if one demands—and there is demand this year—a greater rate of return, the result of working on an inadequate premise is multiplied many times in the inadequacy of the criterion that the Government are now applying. We ought to allow Thames water to make that judgment, as the hon. Gentleman said, rather than suggest that the Government make it for the authority.

Mr. Stern: I would not agree in any way with the hon. Gentleman. The rate of return is merely a factor applied to a value. The closer one can arrive at the true value to the authority of an asset or group of assets, the more accurate the rate of return will be. The suggestion that we should move away from current cost accounting because it gives an inconvenient result to Thames water is wholly opposed to the principle of trying to find the most accurate possible method of measurement of the way in which public assets are being used.

I hope that I have demonstrated that the opinion of one authority has changed in the course of four months from the time that it produced and signed a public document to the time that it realised the effects of using the figures in that public document.

We are debating, I suggest, not the basic argument about accounting principles or assets' lives but rather the contrasts between different water authorities. I have quoted the case of Wessex, which is prepared to accept that present and future investment has to be paid for and that it must consider the interests of not only present but also future ratepayers. Rather than load an unacceptable burden on the future, Wessex accepts that part of that burden must be borne today. It is part of the burden only because, as the House knows, investment in the water industry is a continuous process. It is like painting the Forth bridge.

The authority in which my constituency lies is prepared to accept the financial consequences of the present situation, and other authorities in my view are crying out to court cheap publicity at the expense of present and future ratepayers. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] That is my honest view, based on the contrast between the statements of the chairman of Thames water four months ago and the exactly opposite statements that he now makes. I believe that that is fair comment.

I call upon the Minister to protect my constituents, the ratepayers in the area that I represent. I ask him to ensure that the prospects of what appears to be a very well-run authority, as in the case of Wessex, will be protected by the orders.

Mr. Gareth Wardell (Gower): I shall confine my comments to the implications of the orders for the people of Wales. In doing so I pay tribute to the Welsh water authority for its openness in granting access to its meetings to the media and to the public, and because it will soon be the only water authority in the United Kingdom to retain a virology laboratory. That is significant, because the quality of water is vital for the health of the population. I hope that the Minister will consider having similar virology facilities in other water authorities, and also the benefits of public access to water authorities.

In 1985-86 the financial target of the water authority in Wales will be 1·45 per cent. of the value of net assets, while the external financing limit will be set at £20 million. Under the orders, by 1987-88 the rate of return will be raised to 1·9 per cent. and the external financing limit will be lowered to £13 million. The Government have chosen to impose upon water authorities the combination of a higher rate of return and a lower external financing limit. The Government faced a number of options, one of which was to increase the rate of return in line with the retail prices index, combined with an increase in the external financing limit.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary for Wales, in his winding-up speech, owes it to the people of Wales to say why he has chosen to force the Welsh water authority to increase its charges when areas of England which receive Welsh water, as the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) made clear, pay lower charges than the area from which the water comes. This is the situation at a time when the people of Wales, according to the latest statistics of the European Commission, live in one of the six poorest regions in the European Economic Community. It is another hidden tax on one of the poorest regions in the EEC. In my view, this is an unacceptable measure, and I hope that the Minister will ponder the words of the hon. Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) and consider withdrawing the orders.

The matter goes deeper than that. The Minister must explain why the Government have chosen not to raise the external financing limit of the Welsh water authority so that even greater effort can be made to increase investment in the Welsh water industry. To take the example of current availability of capital, the Welsh water authority will require at least 30 years in which to construct sewage outfalls to the sea which comply with Department of the Environment criteria. It is vital for the tourist industry in Wales, at a time when the Government have cut regional financial assistance by £60 million this year, that such a programme of investment is radically speeded up.

It is little wonder that the Secretary of State for the Environment, in a reply that he gave me in the first week of December last year, was not prepared to accept the recommendations in paragraph 4.68 of the tenth report of the Royal Commission on Environmental Pollution. That paragraph recommended the setting of a date by which the recommendations of the Jeger working party on sewage disposal relating to discharges of crude sewage were to be implemented in full. It is bitterly disappointing for the people of Wales that the Government are not prepared, after talks with the water authority, to set a date for the implementation of that programme. The Government are once again ducking their responsibility by giving the Welsh water authority the task of forcing the Welsh people to pay for capital investment out of current revenues, while at the same time projecting their own sterile philosophy on to the shoulders of others.

I wish to give the Government their proper due. Their proposal has one major advantage—it is consistent. The consistency is borne out of the overwhelming confidence which the Government are generating daily in the hearts and minds of the people of Wales. That confidence relies heavily on the tenet that the Government must, at all costs, continue to pursue policies which accelerate the slide of Britain down the world economic order. Britain's economic standing in the world is going down, and the people of Wales are at least confident that the Government are pursuing the correct economic policies to continue that course.

An example of this consistent economic idiocy is that water, a free public good according to the economic textbooks, is about to become very expensive for the people of Wales. Therefore, I once again urge the Minister to consider carefully what the hon. Member for Tiverton and other Conservative and Labour Members have said, and withdraw these orders.

8.2 pm

Mr. John Wheeler (Westminster, North): At the outset, I wish to say that when the House divides, I shall vote against the Government. No hon. Member does that lightly or without careful consideration. In the discussions that I and other colleagues have had with my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) he has been the most courteous, considerate and careful of colleagues in spending both his time and energy endeavouring to explain the issue and the Government's position.

My vote tonight against the Government in no way reflects my hon. Friend's inadequacy in getting the case across. The issue is quite straightforward and has little to do with accounting practices or the return on assets. It is about straightforward politics. It is about the Government's central and major objective of containing inflation and ensuring that ratepayers receive good value for services provided as cheaply and efficiently as possible. Therefore, it is with great regret that I shall cast my vote against the Government.

My hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne said that the Government's objective is the containing of inflation, and I agree with that. Throughout my time in the House since 1979, I have voted consistently with the Government on their central economic policies on reducing inflation. I see that that is absolutely essential and in the best interests of the people of the United Kingdom. The Government's objective of seeking to secure wage increases of around 3 per cent., particularly in the public service, is also the right objective.

However, if the Government have the right objectives, how can we say that the water authorities should increase their charges by about 10 per cent.? How can we then say to the work force of Great Britain and to British commerce that their charges should be held? This is why the Government are so wrong in what they are proposing.

There are other aspects to the matter. Last night, the House had to decide about rate limitation. Throughout my time here, I have been critical of the minority of local authorities who have wilfully disregarded the interests of the poor, commerce, industry and the institutional ratepayers such as the Health Service, and have put up rates faster and higher, to the great damage to the community as a whole. The House, in its wisdom, has agreed rate limitations. If we support that principle, it is inconsistent then to vote to increase water charges. That is impossible, and as a matter of conscience, apart from any duty to my constituents in Westminster, North, I simply could not follow that contradiction. I think that I speak for many hon. Friends who will not be supporting the Government tonight, but who may not be as fortunate as I have been, Mr. Deputy Speaker, in catching your eye.

Alas, the Government are almost friendless on this issue. In the debate, one or two speeches have been in support of them, but even one of those had some limit in its support. The Government's friendlessness arises from not only the lack of support within the House and on the Conservative Benches, but from those voices outside the House whose opinion is so significant and who generally support the Government's policy and objectives. The CBI, the chambers of commerce and industry and the consultative councils for the water authorities are all against the Government. We know the opinion of the chairman of Thames water, and my comments about water authorities naturally relate to that authority as my constituency is in the Thames water authority area.

The Government's proposals remove from the management of Thames water, and perhaps the other authorities, the one plank that management has to encourage efficiency within its business. If there is to be no tangible gain of lower charges to the consumer of the water services, why should management and the employees of the water authorities work to achieve a higher standard of efficiency? The Government's proposals would seriously damage the ability of management in the water industry to manage.

Alas, the only comment that my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne made in his interesting speech with which I could find much favour was his suggestion that at some point denationalisation might be a possibility. I applaud that suggestion. Surely the answer is to remove the water industry with its extremely interesting, developing businesses with many opportunities both at home and overseas from the quagmire of the Treasury's public sector borrowing requirement and from all the other areas that constantly drag us into the whirlpool of dissent and confusion. I very much hope that my hon. Friend will be persuaded to heed the message that we cannot go on increasing charges without looking at fundamental principles.

I do not intend to discuss the return on assets. I am not an accountant. I cannot judge between the claims and statements of my hon. Friend and his excellent civil servants and the claims and statements of the chairman of the Thames water authority and his excellent employees. I do not know who is getting the best return on assets. I do not believe that to be a particularly relevant argument. The case is quite simple. We are saying to the public that we should keep inflation down. We are also saying that we should keep rates down. The public want that to be achieved. Therefore, the public cannot understand, nor will it understand, why the rates should go up.

Moreover, commerce and industry, which are seeking to hold their prices and make themselves competitive overseas, cannot understand this policy. The knock-on effects of putting up water charges to commerce and industry involve hundreds of millions of pounds. We should remember who are the big ratepayers. They are the London electricity board, the gas boards and the retail food industries. All of them pass on these charges to the consumer. One cannot even protect those who are on supplementary benefit. The poor always pay, even if it is only via the back pocket. Therefore, I join other hon. Members in suggesting to my hon. Friend that even at this late hour he should consider whether or not the Government ought to proceed with these orders. It will not do if significant groups of people are constantly ignored by the Government. The Government have many strengths. Their one weakness is that they do not listen well enough and hard enough to many of their own supporters and, perhaps more importantly, to the people of this country.

8.12 pm

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): I wish to pay one compliment to the Minister. I have found a cliché for him. One of his ministerial colleagues said recently that the water authorities would not be privatised. It appears that because of his open statement this afternoon the Minister has become a courteous assassin of that ministerial declaration by his colleague. The Minister will recognise that some months ago I suspected that privatisation was lurking in the background or in the wings. Nevertheless, that declaration was not made last Friday; it was made this afternoon.

The Government are prepared to sell almost anything. I have been racking my brains to discover what else they could find to sell. If the Government get rid of the water industry and of all the other nationalised industries, the best thing that we could then do would be to turn Great Britain into a limited company, stick it on to the Tokyo and New York stock exchanges and sell it off. The Government would then have completed the job. Everything would have gone.

It is nonsense to talk about the water industry in terms of its being a publicly owned asset that is up for sale to a certain group of city bankers or speculators on foreign stock exchanges. It just is not so. How are the Government going to do it? Are the water authority areas to be rearranged? They are quite arbitrary, in any event. We have heard that Wales sells its water to Birmingham, which in turn sells its water to the north-west. It is quite ludicrous. There ought in this land of ours to be some assets which belong to us all—air, water and, with a bit of luck, light and heat, but even those might be up for sale soon, so I must be careful about what I say.

We ought to consider the water industry in a realistic way. What are the Government seeking to do? By means of these orders they are seeking to reduce borrowing, for if they reduce borrowing there will be less pressure on the public sector borrowing requirement. One or two hon. Members who are accountants have spoken in this debate. Having heard what those hon. Members had to say, I am jolly glad that I am a lawyer and not an accountant. If a sewer has been lying under a road for 50 or 70 years, how can one put a notional figure on it and expect a financial return at the end of the year? To try to do so would be the height of absurdity.

Based upon SAP16—what a pity it is that we have to use initials instead of words; would it not be better to say standard accounting practice No. 16?—the Government are valuing the Thames water authority at about £4,425 million worth of assets. The Government are looking for a 1 per cent. return and therefore wish to raise an extra amount of money. Consequently, the rates are to go up this year by 12·4 per cent. In the north-west the rates are to go up by 12 per cent. Over the next three years the Thames water authority rate will go up by 29 per cent., while that in the north-west will go up by about 40 per cent. For what purpose? Who will pay? The ratepayers will pay.

We cannot get away from the fact that we are all taxed either as ratepayers or as householders. To use a rating term, the levy is based upon a notional rental value. Upon that basis a sum of money is levied upon one's property. Regardless of whether one uses a bucket or a tubful of water a day that property attracts the same levy. It does not matter whether one's income is £50 or £5,000 a week. On that property, the same amount of money will be levied.

It is a very unfair form of taxation. Rating always has been unfair. We are to allow the nine English authorities and the one Welsh authority to impose a levy at that kind of rate. We, the mere ratepayers, have no say. Those authorities are not accountable to us. They are run by people who have been appointed by Ministers. In the old days they were at least partly accountable to us. Before 1983 there was local authority input into the running of the water authorities. That is no longer so.

I would remind our courteous Minister that the Boston tea party, which was about taxation without representation, did not do King George very much good. I suggest that the Minister ought to take a leaf out of our history books and remember what might happen if he continues down this particular road. With great respect to him, by pursuing this policy he is doing neither us nor himself much good. The people who will have to pay are the ratepayers. The ratepayers include both the rich and the poor. The poor have no way of recouping these charges. We know that under the rules of the Department of Health and Social Security water authority payments have to be paid by these people. They have to reach into their own pockets.

If a notional profit is made, the Government will increase the amount of money in their coffers at the end of three years. That is the object of the exercise. The Minister is aware that at Question Time yesterday I asked him this very question. Hansard will show his reply. He said that he did not consider it to be a tax, but I think that everyone else recognises it to be one.

At the end of the day the public sector borrowing requirement will fall slightly and it will be said that more money is available for tax cuts. The poor, who will pay increased water charges with no relief, do not benefit from tax cuts, because they do not pay tax. Once again, the poor will finance the tax cuts of the not so poor. The poor will pay, and so will industry and commerce. The unit costs of products will increase and Britain will become slightly less competitive in world markets. We shall all become the losers. The Government seem hooked on the policy that even the air that we breathe must make a profit for someone. That policy does not produce a fair society. It does not produce the society which any of us wants.

Many hon. Members on both sides of the House accept that there are certain services that are fundamental to our way of life and are not for sale or profit. They believe that they should be for the use of everyone, at the most economic rate.

8.22 pm

Mr. Peter Fry (Wellingborough): I hope that the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) will forgive me if I do not respond to his speech. Instead, I shall take up some of the remarks which were made in the two speeches from the Government Benches which were in favour of the orders.

My hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) seems to defend the Government's case on the basis of some esoteric games that she played at Oxford university. I played games there in a rather more straightforward and simple manner and perhaps that is why I disagree with my hon. Friend in this instance.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) confirmed my fear that accountants are second only to lawyers in being able to make a mystery of any issue and to use language that the rest of us, alas, cannot often understand. If my hon. Friend were still in the Chamber, I would put it to him that if he is in favour of privatisation he would be in favour of water authorities borrowing their money on the open market and arranging their finances accordingly. If we are trying to move industries from one sector to the other, why should we make one set of rules for the public sector and another and different set for the private sector? We do our credibility no good when we do that.

I listened carefully to my hon. Friend the Minister because it is always worth doing so. I welcomed what he had to say about privatisation. We expected only a skilful rendering from my hon. Friend, but he reminded me of an experienced lawyer who chose to defend his client in a case in which he was not really sure of the merits. The lawyer felt that he had to put up a good show because of the high fees that his undoubted abilities entitled him to receive. I was not sure that the Minister was as convinced of the Government's case as he wished us to believe.

It is about time that other areas were discussed apart from those covered by the Thames water authority, the Wessex water authority and the Welsh water authority. My comments will be directed to the area covered by the Anglian water authority. I have been requested specifically by Wellingborough borough council to make a protest about the charges that will be imposed upon those living in the area. I received a deluge of pieces of paper from the Anglian water authority containing many different comments.

The chairman of the Anglian water authority stated:

"No one likes to see this level of increase but it is inevitable if we are to maintain investment to safeguard the standards of existing services and at the same time cope with the tremendous demands which are imposed on us by regional growth—the fastest in the country."

He continued:

"The Government has also decided that this should be paid for by increased charges rather than more borrowing. These decisions account for about one half of our charges increase and inflation on our costs for the remainder."

The income of the Anglian water authority is about £270 million but its operating costs are only about £115 million. It is having to find £95 million to cover depreciation and £55 million to cover the rate of return on assets fixed by the Government. Figures such as these illustrate why so many of my right hon. and hon. Friends are unhappy about the Government's proposals.

I was worried when I read the statement made by the Anglian water authority about the future. It states:

"The Government intends to continue to reduce the amount of money that water authorities like Anglia can borrow until they eventually become self-sufficient with customers paying for all capital investment directly through charges."

I do not think that there are many families or firms that could adhere to that sort of financial regime, however much they wished to do so. I suggest that my hon. Friend the Minister is asking the impossible and the unnecessary of water authorities. It is no wonder that the National Farmers Union at local and national levels is extremely worried about the proposed increased charges. The local county secretary of the area that I represent wrote to me as follows:

"The Order, if confirmed, will raise charges to some two to three times the current rate of inflation for the next three years, and perhaps longer, and will bear harshly upon consumers. Livestock producers and horticulturalists will be particularly oppressed by the measures".

That includes the especially hard-hit dairy industry, which is already reeling from the effects of the Common Market. Local authorities, farmers' organisations and the CBI are worried about the order, and so it is not surprising that constituency Members are concerned.

I thought that one of the benefits of increased charges would be the implementation of many much-needed capital projects in the east of England. Yet in the third piece of paper that the Anglian water authority sent me I read the following:

"A major financial crisis is threatening essential work on sea and river flood defence schemes to protect people and property in the Anglian region according to local land drainage committees. Government cutbacks in the amount of money which is made available for such projects, coupled with strict financial controls on the amount of money which Anglian Water can borrow to help finance capital schemes, means that all five land drainage committees face the prospect of vital schemes being delayed".

It seems that the increased charges will not result in the implementation of the capital projects that are needed. Anglia is the fastest growing part of the country and it has many new installations. It is odd that it is being asked to accept a system of depreciation that is based on assets being many years old. My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West suggested that an accounting system must be devised that reflects the difficulty of estimating the length of life of certain assets because it is so long. It is peculiar that the system that has been adopted shortens the period of depreciation rather than lengthening it. I hope that that will be explained when my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Wales replies.

Against this background it is not so surprising that many of us have become somewhat bemused by the Government's actions. It seems that the Government are saying that water authorities can no longer run their own affairs commercially, as we said at one time that we wanted them to do.

The backlog of capital projects is still too big. Charges are to go up at least by two-and-a-half times the rate of inflation. The enforced rate of return means an extra taxation on water.

I thought, perhaps naively, that the Government believed that we should ensure that nationalised industries are run and managed commercially and responsible for their own decisions. I believed that our first aim was to fight inflation. I also thought that we had a special concern for the lower paid who are in danger of being caught in the poverty trap.

Before Christmas I tabled a question to the Department of Health and Social Security to discover how many people were in receipt of rate rebate and therefore, by definition, not in receipt of supplementary benefit and without help with their water rates.

The Minister said today that 3 million people are assisted by supplementary benefit. The answer that I received was that 3,600,000 people receive rate benefit. That means that 5 million people, or one-tenth of our population, will have to meet the increase in water charges in full without any help.

Mr. Gow: I said that 3 millon households were involved.

Mr. Fry: The point is that more people will not be helped than will be helped.

I also asked the Department how much it would cost to operate a water rate rebate scheme. I regret that after many weeks I still await that information.

[Mr. Fry]

So despite my hon. Friend's eloquent explanation the position is unsatisfactory and not understood. It is not understood by local councils, by the farming community or by industry and commerce. Their attitude and mine is based not on an abstruse argument about accounting but on common sense. If one increases the price of anything above the inflation rate that increase causes inflation. The Government are shooting themselves in the foot. They are attacking their own policies.

Those of us who have supported the Government over local government reform are entitled tonight to say "If you want that continued support at least be consistent". Despite the great admiration that I have for my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction, I cannot, on behalf of my constituents, support the orders. Indeed, it is my duty to oppose them. I trust that my hon. Friends will join me in the Opposition Lobby tonight.

8.34 pm

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): I have enjoyed many of the speeches from both sides of the House tonight. I particularly enjoyed that of my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham). I agree with his exposition of the lunacy of the Government's privatisation and profit motivation, particularly as applied to water services, which are so important to the healthy lives of our people.

The Government are in hot water, not least with their own Back Benchers. The orders will result in an increase in water rates for everyone. If all Government Members realised that, they too would rebel against the Government.

The Treasury has brought the matter to the boil. The Thames water authority is primarily affected by the orders. I shall outline the objectives and achievements of that authority since it was created in October 1983.

I recently received a letter from the chairman of Thames water, Mr. Roy Watts, to whom I paid tribute last week. He said:

"Thames' objective including 'running the Authority as a major well-run business'. We were also exhorted to ensure that charges to customers were below inflation. My Board and executive have done that. We have substantially reduced costs, including a reduction of one-quarter in the number of managers and an equal amount of office property. We have restructured the Authority, adding the disciplines of profit loss and of the marketplace

And much more. So much, in fact, that we have produced a programme for 1985 which repays £18 million of due debt, introduces an enlarged capital programme which will accelerate projects and introduce cost-saving techniques, but which also holds down price rises to customers to 3 per cent., some two points below inflation. Equally important we have tested our programme against the best practices in the private sector. And our plans ensure continuing improvement in future years."

The Government are turning those policies on their head. They are sabotaging those beneficial policies.

The underhand tax rise in the Chancellor's autumn statement is to blame. The Minister is defending that underhand tax rise. He is imposing the Treasury's policy upon the water authorities by forcing the orders through. He could be described as the water industry's "Gowleiter".

The Minister said that there was a difference between water charges and water rates. The customers do not recognise such a difference because there is no practical difference. The Minister claimed that this was not a tax. If the Government compel water authorities to generate funds beyond those that are necessary and require them to pay them to the Treasury, that is a tax. It is like VAT on take-away fish and chips.

The Minister stressed current cost accounting. Roy Watts in his letter said:

"The Thames Board — a Board full of professional and business experience—is clear that such a basis for targeting is wrong in principle, wrong in application, generates excessive cash surpluses, and is inflationary."

The CBI — not an organisation which I would normally cite — believes that there are serious doubts about applying CCA to the water industry

"where long-life assets are concerned, and where the useful life is a subjective judgement; where the assets comprise basic infrastructure, and could not be sold; where the assets are never likely to be replaced but will be maintained at current cost, such as reservoirs . . . any comparison between water authority rates of return and those in the private sector is bound to be misleading . . . there is every reason to believe that the water authorities are already highly profitable enterprises compared with the private sector if a common method of appraisal is used."

The fallacy of using current cost accounting was exposed by Roy Watts in an interview that he gave to The Sunday Times, published on 20 January, in which he said:

"We believe that the current cost convention and other arguments used by the Government are a smokescreen for the real intention, which is to raise money for non-water purposes from my water customers."

In other words, it is a tax.

Mr. Freeman: Will the hon. Gentleman explain, for the benefit of hon. Members on this side of the House, what particular technical aspects of current cost accounting concern him most?

Mr. Cohen: I should have thought that the CBI's objections to it would have the hon. Gentleman's support. I would be happy to discuss the details of CCA with him, but hon. Members may think that a 15-minute speech is not the occasion for that.

The Minister said that the argument was about four categories of effort. One category to which he did not refer was that of efficiency, which surprised me coming from a Minister whose Government are always extolling the virtues of efficiency. The record of the Thames water authoriy is excellent — I doubt whether even Conservative Members would deny that—yet it is being penalised for its efficiency. The Government pay lip-service to the need for efficiency and value for money, but when the crunch comes they penalise those who give value.

The Thames water authority's plans show that the authority is acting in a prudent manner and would in 1985 repay £18 million of its debts. It would be debt-free by 1989 if it had its way. It is clear, however, that the Government want unjustified increases even on that rate of efficiency. Any surpluses that water authorities receive from high charges will go not to the consumer but straight into the Treasury. That is a tax all right.

There is opposition right across the political spectrum to what the Government are doing. Not just the Thames water authority but the water industry generally opposes the order. From the business point of view, the CBI said:

"The increases proposed for next year will add £100 million to business and industry's costs. They will hit certain industries such as food, chemicals, pharmaceuticals, textiles, brewing and paper, particularly hard. . .Such increases could threaten still more jobs at a time when industry is compelled to match the efforts of its international competitors."

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): My hon. Friend is dealing with an important aspect which, to be fair to Conservative Members, has also been raised by them. The North-West water authority has made it clear that, because it will not be permitted to use capital resources, the increases proposed will not only affect jobs in the area but will create hardship for many people, in particular the low-paid. That is a critical issue in this debate.

Mr. Cohen: I agree with my hon. Friend that the possible loss of jobs and the hardship that will be created are issues of paramount importance. I was citing the CBI's view of this legislation because that body is supposed to be a friend of the Government and to support their policies and strategies.

Many people will be adversely affected by the order, and I have received many letters to that effect from constituents, particularly those living on small incomes. The Minister has refused to allow rebates to people in that situation. There will be unnecessarily high water rates bills. In the Thames water authority area, for example, there will be an increase of 12 per cent. rather than of only 3 per cent. in 1985-86.

There will be great anger in March and April of this year when bills arrive through people's letter boxes. It should be made clear to the public on those bills that the Government's surcharge is to blame. The Government seem determined to press ahead with their unpopular strategy, come hell or high water. The House should ensure that it sinks without trace.

8.46 pm

Mr. Martin Stevens (Fulham): I apologise to the House for not having attended the earlier part of the debate. I have been upstairs in a Standing Committee.

Had I been in the Minister's shoes, I would have made exactly the same decision in this matter as he made. I chide him, however, by adding that I would have handled the announcement and implementation of the decision differently, for I feel that his handling of it contributed to the response of the Thames water authority.

In speaking about that authority, I am sorry to be on the opposite side to my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler). The Thames water authority claims that it has been running the organisation as a private company, and it is generally agreed that its management has been extremely efficient. I have known Roy Watts for many years, since in my capacity as chairman of Annual Reports Limited I produced British Airways' annual report, and I know him to be a man of exceptional ability. However, it is fair to probe a little his claim that the accounts of the Thames water authority match those of a private company.

I hope that the Minister will ask him bluntly whether, in his opinion, the rate of depreciation proposed in the authority's figures is adequate. I do not think that it is. One can argue that because of the higher quality of the infrastructure, and because Thames has been experimenting with methods of rebuilding sewers which do not require the digging of holes, there may be detailed questions to ask about the way in which the current cost accounting system has been applied. Even if we take that into account, Roy Watts would be bound to confess that his level of depreciation is inadequate.

The second point that I should like to consider in Thames water's accounts is its borrowing. I never like to contradict the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen). He said that under present plans Thames water would have repaid its debt by 1989. The true timetable under its present plan is 15 years. I do not believe that many accountants employed by a private company would welcome such a long loan. If my hon. Friend were to press Roy Watts on that point he would accept that there is merit in the proposition, in a nation that is still overborrowed despite all our efforts, that that rate of borrowing should be paid off more rapidly than the authority was planning.

Thames water is annoyed by the fact that it will have to go on paying £60 million a year even after the debt has been paid in three years' time. It does not pay corporation tax. Water is zero-rated. I hope that my hon. Friend will consider the matter in the coming month to see whether it will be possible to arrive at a slightly more gentle arrangement. To be asked to continue repaying debts after they have been settled might have the same result—I believe that it is called negative debt repayment or some such term.

Mr. Gow: Negative EFL.

Mr. Stevens: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. That is rather like negative recruitment, as it used to be called when I was a business man. It always gives rise to understandable resentment.

There is the issue of the corporation's asset value.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Does the hon. Member agree that what is unique about Thames water is that none of its capital expenditure is being financed from borrowing, unlike other water authorities? It will therefore inevitably be reducing its borrowing requirement and borrowed money. It already has less than any other water authority in England.

Mr. Stevens: The hon. Gentleman is right. Every Conservative Member has commended Thames water for the admirable way that it has carried out its business. I do not belittle that achievement. It is the only one of 10 regional water authorities in England and Wales conducting its business without borrowing.

When we talk about asset value, we return to our old friend—current cost accounting. It is right that my hon. Friend the Minister should remind Roy Watts that it was his former finance director who originally proposed that that system of accounting should be used by the 10 regional water authorities. Price Waterhouse, which is not wholly unknown, although not as distinguished as the partnership to which my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) belongs, but which is nevertheless a highly regarded firm of accountants, agreed that that system was the best in the circumstances. At this moment, a working party is reviewing the method of accounting used throughout the 10 water authorities. The present finance director of Thames water is the chairman of that review body.

If Thames water is denationalised, which is what I believe its directors desire, how much will it be worth? The value of such an undertaking will depend upon its profitability. We may argue that my hon. Friend the Minister's profitability requirement is insufficient to produce a £4 billion asset value which the current cost accounting system has generated, but if I were doing his job I should want to ensure that if that asset were sold it would attract as much money as possible. I am sure that that point has been made already today.

[Mr. Stevens]

If I were to tell my constituents that we are protecting them against a water price increase of something under 2p a day but that the price that they will have to pay for that will be the loss of £1 billion or more, I think that they would agree that the national interest is best protected by the profit requirements that my hon. Friend has imposed.

Mr. Loyden: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that some industries are intensive water users. The car industry is one example, and there are many others. Has he taken into account the fact that if these increases are imposed they will have consequences for jobs and the economy. A broader view must be taken, we must get away from current cost accounting. Like it or not, water is something that the state must provide for domestic and industrial consumers.

Mr. Stevens: I think that the figure for trade and industry is £100 million. That is 100th part of 1 per cent. on inflation.

We must accept, as my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North so cogently put it, that the proposals are an extremely difficult package to sell. We cannot enter the House, as all Conservative Members did after the general election, on the ticket that we shall cut public spending and borrowing and ensure that our national assets pay their way, and then start moaning when we have the difficult job of implementing that proposition. My hon. Friend the Minister is carrying out his job manfully. I shall be happy to be a humble member of his following.

8.57 pm

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): I am pleased to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham (Mr. Stevens). Apart from his final remarks, his contribution showed that those who have taken part in the debate, at least on the Conservative side, are divided into two categories — those who have taken the academic accounting or "Oxford" approach, and those of us who like to think that our feet are firmly on the ground and who see the matter in simpler terms and certainly in political terms.

Having sat through the whole debate, I still do not really know what current cost accounting is. If I tried to cover up my ignorance, my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) would no doubt shoot me down by asking questions as effectively as he did to the Opposition. Moreover, I do not begin to understand what negative external financing limits are. I am absolutely sure, however, that my constituents share my ignorance of those technicalities and will see the matter as I see it.

What will hit my constituents in a couple of weeks' time will be the rate demand from the South-West water authority telling them that if they are domestic ratepayers they face an increase of roughly 12 per cent.—way over double the rate of inflation. When they ask me to explain the reasons for that, I might offer to send them a copy of the speech made by my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham and hope that it will persuade them, but I know that they will not be persuaded any more than I am. I regret to say that I was also not persuaded by my hon. Friend the Minister, despite all his charm and courtesy and an excellent glass of muscadet last night—[Interruption.] I apologise if I have breached some awful convention which Back Benchers are expected to observe. However that may be, I remain unconvinced by my hon. Friend's argument.

I take the example that I mentioned to my hon. Friend last night — the little old lady living on the Lizard peninsula in my constituency. The South-West water authority tells me that a person with an average house, if such a house exists, will be paying £104·59 per year in the coming financial year — a much higher figure, incidentally, than the national average of £80 given by my hon. Friend the Minister—so if my little old lady on the Lizard lives in an average house she will face an increase of £11·11. To Members of Parliament, particularly Opposition Members, that may not seem a great deal of money, but to my little old lady, probably living alone on a pension, it is a lot of money and she cannot obtain any rebate.

My next comment would be addressed to my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) if she were present. On the basis of a holiday in the south-west—we are, of course, delighted to have her as one of the emmets — she launched into an attack on the South-West water authority. If the South-West water authority needs to be attacked, Members from Devon and Cornwall have no hesitation in doing so. We do not require the assistance of my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South, especially when her comments are based on ignorance of the situation.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): The hon. Gentleman is making a very spirited riposte to his hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie). Has he observed the usual parliamentary courtesy of advising her of his intention to do so?

Mr. Harris: Yes, of course. My charming hon. Friend came and sat down just across the Gangway and said that she hoped she had not offended me. I assured her that she had not offended me, but told her that I might make a passing reference to her speech in my own contribution. The hon. Gentleman may rest assured about that.

My hon. Friend the Minister and my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South both referred to increased investment. I would go along with that package if I could put my hand on my heart and tell my constituents that the awful Victorian sewerage system in St. Ives town, which has polluted beaches and damaged tourism, and which attracted international publicity two years ago, would be renewed as a result of the Government's proposals, but I cannot do that—I only wish that I could.

I have made inquiries of the South-West water authority and I understand that there is to be no great advancement of the investment programme of the authority for sewerage and water supply schemes. Much of the extra money will be spent on meeting the proper demands of central Government in connection with implementing the control of pollution legislation. There may be a spin-off for St. Ives and for the tourist industry, but the increase must be seen against a background of drought last year and of antiquated sewerage systems. People in the south-west ask, "When is something going to happen?" I do not think that the increase will result in much acceleration in normal capital programmes.

I have spoken for long enough. With the greatest reluctance, I have to say that I shall not be with my hon. Friend the Minister in the Division Lobby tonight.

9.6 pm

Mr. Roger Freeman (Kettering): It is a pleasure for me to follow my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr.

Harris). I take a different view. I shall support the Government in the Lobby tonight. I should like, first of all, briefly to explain why.

Once we had accepted the medium-term financial strategy and the autumn statement, it was crystal clear some three months ago that water rates would have to rise in the coming financial year. One cannot wish the end and then not will the means.

My hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives conjured up the proverbial old lady who asks each hon. Member, "Why are my water rates going up?" In the Anglian region the rise is to be 12·5 per cent. One must be honest and explain in simple language that the Government are determined to reduce the aggregate external financing limit of the nationalised industries. One must explain that in simple language, and explain the need for increased capital expenditure. The reasons have been made clear. It then becomes clear that charges must inevitably rise—that the self-financing ratio of water authorities must rise. We must be honest in explaining the background to our constituents, and we must be honest with ourselves in deciding whether the water rate increases were inevitable. I believe that they were, and I shall support the Government.

I have two important questions to ask my hon. Friend the Minister. First, how can water authorities judge investment programmes in future? My hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction will remember admitting several months ago that perhaps, in the case of the Kielder project, there was over-provision. He was not the Minister responsible. There are examples of capital investment projects in the water industry that in my humble judgment were not properly thought through, and cannot be adequately justified today.

I look forward to reading the Watts committee report on metering, which is due at the end of March. I suggest that the capital expenditure figures that my hon. Friend the Minister gave are questionable. I do not believe that any industry can justify such a significant capital investment programme. My hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives said that the only justification for capital investment was need. That is not a satisfactory answer. The correct way in which to measure capital investment in the water industry is to examine the price elasticity of demand, as is done in the electricity and gas industries, and any other utility. That can be measured only if the consumer is allowed to make the decision on the basis of price. The correct way in which to measure capital investment is to use a universal metering scheme.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will argue with the Treasury, once again, that the rules which govern the involvement of private sector capital in public sector projects should be revised. The water industry has capital investment of £200 million to £300 million. In some water authorities, a higher level of capital expenditure is justified, but it is not possible for them to carry out their capital investment programme because they are constrained by Treasury limits. If private sector capital could be introduced in the construction of, for example, a pumping station or a reservoir, we might not be faced with these substantial water rate increases.

My hon. Friend should ask the Treasury to think again about the imposition of these rules. One way out of the impasse might be to ask the Treasury to take professional advice on how to take a view about the extent of contingent liability that will fall on the taxpayer if the public sector projects in which private sector capital is introduced fail or do not live up to the original promises and predictions. The Treasury says that it represents the taxpayer, who will have to pick up the bill, thus making it difficult for private sector capital to come in on such projects.

I hope that what I have said has been constructive. I encourage my hon. Friends who doubt their ability to persuade their constituents about the applicability of or the justification for the increases to think back to the autumn statement debate and their commitment to the medium-term financial strategy.

9.12 pm

Sir Nicholas Bonsor (Upminister): It gives me little pleasure to speak today for two reasons. First, I have an extremely painful toothache and, secondly, I must oppose my hon. Friend the Minister's proposals.

I shall be brief because most of the issues that I intended to cover have already been dealt with. I should like to associate myself wholly with what my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) and my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) said. My hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North dealt with the details of why the Government's proposal is not satisfactory and the political reasons why we cannot accept it.

I cannot see that current cost accounting is the right way in which to approach the valuation of capital in an industry such as the water authorities. Their assets consist largely of sewerage pipes, water pipes and tunnels, some of which have been there for as long as 180 years. The Thames water authority covers most of my constituency, and it says that the valuation put on its pipes is £4·5 billion. It is not reasonable to assess the return that the authority is expected to make on its annual expenditure by referring to asset values which have been plucked by that weird accounting process. I am no expert, and do not propose to go into the details of it for fear of tripping over myself. There is no reason for putting a figure of £4,500 million on the assets of Thames water authority.

A more realistic way to assess whether the authority is operating sensibly and profitably is to examine the cash cost of the operation and the returns that it is receiving over VAT, and to see whether it is making an adequate trading profit on its turnover. The authority's cash operating expenditure for 1985 will be £292 million. The Government's current cost accounting process demands that it should also cover a depreciation figure of £145 million and an additional profit of £68 million. That means that the return that it must generate is more than two thirds as much again as the operating costs which it incurs.

I am not a business expert, but I run a small farm. To expect that sort of return on that sort of annual turnover seems to be a wholly unrealistic way of assessing a proper return from the industry. It is grossly unfair of the Government to attack the water authorities, which, as my hon. Friend the Minister acknowledged, have done a tremendous amount of work and achieved tremendous success in pulling the industry round and making it more efficient and effective during the past few years. To say that the industry is not returning an adequate figure because it is only 1 per cent. of the £4,500 million figure on the current cost accounting is unfair. The asset value and turnover are two reasons why I find it impossible to support my hon. Friend the Minister, and why I must vote against the proposals.

[Sir Nicholas Bonsor]

The way in which the accelerated repayment of loans is being demanded from water authorities is serious. Thames water authority was to repay its Government debt over 10 years. That has now been reduced to three years. Its annual repayment this year was to be £20 million, but under the Government order it will have to pay £60 million. My hon. Friend denied that that constitutes taxation, and said that he was clawing back money that the Government had lent. I do not accept that, but even if it were so it is an unreasonable banking practice for a bank suddenly to tell a continuing industry, "I am sorry but the plan that we previously agreed to repay the debt over a substantial number of years will have to be scrapped, and we demand the full repayment down to zero borrowing within three years". That is what the Government are doing in their role as lender in this operation. That is an unreasonable way to approach the business.

That sums up the two points that I wished to make in addition to what has been said. It is politically impossible for the Government to rate cap local authorities, to fight inflation, and to try to keep costs down as a primary objective in our strategy — which all Conservative Members fully endorse—and then to increase by 10 per cent. a basic cost that will hit at the poorest section of our community and cause great anxiety and trouble to those who can only just afford to find such a payment.

9.18 pm

Mr. Robert Jackson (Wantage): I join Conservative Members in congratulating my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction on the patience and courtesy that he has shown before and during this debate. I wish that the substance of his argument was as impeccable as the form of his presentation this afternoon. I am one of those hon. Members who cannot find sufficient justification in what the Government have said for voting in favour of the orders. Having heard the lecture that my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) recommends that we give to our proverbial old ladies, I believe that they will not be satisfied by what he said either.

I am worried not only about the impact of what the Government propose to do this year, but about the danger in future years. I regret very much the fact that my hon. Friend the Minister could not repudiate the suggestion that the principle of a 5 per cent. rate of return will be applied to the water authorities on all their assets in the future.

I do not wish to repeat arguments that have been made by others. I welcome the Minister's statement, for which he has not been given sufficient credit so far in the debate, that the privatisation of water authorities is under active review. The Conservative party believes that, in general, private enterprise manages better than the public sector. We belieye this, not because we think that managers in the public sector are less competent, but because we have concluded from hard experience that the public sector is so constituted, in terms of parliamentary accountability and Treasury financial discipline, as to be a peculiarly difficult environment for commercial enterprise. The case that we are discussing today demonstrates that point fully.

That being so, the House should draw two main conclusions from this debate about water rates. First, there will inevitably continue to be many economic activities in the public sector which cannot be privatised for various reasons, or at any rate cannot be privatised immediately. Therefore, we must not let up on the effort to make the public sector a more satisfactory environment for commercial enterprise. We must not neglect our continuing responsibility to those who run the nationalised industries, to those who consume their products, and to the workers in those industries. In that context, the proposals that we are considering are unsatisfactory.

The second conclusion that I draw from the debate is that the Government's review of the privatisation of water authorities which the Minister announced today should come to an early and positive conclusion. I need not remind the House that the Chancellor of the Exchequer says that he needs £2 billion-worth of asset sales each year. Although the Thames water authority is certainly not worth £4·5 billion, as the Minister claims, it is probably worth between a quarter and a half of the amount that the Chancellor requires.

Mr. Gow: I did not claim that. It was claimed by the chairman and the director of finance of Thames water authority, who put that figure on the assets. Of course, the figure was confirmed by the authority's auditors.

Mr. Jackson: The question whether current cost accounting should be applied to nationalised industries, especially to the water authorities, in valuing their assets is one issue. A separate issue is the rate of return that should be expected from them. That is what we are concerned with tonight. To return to my point, the Government will not obtain £4·5 billion if they sell the Thames water authority, but the proceeds from such a sale would go some way to meeting the Chancellor's requirement. That is one reason for considering it seriously.

Of course, it has been said, and it is true, that water is a natural monopoly—but there are ways of overcoming the problem. In many countries, water services are not in the public sector. Mayor Chirac of Paris has just privatised the water supplies to that city. We should study all such examples. In the case of British Telecom we have organised sophisticated mechanisms for the regulation of a monopoly, and those mechanisms could easily be applied to the operation of water authorities.

I am afraid that, if such mechanisms were applied, they might have the effect of preventing the future private owners of water authorities from behaving towards their consumers as the present "owners" now propose.

9.23 pm

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): Like my hon. Friends the Members for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) and for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor), it gives me no pleasure to disagree with my hon. Friend the Minister and the Government on this matter. It will give me even less pleasure to vote against my party for the first time in 11 years, but I was sent to Parliament with a duty to represent my constituents' interests and to use my judgment in assessing the issues that come before the House. Doing both those things, I must say that my hon. Friend's proposals are wrong.

I am strengthened in that judgment by the seven consumer consultative committees set up to safeguard the interests of the 11 million customers of the Thames water authority. All those committees are against the proposals and the orders.

Many of the arguments against the orders have been well rehearsed, and I do not intend to detain the House by going over familiar ground. But my hon. Friend speaks of increasing capital expenditure and reducing borrowings. He knows perfectly well that the Thames water authority has been increasing and is planning to increase its capital expenditure, and to do so from revenue. There is a clear and perfectly respectable economic argument for telling a water authority that it should invest more in capital projects, and we all know the reason for that. But to go on to say that it must not borrow money to do it because that will increase the PSBR, that its capital investment must be from revenue and that it must increase its water rates to enable it to do so is another matter.

Of course, the Thames water authority does invest from revenue, and it plans to continue to repay such debts as it has. Therefore, it would be reasonable to assume that the requirement to increase the rate should not apply to it. But, in that case, says my hon. Friend, it must repay its existing debt more quickly, so it will still have to put its water charges up. I do not think that that is equitable or sensible. I share the view of my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster that it is barely ethical, and certainly there is no economic justification for it.

I do not intend to go into the detail of the argument on current cost accounting, except to say that it seems to me impossible to draw a comparison between the assets of something like British Airways and those of the Thames water authority. The sort of figures that have been produced are hypothetical and unrealistic. I understand that current cost accounting is widely considered to be a very unsatisfactory system. It is little used outside the state industries and it certainly is not appropriate for the water industry.

My hon. Friend says that he has dealt with the authorities in an even-handed fashion, but he has admitted on several occasions that Thames water authority is in a different position from the other authorities. It is different by virtue of its financial circumstances and of the state of its assets. So why is it necessary to treat the Thames water authority in exactly the same way as the other authorities and to impose a wholly unnecessary financial burden on the 11 million customers of the authority, including my constituents?

I hope that, even at this stage, my hon. Friend will take the advice of my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) and others and consider again the effect of these orders. I put it to him that he should withdraw the order in its present form and re-table it, without involving the Thames water authority in its requirements. If he does not do so, if he intends to proceed with the order as at present drawn, I cannot vote in favour of it and will have to vote against it.

Mr. Christopher Murphy (Welwyn Hatfield): Even at this late stage, recognising that it might be difficult for my hon. Friend to take up arms against this reservoir of troubles and by opposing end them, I appeal to him nevertheless to reconsider. I deeply regret that I must add to the very evident ripples of discontent with an alternative Oxford view, for I cannot support the order as it stands tonight. However, I welcome the Government's commitment on privatisation of the water industry, as I have previously welcomed the inquiry into water metering.

Mid-Hertfordshire has the benefit of a combination of water company—in the main the Lea Valley, but in part the Colne valley—and water authority, that of Thames. Charging to the consumer is therefore also a combination, approximately 50 per cent. being the consequence of company as water supplier and 50 per cent. that of authority as sewage disposer. Without the intervention of Government, the net result would have been an increase in overall charges of probably just under the rate of inflation. Now the signs are that the consumer will be faced with approximately double that figure. I fully appreciate the anxiety about the need for an adequate return on public investment, because the taxpayer must be protected. However, I hope that the anxiety expressed by my constituents will equally be appreciated. They are also water rate payers, and they also expect protection.

The Government have been well advised to seek far greater efficiency from the water industry and a far more commercial approach. The Government have been ill advised to act so that such gains for the consumer are overtaken by what amounts to a tax on water. The order should now be withdrawn and a bridge over these troubled waters be found. The central policy objective of ending, not adding to, inflation must be adhered to. Having dipped a toe, my hon. Friend has surely found the temperature somewhat lukewarm!

9.30 pm

Mr. Roy Hughes (Newport, East): We have had a rather longer debate than originally anticipated, but the basic fact remains that these two orders are essentially part and parcel of a Government exercise to increase the cost of water quite unnecessarily. Needless to say, domestic consumers throughout England and Wales, let alone business interests, are not very pleased.

The issue has been spotlighted by the courageous stand taken by Mr. Roy Watts, the chairman of the Thames water authority, who has voiced his concern in the columns of The Times and elsewhere. Nevertheless, this is not confined to the area covered by the Thames authority and applies equally to the 10 water authorities throughout England and Wales.

As the National Farmers Union pointed out:

"It is wrong that what is effectively a tax is to be levied on an indispensable product provided by a monopoly supplier."

Likewise, the CBI pointed out that it would constitute an additional cost burden, and added:

"It could threaten still more jobs".

With 3 million to 4 million unemployed, I would have thought that it was time that the Government gave all their attention to what is perhaps the most important question of all.

The Government's policy towards water has been spawned over a number of years. What was once essentially a local government service has been taken over. All board members throughout the country are now appointed by Whitehall. Since the late 1970s there have been successive restrictions on capital spending, and by 1981 water authorities were committed to current cost accounting. It is noticeable that British Telecom switched from this system of accountancy back to historic cost accountancy as soon as it became a private enterprise concern. There must be a moral in that.

The 1985-86 target for the Welsh water authority is 1·45 per cent. Presumably that will go up to 1·7 per cent. next year and 1·9 per cent. the year after. I confess that those figures look modest. With this arcane system of accountancy, they constitute a considerable burden. It means that the present generation is being asked to pay off debt far more quickly than necessary. When a waterworks is built to last 50 to 100 years, how can one justify taking all that money from people who are living today when the waterworks will benefit people who are not yet born? The idea, of course, is to have a regular annual surplus of funds to flow back to the Treasury.

I was interested in the minor altercation that took place earlier between the Minister and his right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) over charging procedures, among other things. The Minister indicated that the right hon. Member for Guildford had served in the Government in 1973 when the Water Bill went through Parliament. My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) pointed out to me that in the debate on 2 May 1973 the late Mr. Graham Page, the then Minister for Local Government and Development, gave clear promises that consultation would take place with all manner of interested parties. In practice, we know that there has been little or no consultation with the consumer bodies, and certainly no agreement with them. It has been apparent in the debate that the Government have had little or no consultation, and certainly no agreement, with their Back Benchers.

We know that in other public utilities—for instance, gas and electricity — prices have been increased unnecessarily again. However, the difference is that a change in the consumption of water has little effect because the charges for many consumers are based on rateable value.

Then there is the contradiction which the hon. Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) pointed out. On the one hand the Government are pressing local authorities to hold down the rates—and many Conservative Members support the Government in that respect—while on the other they are driving up water charges, which are also based on rateable value. The hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry) put it clearly when he said that in his view the Government were shooting themselves in the foot. What is more, there is no system of rebate for the less well off. Many people will suffer considerable hardship as a result of the measures, and no satisfactory answer was given by the Minister in opening the debate.

The Government's policy has an element of farce about it. Somebody has suggested that the next move might be value added tax on sewage disposal, which is perhaps the biggest take-away business of all. What a ridiculous position the Government are getting themselves into. Listening to the remarks of the hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris), I feel that it will need more muscadet to convince even the Government's own Back Benchers.

I know from correspondence that I have received from individuals in my constituency that the Welsh water authority has cut its labour force to the bone. For the forthcoming year, it had hoped to propose an increase in line with the retail prices index. Now, directly as a result of the Government's measures, water charges in Wales for the next three years will go up by 30 per cent. Other authorities throughout the country will make similar increases.

I should have thought that a Government must be pretty heartless to increase the price of water, which is such a basic commodity. There have been ridiculous forms of taxation throughout history. Pitt introduced the window tax, which was virtually a tax on light and air, to finance the Napoleonic wars. The Prime Minister has often lectured us on Victorian values, but she seems now not to be satisfied with that and wants to go back to Georgian times.

Water in Wales, as the Under-Secretary of State for Wales knows, is an emotional subject. We have abundant supplies and our people can never understand why they have to pay such an exorbitant price for water. My hon. Friend the Member for Gower (Mr. Wardell) pointed out eloquently the increased burden that will continue to be put on the whole of western Europe. How can any Welsh Minister go along with such proposals? The chairman of Thames water has made a principled stand. His lead should be followed and the Government forced to change course.

9.41 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Wyn Roberts): We have heard speeches from 18 Back-Bench Members, from constituencies that lie in all parts of England and Wales. That alone reflects the fact that the two orders that we are debating apply to all water authorities in England and Wales. That is a significant point. Recent articles in the press have concentrated on the effect on the finances of the Thames water authority of the Government's target for the return on assets. In fact, the Government's policy is consistent for all 10 water authorities. In raising the target from 1 per cent. on average to 1·4 per cent. on average, the Government are generating additional funds for all authorities, enabling each to undertake additional investment and to make some contribution to the reduction in public borrowing.

Over the past few weeks, we have heard sincere cries from Labour Members that there should be more investment in the water industry, as in other forms of infrastructure. I am astonished to hear them playing down that call for investment tonight. Each authority is being enabled to make some contribution to the reduction in public borrowing; that is a cause that is dear to the hearts of many Conservative Members.

As the policy applies to all 10 water authorities, so it affects all their consumers. In one way or another, nearly every man, woman and child in England and Wales is a customer of a water authority and so is financially affected by these orders. But these orders affect the whole population in another way. Everyone is affected by the management of the national economy. We are all taxpayers and have a responsibility for what public bodies and the Government borrow. The debate on these orders reflects that interest, too — our interest in sound economic management and the proper control of public expenditure. The debate has been about the Government's resolution of the competing claims of taxpayers and consumers. However, let me make it quite clear that water authorities are not consumer co-operatives and never have been.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Roberts: I have many points to answer and I would ask the hon. Gentleman to forgive me.

Some hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), who has just tried to intervene, the right hon. Member for Halton (Mr. Oakes), the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry) and the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen), have argued that water authorities will be required under the orders to raise more money than they need, that this is taxation by the back door and, by implication, that this is an abuse of monopoly. The Government reject that view. We are of course sensitive to the consideration that water supplies and the other services provided by the water authorities are vital to public health and that they are provided on a monopoly basis.

Of course we cannot permit the customer to be overcharged for these services, but I must remind the House of what my hon. Friend the Minister said in his speech:

"Our policy for the nationalised industries and the policy of the Water Act 1973 is that water authorities should make a reasonable return on their net assets."

The rates of return which are specified in the orders we are debating are in all cases less than 2 per cent. By any reckoning that is not an unreasonable rate of return. Therefore, I argue that the question of taxation does not arise. There would only be an abuse of monopoly power at the point where an unreasonable return was to be exacted.

We are debating the fifth order of this kind and have never previously been accused of using orders for taxation purposes. It is quite a novel approach to this kind of order. Other hon. Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor), asked why a Government who are prepared to cap local government rates are at the same time setting targets for water authorities that will require them to increase their charges.

As we all know, the water authorities are quite separate from local government. They have been separate since 1974, when the local authorities were reorganised under the Local Government Act 1972 and when the water services were reorganised under the Water Act 1973. Water authorities have kept their spending under control, consistent with the Government's public expenditure requirements. As my hon. Friend the Minister said in his opening speech, since 1981 water authorities have controlled their operating costs and, indeed, have reduced their operating and manpower costs year by year in response to the Government's objectives for the management of the public sector and the control of public expenditure.

With controls over capital and current expenditure established, it is possible, as it is also necessary, both to increase water authorities' targets and to reduce water authorities' borrowing. The result is to increase self-financing and the proportion of their expenditure met from charges.

Local government presents an entirely different picture. Many local authorities have been sedulous over the years in controlling their expenditure and in seeking to make it efficient, economical and effective, but others seem to regard spending as a sign of virtue. As a result, the Government have had to introduce this series of measures to contain local government expenditure. That has been done by means of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980, the Local Government Finance Act 1982 and most recently the Rates Act 1984. It was essential for the Government to keep their economic strategy on course — to control public spending and reduce inflation, particularly as it affects industry and commerce.

Where local authorities had not been responding by reining back expenditure to the constraints of the block grant, target and penalty system, we had no alternative but to seek Parliament's approval to placing a limit on the amount that they could raise from their ratepayers.

I see no inconsistency with what we are doing in the water industry and in local government with its special problems. Within the framework of the Water Act 1973, the water authorities have provided and developed their services consistent with the public expenditure policies of the Government of the day.

Mr. Simon Hughes: If it is part of the Government's policy to reduce costs for commerce and business by reducing rates and thereby holding down inflation, surely that is not consistent with their policy of increasing the costs of commerce and business by increasing water rates and thereby increasing inflation.

Mr. Roberts: My hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction has dealt with the target achievement and its effect on inflation. The hon. Gentleman's argument about costs for commerce and industry has been advanced by the CBI. I remind him and others that the CBI was among those who called for higher investment in the water industry, especially in the document entitled "Fabric of the Nation".

The hon. Member for Perry Barr appeared in an article on the front page of The Times this morning and appeared in "The World At One" as a result of his "discovery" in the Library, of all places, of a document entitled "Nationalised Industries Legislation: Consultation Proposals". Reference has been made, either directly or indirectly, to this by a number of hon. Members, including the hon. Members for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien) and for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) and by my hon. Friend the Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson). Better informed Members than the hon. Member for Perry Barr will know that the document has been available and widely circulated since 20 December, when my right hon. and learned Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury announced in a written answer that he was placing a copy in the Library. He tells me that there was consultation for months before 20 December.

The proposals apply to water authorities along with 17 other industries. Among the proposals is one that the Government should introduce legislation to empower industries to set up subsidiaries under the Companies Act and to transfer to them property rights and liabilities. This would enable industries to carry out their activities through Companies Act companies. We say that this may or may not be a prelude to privatisation.

As far as that discovered document is concerned, general enabling legislation is being considered and we are still at the consultative stage. It is consistent with the Government's view that activities of state-owned businesses should be transferred to the private sector where this makes commercial and practical sense.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop rose——

Mr. Roberts: I shall come to the issue raised by my hon. Friend in his speech.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: But will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Roberts: I shall take up my hon. Friend's remarks when I come to the relevant part of my speech.

[Mr. Roberts]

The setting up of Companies Act company subsidiaries to water authorities is one of a number of possible ways of bringing a measure of private sector participation into the operations of water authorities. There is no question of setting up a private company to control water pollution. As my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction said, we must have a regulatory mechanism to prevent the abuse of monopoly.

The Companies Act subsidiary company is not necessarily the best option. It is too early to discuss what the options might be. I go no further than to say that we shall examine the possibilities.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) suggested that the water authorities' assets are really liabilities. In that remark he recognised the investment needs to which other hon. Members referred. However, my hon. Friend is wrong to conclude that it is therefore wrong to value and account for assets. Water mains and sewers deteriorate and provision must be made for their replacement. They will be replaced at today's or tomorrow's prices, not at yesterday's prices. That is why current cost accounting is needed. Values are based on the analysis of recent contract prices.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) rightly reminded us that the possibility of over-provision — because we have improved methods of renovation and some items may not need to be replaced —has been recognised——

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Can you confirm that under Standing Orders the debate does not have to finish until 11.30? The Minister does not have to gabble as if the debate must end at 10 pm. Is that correct?

Mr. Speaker: That is entirely correct.

Mr. Roberts: As I was saying——

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: My hon. Friend referred to what is common in state-owned industries. Is he aware that we are not talking about state-owned industries? The water authorities are not state-owned.

Mr. Roberts: I never said that they were state-owned, but they are quasi-state-owned. They are publicly owned.

The 40 per cent. abatement factor was reviewed by Price Waterhouse and it gave its opinion, to which reference has been made. A later opinion can also be quoted—that of Professor Carsberg, now the director general of Oftel, who reported on CCA in the water industry in 1983. His report

"supports water authorities in their use of current cost accounting and commends their skill in using it. . . Strictly defined historical cost numbers are not available: to obtain them would involve the use of procedures even less reliable than those required for the measurement of current cost".

This has been a far-reaching debate, covering even more than the four issues that my hon. Friend referred to in his opening speech, but at this very end of the debate the issue is whether the public are best served by the implementation of the orders that we have before us, or by abandoning them in response to the Opposition's prayer.

The Opposition's argument falls because, on the one hand, they cry out for more investment in the water industry, and, on the other, they are not prepared to will the means, except by their usual, thoughtless profligate universal remedy—increased public borrowing. It is the remedy to which they always resort, like addicts to their fix, and it is a fix that does no good for them or, in the end, for the people of Britain.

The Government's position and that of their supporters on the Benches behind me has been clear and constant —[Interruption.]—ever since we approved the public expenditure White Paper. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) in that I cannot see how any of my hon. Friends who approved that White Paper can oppose these orders, which are associated with it. There can be no turning back on this issue. [Interruption.] There can be no turning back tonight, and I commend the orders to the House.

Question put and negatived.

WATER AUTHORITIES (RETURN ON ASSETS)

Question put,

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Water Authorities (Return on Assets) Order 1985 (S.I., 1985, No. 78) dated 24th January 1985, a copy of which was laid before this House on 24th January, be annulled. — [Mr. Rooker.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Motion relating to Ways and Means may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour. —[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

WAYS AND MEANS

London Regional Transport

Mr. Speaker: I have selected the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

10.11 pm

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): I beg to move,

That provision may be made specifying as £258,179,588 the amount which the Greater London Council are to pay to London Regional Transport under section 49 of the London Regional Transport Act 1984.

This motion paves the way for the introduction of a Bill to determine the total of grants to London Regional Transport to be payable by the GLC for the financial year 1984-85, after 29 June 1984 when the Government took control. [Interruption.]

I explained why this measure is needed in my statement to the House on 29 January. The High Court quashed the direction that I made under section 49 of the London Regional Transport Act 1984. There is thus now no direction in force regarding the payment to LRT of the grants that the GLC budgeted for and precepted to pay to London Transport in 1984-85. [Interruption.]

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. We are debating probably one of the most important measures that will ever affect London transport, but I cannot hear a word that the Minister is saying.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I appeal for quietness, in order that the Secretary of State may be heard.

Mr. Ridley: This matter must be urgently resolved, if possible before the end of the financial year. As I told the House, I intended to appeal against the High Court judgment. But, having studied the judgment, I concluded that it was the Act itself that did not correspond with our intention, which was clearly stated at the time when it was passing through Parliament. Clearly an appeal would not resolve that problem, let alone the uncertainty over the amount to be paid. The Government had no option but to bring a new Bill before Parliament to settle quickly the amount of grant that the GLC should pay to LRT.

I say "settle quickly" beause both LRT and the GLC need to know what their financial position will be, and they need to know as soon as possible. LRT has to budget and plan ahead for 1985-86 and beyond, as well as to settle its 1984-85 accounts. The GLC is at the crucial final stages in its annual budgetary and rate-precepting processes. Legislation is the only way to resolve the uncertainties and give Parliament the opportunity to determine the outcome in a way that is reasonable as between the parties concerned. If the House approves the resolution, I intend to introduce a Bill immediately.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I had understood that it was not the Secretary of State's intention to take the Bill immediately this evening. Am I to understand that he has changed his mind?

Mr. Ridley: I said that I would introduce the Bill. It is not possible to introduce the Bill until the House has passed the Ways and Means resolution, but the normal intervals between introduction and Second Reading will of course obtain.

[Mr. Ridley]

In laying this motion, I have at the front of my mind the interests of travellers, LRT and London ratepayers. All stand to lose if we do not legislate. The GLC, through creative accounting and legal action, has tried to deprive LRT of substantial sums of money which ratepayers paid specifically for public transport and which LRT, by its efforts during the past seven months has earned. I think that the House would agree that such money should be returned to the ratepayers and passengers, not squandered on GLC lunacies. The Government are not trying to rob the GLC—we have not seen the colour of any of the money under discussion tonight. It is the London ratepayers and the London traveller who the GLC is seeking to rob.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): Would this so-called robbery by the GLC have been possible if the Secretary of State had drafted properly the Bill that became the Act that he is now amending?

Mr. Ridley: I used the word robbery as it is the word which the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) used on the day of the statement. So untrue were those phrases that they are more appropriate put as I have used them. I agree that the legislation is defective. I am sure that the whole House wants to put it right so that the intention of the House can be fulfilled.

There are four separate sums of money at issue as a result of the court's judgment. The first is a sum of £10·2 million which the GLC argued that it had already paid in the financial year but for which we had not given it credit in setting the direction.

When I made the direction under section 49 on 29 June, the statute required me to deduct from the total grant required the amount of grant already paid to LT by the GLC up to 29 June. Accordingly, acting on the best information then available to me, I deducted the sum of £78·7 million. In fact, a payment of some £10·2 million had been made by the GLC at the beginning of 1984-85, which LT had requested to close its accounts with the GLC for the previous financial year, 1983-84. It subsequently came to light that the GLC had paid that money but had carefully labelled the payments as relating to 1984-85. This was a trick—a piece of creative accounting—to enable the GLC to avoid paying what it owed LT in 1983-84. LT clearly considered that the payments should have been made for 1983-84. Indeed, the ratepayers had been precepted for the full amount. LT endeavoured to settle the matter with the GLC accordingly, but the GLC, of course, was in charge, and LT had reluctantly to accept the GLC's decision.

In all conscience, the GLC should have paid this money out in 1983-84 to settle its outstanding liability and because it had already asked the ratepayer for this amount. However, I did not pursue this sum before the court because section 49 relates only to payments during 1984-85. The GLC got round section 49 by relating the payment to 1984-85. The payment amounts to £10,220,412. I therefore propose to increase the amount for which the GLC was given credit in the period before the Government took control to £88,920,412. The House should be under no doubt that the GLC has robbed LRT and the ratepayers of this £10·2 million by a trick.

Secondly, there is an issue arising from amendments agreed by this House to the GLC's Money Act 1984, which covers the financial year 1984-85. At the time that the direction under section 49 was made, the House had passed an of instruction to the Committee considering the Money Bill. The import of this was that, unless specific proposals for reductions in expenditure were put forward by the GLC, the expenditure provisions in the Bill should be reduced by just under 7·5 per cent. In the event, and after the direction had been made, the GLC decided not to put forward proposals, so reductions were duly made across the board according to the instruction to the Committee. The effect for LRT was to reduce the provision for prescribed capital expenditure to be funded by grant from the GLC by some £12·9 million. The Money Bill has recently been enacted in that form and the Bill will reflect the reduction in provision for capital expenditure.

The figure quoted in the motion, therefore, is accordingly the figure in the original direction, £281·3 million, abated for payments in respect of 1984-85 and the £12·9 million reduction arising from the GLC Money Act. That gives the figure in the money resloution. Within that sum, two sums of money remain at issue. The first is LRT's expected surplus for this financial year.

The hon. Lady will doubtless seek to argue, as her amendment implies, that payments of grant by the GLC should be further abated in respect of the improvements in LRT's financial position which have developed since control was transferred to the Government. That is an intolerable suggestion. It would mean that additional income, which has resulted from improved productivity, better than expected sales of travelcards and from LRT's decision to raise fares earlier this year, would all be handed over to the GLC. It would mean that the benefits from the efforts of LRT's management and work force since the GLC lost control of LRT would go to the GLC, and not to LRT, its passengers, and London's ratepayers.

I would like to remind the House of two remarks I made during the debate on section 49 in Committee—

"It is not my intention to take more through the clause than is strictly necessary for running LRT for the year in question, so that they shall not end up with a surplus."—[Official Report, Standing Committee B, 15 March 1984; c. 1114.]

When I made my original direction, LRT's forecasts showed that it would need funds equal to the maximum that I could specify under section 49. Indeed, LRT had forecast a deficit. I made my direction accordingly. As I said in Committee, it was almost impossible to get it plumb right when we were working for a year ahead and did not know what the circumstances would be. I therefore said:

"If there is a surplus or deficit at the end of 1984-85 . . . that will go towards next year's determination of subsidy. It will either be added to or subtracted from the needs for the following year."—[Official Report, Standing Committee B, 15 March 1984; c. 1116.]

Later in the year, in November, I had to decide how much grant LRT would need for the following year, 1985-86. By that time the estimates showed a small cash surplus for the current year. It is now forecast at £29·5 million. Also by that time LRT, in the course of turning the business round, had necessarily incurred transitional costs which will now show as accrued liabilities in this year's account. Therefore, LRT's grant for 1985-86 and the proposed ratepayers' contribution have been calculated on the basis that LRT would not have to meet any unfunded liabilities accruing from 1984-85 in 1985-86.

I expect that we shall hear the hon. Lady argue that that money should be given to the GLC instead. Not only would the GLC receive an undeserved windfall, but LRT would be left without adequate funds. Is that what Opposition Members really want? It would mean big fares increases or cuts in services or investment, or an increase in the ratepayers' contribution for next year.

It is quite clear to us that the only fair outcome is for the money to be retained by LRT and used to benefit the passengers and ratepayers who contributed to it in the first place. As I said, I made it perfectly clear in Committee that our intention was that any unforeseen surpluses or deficits should be carried forward into the subsequent year.

There is a further sum at issue. Before the Government took over LRT, the GLC encouraged London Transport to enter into agreements to lease £27 million worth of assets —mainly buses. The GLC had never done that before. It decided to indulge in leasing for 1984-85 after the Government had determined the GLC's capital allocations for the year. That was another piece of creative accounting deliberately designed to circumvent the controls of the GLC's capital expenditure. By financing part of LRT's capital through leasing, knowing that it would shortly lose responsibility for LRT, the GLC hoped to escape the responsibility for funding more than a tiny fraction of those costs, pushing the rest on to LRT and the hapless ratepayer for future years.

I explained clearly when the Committee was considering section 49 that we regarded this dodge as unacceptable. I made it clear that we would expect the GLC to pay to set up a reserve for that leasing. Therefore, within the total sum specified in the resolution, there is provision for a payment by the GLC to enable LRT to set up a capital reserve to cover the financing costs of the assets leased in 1984-85. That reserve provision amounts to £20·8 million, which is no more than the GLC was notified at the time that it would be required to pay, and it is no more than would be required to cover the costs of the leasing payment. I will explain precisely how it is made up, if the House wishes.

I have given the exact explanation for the figures. No doubt the hon. Lady has come armed to the teeth with sheaves of briefing from the GLC. She looks a little perplexed, perhaps because I have anticipated so many of her arguments and she cannot think of what to say. No doubt that will not stop her. But before we hear the voice of London, intoning as though in a seance through the medium of Crewe and Nantwich, I challenge the hon. Lady to tell us whether she will oppose a measure that will protect the interests of London passengers, ratepayers and taxpayers, or whether she will vote to rob them of money they have paid for public transport to give the GLC a windfall to spend on God-knows-what. Does she want higher fares and rates in London? That is the implication of voting against this measure tonight, and I commend the resolution to the House.

10.32 pm

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): I beg to move, as an amendment to the motion, in line 1, leave out '£258,179,588' and insert '£208,300,000'.

I am deeply angered by the fact that we should be discussing such important legislation so late on a Thursday night. If I gave the Secretary of State the impression that I was perplexed, perhaps I could explain it to him in simple terms. Even I, after many years in the House of Commons, am astonished at the effrontery of any Secretary of State who dares to pass legislation which, when it is examined by the courts, is found to be so badly defective that he has to come to the House to put it right. What is more, he comes to the House, not in the state of penitence that one would have expected from any reasonable Minister, and not to explain to the House how he dared to introduce something that was regarded by a judge in a major court as being unlawful, irrational and procedurally improper; he comes here with true arrogance to suggest that, if his laws are unacceptable, he will change them.

This is the Government of law and order. This is the Secretary of State whose attitude towards the ratepayers of London is that, when it suits him, he will take over the major transport system. However, he will not pay for that system. That would be too easy. He will insist on levying on the ratepayers of London further sums of money to pay for something which they did not want, which will provide a worse service, and which in the final analysis will be extremely difficult to defend.

I am really deeply offended that we should be taking this measure now. I understand that the Government do not intend to go ahead with the second measure on the Order Paper today, but I would have thought that, knowing as they did that we had major debates to take place in the realm of water and a number of other things, if there had been even a grain of — I will not say "humility", because that is a word that the Secretary does not understand — but of sensitivity to what is really important he would have said that we could not possibly take a measure of this importance at this hour.

The Secretary of State has used the English language in a cavalier fashion which really astonishes me in his talk of creative accounting, robbery and trickery and all the other words that seem to be part of his normal, measured way of addressing those for whom he is responsible. Let me just remind the House of what this piece of legislation is all about.

I am deeply angered, and I think it is possibly a measure of the insensitivity of the members of the Government that they do not seem to understand that what we are talking about is a major transport system for the capital city of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. So let us talk about what the Secretary of State really intended to do.

The right hon. Gentleman decided originally that he was going to take over the whole of London transport and he set up, without any consultation whatsoever, a Bill which was to make the GLC pay for London regional transport. Four areas of really great importance were involved in this decision: first, the causes of the decision; secondly, the methods being used to implement it; thirdly, the Government's real reasons for wanting the change; and, lastly, the effect that this decision will have on the whole of London.

Three days after the LRT Act became law, the Secretary of State took over LRT and demanded, without consultation, £281·3 million from the GLC under section 49 of the Act. The Act did not require consultation, and of course it was not something which leapt naturally to the mind of the Secretary of State. But when the GLC took him to court Mr. Justice McNeil found in his verdict that "natural justice entitles the payer at least to make representations".

One result was that the Government made an error and charged £10·2 million above the maximum allowed even by their own section 49. The right hon. Gentleman conceded this after the court verdict.

[Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody]

The Government's claim also involved creating a surplus for LRT by three different methods. First, they decided to reduce the LRT capital needs by £12·9 million, but they still, of course, charged the GLC. Secondly, LRT's budget for 1984-85 was based on a fares freeze. The Government, however, when they took over, pushed up fares by 12 per cent. on 1 January 1985, thus reducing the need for grants by £8 million. But the Government still asked that the GLC should be responsible for that sum. The LRT reduced its need for redundancy money, after being taken over by the Government, by £21·1 million, but the Secretary of State still charged the GLC for the surplus.

So the Government tried to take £42 million from the GLC to create a surplus for LRT once it was within their sector—this in spite of the fact—and we have heard the Secretary of State quote from his own remarks in Committee—that he had said

"There is no intention of trying to make a surplus." —[Official Report, Standing Committee B, 15 March 1984; c. 1116.]

He was referring, of course, to section 49.

However, when the GLC challenged the Secretary of State it was revealed in court that a letter from an LTE executive member to an Under-Secretary in the Department of Transport proved that there was an intention to create a surplus of at least £11 million by 6 June 1984—before, in other words, the Bill became law. The Government also sought to take a further £20·8 million from the GLC to pay off in one go the total cost of the leasing reserve. We have heard from the Secretary of State that this was because the GLC was cheating and trying to fix things. In fact, the right hon. Gentleman was asking the GLC to pay off the total cost in one lump sum.

The Secretary of State made it quite clear in Committee that he would do this, even though he was perfectly well aware that it is traditional that new authorities inherit the debts of their predecessors, and that a leasing reserve is a standard practice among transport authorities.

The Hon. Mr. Justice McNeill, who, after all, was asked to judge these matters, said of this decision that the Secretary of State could have legally enforced his view through a Money Bill but that he did not choose to do so. He concluded:

"was it reasonable for him to do so. . . in the circumstances set out above it was not".

The Secretary of State used five methods to take a total of £73 million from the GLC. On every one he was found guilty by a court of law. On every one the judge allowed no possibility of misinterpretation or confusion, with the one exeption of the leasing reserve. That verdict was given on 11 January 1985.

The Secretary of State had conceded his £10 million error before the verdicts. However, he repeated in this House—not once, but four times—during transport questions that he would not discuss the implications of the case, apologise to the House or give any indication of what he intended to do to put right his own fault. He said that he had appealed or was appealing and that the matter was sub judice. That was not so. Not only did he not appeal but it emerged that he had been given very clear intimations by his own legal advisers that were he to do so, he would have no possible grounds for winning as it was plain that what he had done was unlawful, irrational and procedurally improper.

On 29 January, the Secretary of State announced plans to change the law. In other words, he had been found out and decided to create retrospective legislation. He gave five excuses for this action. First, he said in a rather lordly fashion that the court took a different view of his legislation. That is a nice way of saying that the court said that he had broken the law. It is rather like a burglar saying that theft is not actually against the law, just that the judges tend to take a different view.

Mr. Martin Stevens (Fulham): I thought that section 49 meant exactly what my right hon. Friend thought it meant. Did the hon. Lady and her hon. Friend think it meant something different at the time when the Bill was going through the House?

Mrs. Dunwoody: I think that any Secretary of State who brings a law to this House has a responsibility to ensure that it makes sense and that it is written so that it will stand up to examination, particularly if it affects the transport system of London. On top of that, having been found out, the Secretary of State should have had the decency to apologise to the House. Instead of that, he has come back with a change in the rule book. He does not like the game, so he will change the rules. London Regional Transport would have to give back to the GLC £50 million, we were told. This is wrong because the grant happens to be paid in instalments and only £177 million has been paid so far. If the Secretary of State had accepted the ruling of the court, the GLC would have had to pay only another £31 million instead of £81 million.

The Secretary of State said that the old legislation would accomplish what he wanted. Of course, that is not surprising because what he wants to do is to break the law. He said that an appeal would not effect what he wanted. What the Secretary of State wants has been found by the law courts to be unlawful. He said that it would be wrong for rates that had been raised to pay for transport to be used to buy something else. In that case, perhaps the Secretary of State thinks that in 1983-84, when the GLC budgeted to spend £235 million on transport but needed only £173 million, the £62 million should have been spent on transport irrespective.

Secondly, if the money goes back to the GLC, all of it will go to reduce the rate. If it goes to the LRT on the other hand and reduces LRT's needs, only two thirds will go back to the ratepayers. So much for the empty boast of the Secretary of State that he is worried about the ratepayers of London.

What the Secretary of State is doing is putting before the House legislation which has already reduced the sum demanded. The amount has been reduced from £281 million to £258 million. In other words, the Secretary of State has surrendered on the £10·2 million but also on the £12·9 million surplus capital money. If the Government conceded that the capital surplus was unacceptable, why are they still demanding a revenue surplus of £29·1 million?

Let us be clear, whatever the wording of the Bill, that it is retrospective legislation. The Conservative party in the past has been exceedingly outspoken on the question of restrospection. The GLC will be charged for services provided by another authority in a period of time predating the enactment of the Bill, and they never warned at any point that this might happen. The Conservative party has always prided itself on disliking such Bills. The present Foreign Secretary, referring to retrospection, said:

"First, warning must be given to the taxpayer of the intention to legislate in this way".—[Official Report, 12 July 1978; Vol. 953, c. 1641.]

In 1978, the Financial Secretary to the Treasury said:

"This is entirely destructive of civilised life in this country."

The House of Lords also does not care greatly for retrospective legislation. That may be one reason why we are debating a motion which cannot be amended by the House of Lords. We are not even clear whether the Government intend to allow the other place to debate the matter in any detail.

The discussion really concerns the fact that the Government intended to charge the GLC £73 million more than they had the legal right to demand. Now, as a great concession, they will charge the GLC only £50 million more than they have a legal right to demand. The reason is to conceal the cuts that have been made in LRT since it was taken over by Whitehall. Even though they are no longer the responsibility of the GLC, the rates for LRT will rise 35 per cent. in April under the subsequent levy order. The total burden will increase from £208 million to £281 million. The Government want control of LRT, but they do not want the financial responsibility. As far as the Government are concerned, the GLC can pay for a Whitehall-run service. That was the motive, of course, behind the 12 per cent. fare rise. It created a surplus of £8 million which the Government intend to use to cut fares and funds for LRT next year. The Secretary of State for the Environment is claiming that the GLC has balances of £71 million. When the law is changed, the GLC will have to pay more to the Government, but it estimates that its balances will then be zero, while its rate-capping limit and its rate targets are all based on the £71 million balance. Secondly, the Bill assumes that the GLC must pay over to LRT £20·8 million for the leasing reserve fund. However, it is interesting to note that the GLC would have to borrow that money to pay that sum. It has no powers to do any such thing. Therefore, are we to believe that the GLC will have to risk breaking the law to change the Secretary of State's calculation, and to support him in what has already turned out to be a clearly illegal move.

The Secretary of State said, in an article in The Standard on 4 April 1984:

"The savings of money is a matter of the greatest interest to 4,000,000 people who pay rates in London. We are determined to reduce the burden upon them".

Very soon, the ratepayers of London will find themselves facing yet another intolerable levy on top of their existing problems.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): Is not the hon. Lady's anger based on the fact that LRT, since the Act came into force, has been more successful, efficient, profitable and popular than the hon. Lady and her hon. Friends suspected or hoped? Does she not prefer the GLC to receive benefits for its dubious causes rather than to provide genuine services to the people of London?

Mrs. Dunwoody: The hon. Gentleman has always had some confusion in his mind about what service to the taxpayers and ratepayers means, or he would not be a member of the Conservative party. I point out that many people in London have no doubts about the effects of the changes on LRT. Not only are the fares higher and services worse, but look at what the local papers are saying. When there was a discussion in Sutton about the rate for the next year, the local paper said:

"Optimistic forecasts about Sutton's rate next year were dashed this week with the announcement of the new Transport Rate.

What this means is almost 11p in the pound will be added to rates bills by the new London Regional Transport quango . . .

Next April, despite no longer having responsibility for London Transport, County Hall are to be permitted to keep their precept at 36.75p.

So the new LRT precept of 10.8p just announced will be extra money. It will add about £26 to the average rates bill in the area . . .

Dr. David Trafford, leader of Sutton Council, said it was absurd to permit the GLC precept to stay at 36.75p when they no longer had to pay for LT.

'It makes a nonsense of our rates plans,' he said."

No member of a local authority has any doubt about what is happening. They all know that we have a Government that are so determined to centralise that they have gone ahead with their plans with no consultation either with the people who will be most affected, or with the duly and properly elected members of the local authorities.

We have a Secretary of State who produced inept, badly drafted and incompetent legislation, and then had the effrontery to come back here and say that as the judges had found that what he was doing was unlawful, he would redraw the law. Therefore, this is retrospective legislation. Those Conservative Members who boast of their commitment to law and order may find it difficult in the future to explain to the ratepayers of London how they can stomach this Government. They say that everybody else must obey the law, but when they found themselves in a position, created by the Secretary of State for Transport, in which they had a bad deal—the ratepayers of London will get a bad deal out of it—they came back to the House. They will not apologise, nor will the Secretary of State offer his resignation, or even suggest that he was in any way wrong. Instead, the Government are trying to make a new law so that the next time that the Secretary of State is challenged, he will not be told that what he has done is unlawful, irrational and procedurally improper. The Secretary of State may find it amusing, but there are many people in this capital city who tonight will understand exactly what is happening. They will know why it is necessary to take this measure late at night. They will know why the Secretary of State does not want it to be debated in the full light of day. They will draw their own conclusions about how genuine his commitment is to the transport system of the greatest capital city in the world.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): The London Tories never cease to amaze me. At the last general election the Prime Minister announced—as an afterthought, so we are told by several distinguished members of her party—that the Greater London council would be abolished, that London Regional Transport would be set up and that the power to control transport in London would be taken away from the elected representatives of the people of London. What was not said—I have checked what was said in their election speeches—was that the power to control transport in London would be taken over by a secretive, unelected quango over which the people of London would have no control and which would be able to levy a rate on Londoners. It meant that the most arrogant, inept and stupid member of the present Cabinet—which means that he has had to work very hard for the title—had to introduce a Bill which had proved to be totally inept and did not do what he said it would do.

The Secretary of State then applied it wrongly and the High Court decided that what had been done was irrational —that should be no surprise to any hon. Member— unlawful and procedurally unsound. We do not know whether the Secretary of State overruled his ministerial advisers about the way in which he ought to proceed. Perhaps the Secretary of State did overrule them and that is why he placed himself in this position.

The Secretary of State then came to the House to announce what he already knew—that he had been caught out. He misled the House. Because he was scared stiff of being asked questions he applied the sub judice rule, which meant that he could not be asked questions. He said that he had appealed against the decision, and we now know that that was not true. On the strength of that alone, the right hon. Gentleman ought to resign.

The right hon. Gentleman has now introduced a most amazing piece of retrospective legislation. He did not have the guts to bring a Bill before the House and then the financial consequences that would flow from it. We have the financial consequences, and there is to be a Bill which will flow from the financial consequences. If others ran their businesses or Departments as the Secretary of State is running his, they would be hounded out of office. He should be hounded out of office for his abysmal performance.

Tonight the Secretary of State managed to give the impression that his own total incompetence was in some way or other the fault of the Greater London council. The GLC opposed his Bill. It said that it was badly drafted, but the Secretary of State took no notice. The GLC said that what he was trying to do was stupid, ignorant, incompetent and unlawful, and that is how it has turned out to be. Yet the Secretary of State has used it tonight to attack the GLC.

What I ought to say, because the Secretary of State does not represent a London constituency, to the few Conservative Members who purport to represent London constituencies — not many of them are here tonight representing those constituencies — is that they really ought to consider how they should discharge their responsibilities to their electors. Within the last two days this House, in a three-hour debate, has decided the budget of the GLC and the budget of the Inner London education authority. That is what we did last night by means of the rate-capping orders.

Those authorities would have spent hours and hours in detailed and careful deliberations before deciding the fate of many services in London and the fate and standard of inner London schools. Instead, Ministers have proceeded in their craven way and accepted everything that the Prime Minister has demanded of them. The Government decided the budgets of the GLC, the Inner London education authority and two metropolitan counties in one three-hour debate. It seems that "Yobbos rule—OK" under this Government.

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): My hon. Friend is being too charitable. He has not mentioned that Merseyside and South Yorkshire were dealt with as well in the three-hour debate.

Mr. Dobson: I accept that. That is a reflection of the Government's wide-ranging intellectual powers. Tonight we are determining partly the budget and future standard of service of London Regional Transport. We are about to come to a decision on another whacking chunk of the GLC's budget. This will follow the despicable speech of the Secretary of State, which clearly made some of his hon. Friends ashamed. That was their reaction to his inept presentation of his stupid case.

Mr. John Maples (Lewisham, West): Does the hon. Gentleman think it right that money raised from London's ratepayers by the GLC for London Regional Transport's purposes should be applied by the GLC for some other purpose?

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Yes, such as reducing the precept.

Mr. Dobson: As my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) said, the Secretary of State was trying to steal from the GLC. Some of the money could reasonably stay with the GLC and some of it could reasonably be returned to the ratepayers. The hon. Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples) should be reminded that some of the money will go straight from the pockets of London ratepayers into the surplus of an unelected transport quango. That is the form of local government which he and his right hon. and hon. Friends have introduced.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): The money resolution which accompanied the London Regional Transport Bill, as it then was, was a strange one, on which I spoke. It provided that any surplus arising from LRT's business would be transferred to the Treasury for the ensuing year. The hon. Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples) shakes his head, but that is my understanding. Does my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) agree that we are discussing a sum that is £50 million more than the needs of London Regional Transport for the current year?

Mr. Dobson: I confess that I no longer have a grip of one part of the detail on which my hon. Friend's intervention turns. The Secretary of State is smiling, but he has no right to claim that he has a grip on anything. It is only his incompetence that brings us here tonight. I remember that it was made clear during the debate on the money resolution of the LRT Bill, as it then was, that surpluses could go to the Treasury from London Regional Transport. I note that the Secretary of State no longer shakes his head. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman has steadied his brain for a moment.

Mr. Tony Banks: I invite my hon. Friend to refer to the report of the proceedings in Committee on the London Regional Transport Bill of 15 March 1984, at column 1114. He will find that the Secretary of State gave a clear undertaking that money would not be taken away from the GLC to create a surplus for London Regional Transport.

Mr. Dobson: That is another argument to support our case.

Most London Tory Members have long ceased to recognise that their function is to represent the people who elected them. Apparently they think that their function is to vote with the Government everytime that they shout. In the last two days they have battered the GLC and the ILEA through rate capping. Today the bulk of them — including the bulky hon. Member for Fulham (Mr. Stevens)—have voted for an 11 per cent. increase in the water rate levied by the Thames water authority because the Government have invented a water tax.

Tonight Tory Members will show their loyalty to the Prime Minister, if not loyalty to the people whom they represent, by trooping through the Lobby to support the Secretary of State and his retrospective legislation to put right the consequences of his own incompetence, stupidity and unlawfulness. Some of those words were used by the judge in the High Court. According to the judge, the Secretary of State was also irrational.

Tory Members should remember that their primary duty is to the people who elected them. It is about time that they discharged that duty. The only way that they can discharge it is by sharing the anger expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich.

11.7 pm

Mr. Martin Stevens (Fulham): The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) rants about London Conservative Members sheepishly following the Government into the Lobby no matter what the Government propose, barely 60 minutes after a sizeable Tory rebellion. I did not take part in it because, although I thought my hon. Friends honest, I also thought them mistaken.

Opposition Members want to squeeze the last drop of outrage out of this debate. They are entitled to a bit of a giggle about something that went wrong, but they should not make absurd accusations such as that made by the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras.

The hon. Member for Crewe an Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) made a number of statements to which I took exception. She asked why the Government did not consult the GLC. Perhaps she can make us a list of the times when, over the last decade, Governments, Royal Commissions and proponents of the Local Government Bill sought discussion and were turned contemptuously away. If I were Secretary of State, I am not sure that I should feel an obligation to seek the views of members of that extraordinary gang.

Mr. Tony Banks: They were elected.

Mr. Stevens: The present team was not elected. The electorate voted for others who were immediately given the chop and the new lot were put in.

While my hon. Friends and I do not begrudge the Opposition their hour of fun and frivolity, I do not believe that hon. Members who served, as I did, on the Standing Committee on the London Regional Transport Act thought that section 49 meant anything different from what the Secretary of State thought it meant. They certainly did not say so.

I do not have the slightest doubt that the GLC leadership were playing tricks, in exactly the way that my right hon. Friend accuses them; I have been in their company too often not to recognise the signs. They resemble the modern Labour party; like a flash city financier who is much too fly ever to break the law. The moment he has done something, we must have a new law to prevent him from doing it again. In a way, that is what we are doing tonight.

Mrs. Dunwoody: And the court case?

Mr. Stevens: For the hon. Lady to exult in the result of the High Court case, she must be able to show that she and her hon. Friends disagreed with the Secretary of State on the significance of section 49, and she has not been able to do so. [Interruption.] I would not make an adverse comment about a judicial decision. What we are proposing tonight is to return the Act to what we all thought it meant, and I shall support the Government in so doing.

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): We are seeking tonight what happens when one divorces the upper tier of local government from its proper role as a transport authority and places it in the hands of civil servants and an arrogant Secretary of State.

I voted against the London Regional Transport Act—I, too, served on the Standing Committee on that measure—and I always thought that it was a lousy piece of legislation. The facts are proving it to have been so.

The breakdown in relations between central and local government, which this debate so typifies—there is much more to come, particularly when the Transport Bill is debated next week and in the many months to follow—is a tragedy not only for this House but for the whole United Kingdom.

I understood that leasing for most bus companies was a proper way of proceeding. Most local authorities have been forced into leasing because they have no means to fund the capital programmes for which there is a necessity.

We have had to adopt that means in my constituency to provide facilities for dealing with our rubbish and waste material. There are no more holes to fill up and we cannot finance a programme out of capital because we do not have any capital receipts, so we must go in for leasing. That is what bus companies have had to do in recent years to acquire the buses they need.

If we are now to run LRT in the way that we are running the water authorities, heaven help the ratepayers.

By introducing this motion, the Secretary of State is admitting that he could not win an appeal and, therefore, that he misinterpreted the law. He is also breaching the undertaking that he gave, when the measure was debated, that the money was to cover running LRT for "the year in question."

It is widely admitted that £50 million is not needed for this purpose. That was the burden of the court judgment. The money included £20·8 million, which did not even feature in the GLC's budget. By this motion, the Secretary of State is trying to appropriate from the GLC money to which he is not entitled, either in law, as the law currently stands, or in equity.

As with the rate precept, to be debated another day, the right hon. Gentleman is proving to be more profligate with ratepayers' money than the GLC, which he frequently attacks. There is a clear element of retrospectivity in what the right hon. Gentleman is doing. Under the law as it stands, the GLC has a duty to pay the Secretary of State £208 million. This provision, and the order—when it comes before us—are changing the rules halfway through the game. I suggest that the probity of such action is open to challenge. We can imagine the screams of horror that the Tories would produce if a Labour Government were to do it to a Tory council. We should not be debating the matter at this time of night; that is certain.

The only honourable course for the Secretary of State to take is to admit that he did not understand his legislation, and settle for the sum to which he is legally entitled under the amendment. He should stop showing his naked contempt for the law and the courts, swallow his pride and withdraw his motion.

11.14 pm

Mr. John Maples (Lewisham, West): I had not intended to intervene in the debate, but the phony indignation that has been worked up by the hon. Members for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) and for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), neither of whom was present in Committee, and the somewhat lesser indignation worked up by the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross), who did not often attend the Committee, force me to do so.

I want to make just one point. It was abundantly clear during the Committee's proceedings on what was then, I think, clause 42, that money that had been raised by the GLC from London's ratepayers to subsidise London Transport should be paid to London Regional Transport. That principle was not challenged by any member of the Committee.

Mr. Dobson: It was.

Mr. Maples: It was not. The hon. Gentleman was not present in that Committee. The principle was never challenged by any member of the Opposition in Committee. A couple of amendments were tabled. They dealt with what would happen if there were a surplus, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made it clear that surplus would stay in LRT, would inure for its benefit and would not be appropriated by the Treasury.

It would be outrageous if money that was raised from London's ratepayers for that purpose were to be left with the GLC to be misapplied for some other purpose and have to be raised again.

Mrs. Dunwoody: It would lower the rates.

Mr. Maples: Does the hon. Lady wish to intervene?

Mrs. Dunwoody: No.

Mr. Maples: The hon. Lady does not want to do so, but she was speaking from a sedentary position.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): I was a member of that Committee. The hon. Gentleman has just mentioned the surplus and the fact that the Secretary of State said that the surplus would go to LRT. In fact, the Secretary of State said:

"It is not my intention to take more through the clause than is strictly necessary for running LRT for the year in question, so that we shall not end up with a surplus."—[Official Report, Standing Committee B, 15 March 1984; c. 1114.]

He gave the undertaking to the Committee and the House that there would be no surplus. It is on that that the court case hinges.

Mr. Maples: The money that was raised by the GLC was raised from London's ratepayers for that purpose. It is indisputable that it would be outrageous for it now to be applied to any other purpose, which is what the result would be. London's ratepayers would effectively have to pay twice. The Opposition's amendment, which is designed to chop off £50 million, is pure political opportunism. It is another example of what we saw again and again during the proceedings on the Bill—the GLC tail wagging the parliamentary Labour party dog.

The people who live in this city, except for the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich and her right hon. and hon. Friends, are sick and tired of the GLC's meddling, interference and games with London Transport. We hope that this is the end of it.

11.17 pm

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): I came into the debate to support those of my hon. Friends who had served on the Committee, and the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) on this matter. As the debate has progressed, I have become more and more uneasy. The Secretary of State for Transport has not been known for being frank in the House.

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): Not so.

Mr. Spearing: If I do him any injustice in what I am going to say, I am sure that his hon. Friend the Minister of State will do him more than justice and put me right. I invite the right hon. Gentleman to intervene if I have it wrong.

My hon. Friends and the hon. Member for Isle of Wight are familiar with the statistical interstices of this argument, but I doubt whether any casual listener to the debate will have been able to gather the degree of what I believe to be the enormity of the Secretary of State's action. That is why I wish to be strictly fair to him. For once we have the time, and he has the ability courteously to put me right if anything that I say is incorrect.

I intervened in the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) because I have vivid memories of the debate on the money resolution voted on and passed by the House on 13 December 1983 after the Second Reading of the Bill, and equally vivid recollections of a strange provision in that money resolution. I am testing the Secretary of State on this, as I availed myself of the opportunity in the No Lobby to re-read the Official Report of that debate.

The Secretary of State said in reply to that short debate:

"The system will be as follows. In any given year an estimate will be made of the subsidy needed by London Regional Transport which will be based on its own budget and plans. At the end of the year, having levied that amont partly through the rate and partly through taxes"——

presumably that is the Department of Transport contribution—

"the sum will be determined, and may be slightly more or less than previously estimated, and paid over. Consequently, the figures will be adjusted next year. That is how it will work. There is no question of the Treasury making a profit at the expense of ratepayers, or of its pocketing surpluses, as has been suggested."—[Official Report, 13 December 1983; Vol. 50, c. 940-41.]

As I understand it, however, that is exactly what is now about to happen. I shall be happy to give way to the Minister if I am wrong, but I am trying to understand this as a user of London Transport. Like most of my constituents, I do not own a car and this issue is vital to the quality of transport available to citizens of the capital which the Government have treated with such scant respect. As no one has challenged me, I assume that I am right so far.

Understandably, there was a clause in the Bill allowing money to be transferred from the GLC in the transitional period of six months or so when London Transport would be under the Minister rather than the GLC. That is perfectly reasonable. Having decided to effect the transfer in the middle of the financial year and of the calendar year, the Government had to make some provision to sustain London Transport during that period. As my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) has pointed out, that was accepted by the Committee as an administrative arrangement.

It is alleged, however—the Secretary of State has not so far rebutted the allegation—that the amount that was levied was in excess of the amount required by London Transport in that balancing period. The figure has been bruited around and my hon. Friends have stated that the excess is £50 million. Neither the Secretary of State nor the Minister of State has denied that, or indeed anything that I have said up to now—so far, so good.

On the money resolution and the matter on which I intervened in the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras, it is within the knowledge of all my hon. Friends now present that when I made that allegation both Ministers shook their heads. The money resolution provides that the Secretary of State will be authorised "to require that body to pay to him any excess of revenues over charges (as determined by that Act) in respect of any accounting year (within the meaning of that Act) of that body, so far as that excess appears to him to be surplus to that body's requirements". —[Official Report, 13 December 1983; Vol. 50, c. 933.]

There we have it. There is a power voted by the House, by means of the money resolution, to enable the Secretary of State, if he so wishes — it is not mandatory, but optional—to take back from London Regional Transport any surplus that may in any one year arise out of surplus revenues.

The Secretary of State may say that the subsidy from the GLC is not, for the purposes of the resolution, revenue. That is the only loophole that I can see.

Mr. Ridley: It would be kind to put the hon. Gentleman out of his misery. He does not understand what happened in Committee, when it was carefully explained that all money from the trading accounts of LRT that was excess to its requirements would be rolled over into the following financial year. The hon. Gentleman has quoted what I said. The power in the money resolution was intended to cover the unlikely event of the discovery of oil or of a gold mine on LRT property, or of major property development, the proceeds of which had nothing at all to do with London Transport. Such proceeds would be paid into the Treasury. In no sense would the money resolution power be used for the purpose of paying in the surpluses.

The hon. Gentleman asked me to intervene if his point was a false one. I hope that he will accept that it is false.

Mr. Spearing: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for putting me right. Making the point was still worthwhile. Not all the citizens of London, and indeed not all the Members of the House of Commons, can sit in any one Committee. However, it seems strange that such a money resolution was included, because presumably the disposal of capital assets, land values and so on might have had to be considered.

I take it that the Secretary of State has no intention—assuming that the resolution is passed tonight—of taking back any of the moneys that he intends to transfer from the GLC to LRT in the succeeding year, as in the money resolution, or to abate his own contribution out of taxes through the consolidated fund by a similar amount. I assume that all the additional revenue, over and above the requirements for this year, will be used for improving the service or reducing fares. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman can give me that assurance.

Mr. Ridley: I am happy to give the hon. Gentleman that assurance categorically.

Mr. Spearing: I thank the right hon. Gentleman. I hope that at least we understand rather more than we did before the debate. The disgraceful way in which the right hon. Gentleman tied up the finances and operations of LRT is one of the reasons why we are right to probe these matters. People will always be suspicious of the right hon. Gentleman whenever the word "buses" is spoken, whether in London, Merseyside or any of the conurbations, because the difficulties that he has found himself in tonight will be magnified many times if he pursues other legislation now before the House.

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): I did not serve on the Committee on the Bill. The hon. Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples) seems to believe that only hon. Members who served on the Standing Committee may speak in the Chamber on matters that may arise once the Bill in question has become an Act and has been queried in the courts. That is a strange doctrine, especially from an hon. Member who may not have been in the House for very long.

What moves me to speak is what, if I were not in the House of Commons, I would regard as the humbug and hypocrisy of the Secretary of State. I understand that I am not allowed to use those words. I shall therefore talk about the right hon. Gentleman's brazen effrontery in daring to talk about the robbery of the four million ratepayers of London. That from a prominent member of the Government who for the past five years, have drastically cut rate support grant for London ratepayers by hundreds of millions of pounds, thus forcing up rates in all London boroughs, irrespective of their political complexion. Only today, the Government have forced through the House the first ever water tax in our history. Charges for Londoners will now rise by 10 per cent. instead of 3 per cent. I remind the Secretary of State, who probably does not know about these things, that there are no rebates on water rates, unlike general rating. The poorer section of the community will suffer as a result of what the House has done today.

The chairman of LRT recently unveiled the business plan. He was kind enough to organise a reception for London Members of Parliament. That was good, this being the first year of LRT's operation. The Secretary of State is suggesting that LRT is running its affairs much more efficiently than the GLC ran London Transport. The forecasts that many of my hon. Friends made in Committee, and which people outside made, are being shown to be true. There have been disproportionate fare increases and cuts in services. The 275 route which runs through my constituency on Sundays is being cut out. It is a double-decker bus route which runs principally to and from the Claybury mental hospital in north east London. Many elderly and disabled people use that service to visit friends at Claybury. Other services are available, but people in my constituency and neighbouring ones will now have to use three or four bus services to get to Claybury on a Sunday. That is expensive and inconvenient.

The 275 service is being cut out only because, according to LRT, it does not have enough passengers.

[Mr. Eric Deakins]

That is what the argument about the control of London's transport has been all about. We cannot expect every bus service to make a profit. We have always accepted that unprofitable but socially desirable services should be cross-subsidised by the profitable ones. The cut would not have been made under the GLC, but it has happened under LRT. It is the beginning of a long process of the attrition of London's bus services.

We will also have more one person operated buses. Some say that they are more economic in that only one person is employed. Some years ago, when London Transport was keen on introducing one person operated buses, it decided after an experimental period that it would limit the proportion of one person operated buses bacause, although it saved money, it held up passengers, held up traffic and was not good for business people. Under LRT's business plan there is a massive increase in the number of one person operated buses. It will save money but I question whether it will make a more efficient service for ratepayers and public transport users.

Many people who support the GLC and oppose its abolition might have thought that abolishing London Transport and establishing an undemocratic quango under the Secretary of State would make no difference. They are wrong. The greatest difference will be felt by poorer people in my part of London. That is insupportable, as it comes on top of many other burdens that the Government have imposed on them. Therefore, I shall vote against this motion and in favour of my right hon. Friend's amendment. I hope that the Opposition will carry its views with it and vote against the Bill when it eventually comes to the House.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I apologise for popping in and out of the debate, but the Local Government Bill is in Committee upstairs. The Government are dragging the House deeper and deeper into the affairs of local government, to the point that this place is becoming like a mega town hall. At some stage someone will no doubt suggest that Mr. Speaker should be addressed as Mr. Mayor. All hon. Members must by now think that it is time for the Government to draw back because they are making life impossible for both hon. Members and democratically elected councillors in town and county halls.

The issue can be sufficiently starkly and simply put for even the average Tory Member to understand. It is that the Secretary of State broke the law. What is worse, he broke his own law. The fact that he acted illegally is compounded with incompetence — he did not even understand the law that he had taken through the House. That puts into context the Government's position vis-a-vis local councillors. They lecture councillors about breaking the law and constantly accuse them of abusing their powers.

The Widdicombe inquiry will not be impartial—it is a fig leaf. Tory Members ask when these abuses will be stopped, which shows that they have already prejudged the issue of local government. In reality the purpose of the inquiry is to produce sufficient evidence for the Government to move strongly against local government spending under sections 137 and 142. However, when the Government abuse their position and break the law they merely change the law, and retrospectively at that.

If a councillor had broken the law as the Secretary of State has done, there would have been an outcry from Conservative Members. I can imagine the articles in the loony Right-wing rags, such as The Sun, the Daily Mail, the Daily Express and The Times. While we are getting the Secretary of State off the hook this evening, I remember Claycross in 1972, when councillors did the decent thing and defied an appalling piece of legislation. Many of them are still suffering from the imposition of bankruptcy and are unable to hold elected office. However, when the Government break the law, they simply change that law. Tonight we are witnessing the Government's double standards, which stink to high heaven and call into question their position and statements about occupying a higher moral stand point than local councillors.

In the judgment of 11 January the judge said that the Secretary of State had acted "unlawfully, irrationally and procedurally improperly in giving a direction which exceeded his statutory powers without consideration of all the relevant material and without consultation with the GLC".

What an indictment of a Minister. He should feel ashamed of himself. I can only hope that at some time in the near future he will do the decent thing and offer his resignation.

I raised this issue at Question Time on 14 January, soon after the High Court judgment. The Secretary of State came to the Dispatch Box and said that the matter was sub judice. At best, that was a deliberate attempt to prevent debate in the House; at worst, it was a deliberate attempt to mislead the House. On that score, too, he should offer the House an apology. The Secretary of State had not appealed at that time; he was only thinking about whether to appeal. One understands now that his officials advised him that there would not be much point in appealing, because he would lose. That is why we have this Ways and Means motion and the Bill that will follow.

The Secretary of State will ask the GLC to pay money to London Regional Transport which that body does not need. That point is crucial, and we discussed it at length in Committee on 15 March last year, on what is now the London Regional Transport Act 1984. I was a member of that Committee, and I looked up what the Secretary of State said. He said:

"It may help if I start by underlining the principles on which I intend to operate the clause."

He was talking about clause 49.

"The normal processes of determining the subvention to LT by the GLC will be gone through, and most of them have been . . . The GLC having determined both the revenue and the capital amount, we shall expect it to pay us that amount for the full year. However, that amount is not to be taken entirely at its face value because we must be careful that neither the Government demand too much from the GLC nor that the GLC gives too little to LRT. I hope that the matter can be agreed sensibly and without difficulty. It is not my intention to take more through the clause than is strictly necessary for running LRT in the year in question, so that it shall not end up with a surplus. That is our firm intention but I am sure that the Committee will agree that it is almost impossible to get it plumb right when we are working for a year ahead and do not know what the circumstances of that year will be."

He went on to repeat:

"There is no intention of trying to make a surplus . . . However, there is no intention of trying to get more out than we should."

That is what the Secretary of State said in Committee, but he is now suggesting that he should be allowed to do precisely the opposite to what he promised the Committee in 1984.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), who was leading for the Opposition on that Committee, said:

"I do not think that the Secretary of State's assurance is worth a great deal. If I were a London ratepayer . . . I should not put much store by that promise." — [Official Report, Standing Committee B; 15 March 1984, c. 1114-17.]

How right my hon. Friend was. But, of course, that had no influence on the Secretary of State, and the Bill duly received its Royal Assent on 26 June.

As to consultation, officials of the Department of Transport promised that there would be consultation with the GLC before issuing the direction. But no such consultation occurred. That is why Mr. Justice McNeill found this contrary to the principles of natural justice. Had the Secretary of State consulted the GLC and taken account of its reponse, he could have avoided an illegal direction, and especially avoided an error of £10·2 million, which was the amount that the GLC had already paid that year.

The Secretary of State's illegality is compounded by his incompetence and his impoliteness in not consulting the GLC, which could have told him that he was making an error. Indeed, in July 1984, the GLC told him that he was making an error and that, in its view, the direction was unlawful. However, the GLC said that it would continue to make payments without prejudice to maintain the continued operation of LRT's services. The GLC was not prepared to play ducks and drakes with London's transport services, despite all the accusations that have been made by Conservative Members. It told the Secretary of State that he had got it wrong, but the Secretary of State, in his usual arrogant manner, decided completely to ignore the GLC because he did not believe that it was worth consulting that body. We now see the consequences of his incompetence.

I could have raised many points tonight, but I shall content myself with one that was mentioned by Conservative Members. The Secretary of State says that it would be improper for this money, which has been taken from ratepayers for one purpose, to be used for another. He says:

"I cannot accept . . . that the money belongs to the GLC. The GLC precepted the ratepayers of London for the express and explicit purpose of passing the money on to LRT. How it can then be said that because it rated the money it should not give it to LRT baffles me."—[Official Report, 29 January 1985; Vol. 72, c. 171.]

Of course, most things baffle the Secretary of State, including his own legislation, but let me answer the point.

The argument that he is putting, which is supported by other hon. Gentlemen, and particularly by the hon. Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples), who also raised that point during questions in January, is contrary to all normal local government practices and to all past practices between the GLC and the LTE. The GLC precepted for 1984-85 on the assumption that the council would maintain fare levels, secure close integration between London Transport and British Rail and extend dial-a-ride schemes, concessionary schemes, and so on. That was the reason why the GLC precepted at the levels. that it did. But, of course, all that has since changed, because LRT is now busy changing all the policies upon which the GLC precepted ratepayers in the first instance.

It is outrageous that the Secretary of State should now ask the GLC to pass over money to London Regional Transport which it does not need, in order that LRT should create a revenue surplus. Consider that against what the Secretary of State said in Committee last year. The GLC would not voluntarily hand this money over, but if it is required to do so it will be against all good financial management in local government.

In 1983-84, for example, the GLC's budgeted grants in transport were £235 million, but only £173 million was paid. The balance was used to reduce the precept for 1984-85. It is quite absurd and contrary to the interests of London ratepayers that moneys must be spent for the purpose for which they were precepted regardless of need or changed circumstances. It is absolutely crazy, and no sensible, well-managed local authority would do it. That surplus could be used, as it has been used in the past, to reduce the transport precept being required from London. That is how we could use the £50 million which the Secretary of State is to steal from the GLC by legal means, and we shall be discussing the 35 per cent. increase in the transport precept very shortly.

So much for the good management of London Regional Transport now that it has found itself in the bungling, incompetent hands of the Secretary of State, who is trying to screw the ratepayers of London in order to build up a revenue surplus in LRT which it does not need and should not have because of the assurances which the Secretary of State gave the Committee on the London Regional Transport Bill.

On the question whether the short LRT Bill should be a money Bill, what concerns me is that if it is to be a money Bill—I understand that the Government want it to be, according to a note that I have of the minutes of discussions that took place between officials of the Department of Transport and the GLC—there will be certain constraints operating on the House of Lords when that Bill goes to it. I find it rather strange that the Government should be talking in terms of its being a money Bill, because I have always understood that it was only Mr. Speaker who decided what Bill was to be a money Bill. I hope that we shall be able to decide this at a later date, because it would appear to me that the Government, by insisting that this should be a money Bill, will prevent the Lords from bringing to bear their judgment and their decisions on retrospective legislation, which is what this is all about.

If the Government are able to achieve a compliant House of Lords by denying it the right properly to debate and discuss that Bill, they will thereby continue their practice of acting in a high-handed and undemocratic fashion, using the language of democracy while they ride roughshod over democracy, and in this case over the ratepayers of London, who, unfortunately, now find that their transport system, which was previously under the control of a democratically accountable Greater London council, is in the hands of an incompetent, bungling, undemocratic and unlawfully acting Minister, the Secretary of State.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): I shall be brief, given the hour and the relevant comments which Opposition Members have already made.

The whole substance of the Secretary of State's speech was to describe the GLC as robbers and tricksters, whereas the court's decision—I do not apologise for repeating it again—was that the Secretary of State

"acted unlawfully, irrationally and procedurally improperly in giving a direction which exceeded his statutory powers without consideration of all relevant material and without consultation with the Greater London Council".

For the right hon. Gentleman to describe the GLC as robbers and tricksters is really a case of him being caught with his hand in the till.

I was reminded of the fact that a few years ago there was a campaign in the east end of London with the slogan

"George Davis is innocent, OK?"

The same could be said of the right hon. Gentleman's speech. He made out that he was innocent, even though the court decision came out against him. I remind the Secretary of State that George Davis eventually got sent down, and the same may well apply to him.

In many respects the right hon. Gentleman has also misled the House. When on 14 January my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) asked a question, the right hon. Gentleman said that his Department was in the process of appealing and, therefore, the matter was sub judice. We have now discovered that he has not appealed and has no intention of appealing, because he knows that he would lose.

The right hon. Gentleman also misled the House on the question of the subsidy. His Department's plans to ensure that LRT had a subsidy was contrary to his assurance to the House and the Standing Committee. This is important, because the subsidy was one of the essential pieces of evidence by which the court found against the Secretary of State.

In spite of the right hon. Gentleman's rantings against the GLC, the council has acted legally and responsibly throughout. It informed him in July of last year that it considered that his direction was unlawful. That proved to be correct. The GLC said that it would continue the payments to LRT without prejudice in order to maintain the operation of LRT's services. The GLC has made it clear that it has always been prepared to pay overgrants to meet LRT's operating needs in 1984-85.

The Minister has robbed the GLC of between £50 million and £73 million. That reveals an amazing level of incompetence, given that the right hon. Gentleman was responsible for the writing of the Bill and for steering it through Committee. It is clear that he did not understand its provisions.

For the Secretary of State now to bring forward this retrospective legislation and Ways and Means resolution is very much a fraud. It merely covers up his own incompetence. However, it must be introduced in this way because the Secretary of State would lose any appeal. It is not in the interests of the ratepayers of London. If the Money were paid back to the GLC, it could be used to reduce the GLC's precept to the London boroughs and thus the London boroughs' rates would be reduced. Taking that £50 to £73 million, which is relevant this year, and applying it to later years will result in London ratepayers being deprived of the benefit that the Secretary of State can claim—only two thirds of the amount in later years, with the Exchequer having to pay one third. The Secretary of State is robbing London's ratepayers of one third of the £50 to £73 million of which they would have received the direct benefit. That extra bill will have to be faced by the ratepayers.

The Government said that the GLC precepted for the amount, so what did it matter? The GLC, of course, was forced to precept for the additional sum. If the same principle were applied to all local authorities in the country, it would send the Secretary of State's rate-capping right through the roof. Indeed, there would never be any savings from underspending. The argument is therefore a phoney one.

The court made it clear that the money is GLC money and should be paid back to be used for the benefit of London's ratepayers. This retrospective legislation and the motion amount to robbery and trickery by the Secretary of State.

11.56 pm

Mrs. Dunwoody: With the permission of the House.

There are occasions when the House witnesses hon. Members who cynically try to distort the truth or who, for reasons of self-aggrandisement or as a result of other less attractive characteristics, seek to obfuscate rather than to clarify.

I believe that the Secretary of State should have come to the House today and said plainly that what he was doing had been found to be unlawful, that he knew himself to be wrong and that he therefore accepted the verdict of the courts and would not seek to bring in legislation. I believe that he should never have put retrospective legislation before the House. It is not in the interests of the House that a Government with a large majority should use that muscle in a blatant and unacceptable manner to insist on legislation which has been tried and tested in the courts and found to be sadly wanting.

I believe that the Secretary of State should have come to the House at least not to hand out cheap jibes against the GLC. He should have come to the House to apologise and to say he was wrong to have sought to suggest that the matter was sub judice because his Department was appealing when he knew that that was not so. He should have said that he was wrong to have insisted on legislation which would have a direct effect upon the ratepayers of London and upon the transport services that the ratepayers of London have a right to expect. Above all, the Secretary of State should have said that he would not move such a motion late on a Thursday night when the entire House could not be present to examine in detail the implications of the Government's proposals.

I believe that there has been a misuse of the Government's large majority. In every sense it has been a discreditable episode. If I were the only hon. Member present in the Chamber, I would still vote against this piece of chicanery. The matter is too important to be handled with levity and contempt. The Secretary of State should have had the decency to come to the House and apologise.

Mr. Ridley: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall deal with some of the lesser points before coming to deal with the bogus hypocrisy that has effused from the Labour Benches. I shall first ask a question of the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody). She said in her first speech that, if the £50 million had been left with the GLC, it would all have gone to reduce the rates. Would that happen? I doubt it, and I do not think that she will be thanked by her paymasters in county hall for having gone so far as to say that.

I confirm to the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) and to my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) that any surplus from the money raised for LRT, either by the GLC or, in due course, by the ratepayer levy, that is surplus to the requirements of one year will be paid into LRT's accounts for use in future years.

Mr. Spearing: Although we do not always agree with the right hon. Gentleman's policies or actions, he is always courteous, so I am grateful to him for giving way. The £50 million over current requirements that he is collecting, which he says will be put to the use of LRT in succeeding years, he is taking from the ratepayers ahead of need. Why did he not go to the GLC and, on a gentleman's agreement, take only the amount that it was not going to send back to the ratepayers? Would that have not been a more satisfactory and businesslike way to go about the matter?

Mr. Ridley: I shall come to that point. I hesitated to give way to the hon. Gentleman because I prefer to make my own speech in my own order.

The hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) said that the service has deteriorated, but I must disagree with him. It is improving rapidly, as is the efficiency of LRT. However, if he has a particular point, about the service, I am sure that he will find the chairman very willing to help. I shall draw the attention of the chairman to the hon. Gentleman's concern, and I am sure that the chairman will take any opportunity to get in touch with the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Deakins: I have already taken the matter up with the chairman of LRT, and it was on the basis of his reply that I made my brief remarks about the fact that the service is being cut for financial reasons when it is really a social service.

Mr. Ridley: There have been very small, if any, cuts for that reason, but I do not know the circumstances of the case that the hon. Gentleman raised, and I shall draw his point to the attention of the chairman.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) is not here.

Mr. Spearing: He is in Committee.

Mr. Ridley: He did not hear my opening speech, and he will not hear my closing speech. He left me several questions—to whom would I be answering if I answered them? To answer one of them, this is a money Bill not by virtue of the Government's wish but because money Bills are things that raise money and are certified as such by Mr. Speaker, and the Government have no choice in a matter such as that.

The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich, and one or two other hon. Members, made the error of saying that rates for LRT will rise by 35 per cent. This is not true. The old total—the figure for the current year—raised by the GLC was £340 million, of which the ratepayers paid just about three quarters. When we debate the levy order the hon. Lady will hear that the total to be raised for next year is £323 million — that is, less. The ratepayers' contribution will be two thirds of that amount. How can two thirds of £323 million be more than three quarters of £340 million? It cannot be.

The rate in London has gone up because the Greater London Council drew down its balances last year and spent them. The result is that this year it has had to raise its rates for non-London Regional Transport purposes by a very great amount — indeed, by more than the relief to ratepayers that removing LRT from it has produced. The GLC has taken the opportunity of not having to finance LRT next year to increase its rate by almost the same amount as has been saved.

The hon. Lady asked how the GLC was going to pay this money. I do not believe that the GLC has any excuse for not paying this money since the London Regional Transport Bill was published in December 1983 and certainly since the Committee stage in March 1984, and for not planning on the assumption that their maximum exposure in 1984-85 would be £360 million. Indeed, even after the judgment on 11 January, the GLC has been told that the Government intend to contest the effects of the court's ruling. There has never, therefore, been a time during the past 15 months when the GLC could reasonably have assumed that it was not liable to pay.

The new legislation concedes £23 million to the GLC. It will have £23 million more than the maximum amount that it might have expected. I should have thought that that was a bonus. When the Department of the Environment proposed to rate-cap in December, the position was that the direction which had been made had not been overturned. But we had conceded the £10·2 million. Therefore the reserve position of the GLC must be £12·9 million easier than when the rate cap was proposed.

Several Opposition Members asked about the surplus. The total amount that was necessary for London Regional Transport this year was not just what it spent. It was what it incurred in liabilities. It has necessarily incurred transitional costs which will now show as accrued liabilities for 1984-85 in this year's accounts. Therefore, LRT is carrying forward a reserve to meet those charges. There is nothing special about that. At the beginning of the present financial year it carried forward £24 million from the previous year. The GLC left it with that amount of money as a working reserve. The Government have left it with a similar amoount of money. LRT needs money. It is not a question of a surplus but of money that is strictly necessary for LRT.

The other point that was made was that I had overturned the judgment of the court or in some way had broken the law. I reject entirely that suggestion. The only way that a judgment can be overturned is on appeal. On this occasion I have invited the House to change the law since it turns out not to be the law that the House was led to believe it would be. I would remind the hon. Lady of the Travel Concessions (London) Act 1982, which was the result of the Bromley case. The House of Lords decided that the Greater London council did not have the power to allow concessionary fares to be paid, although it had been doing so. I suppose that the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich would say that that was disgraceful, illegal and unlawful, but the Government legislated to overturn that decision of the courts.

Mr. Dobson rose——

Mr. Ridley: No. The hon. Gentleman can sit and listen to this. He had some pretty unfair things to say to me.

Mr. Dobson: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I know that there is extreme delicacy in saying that an hon. Member is misleading the House, but I think that it would be advisable for you to suggest to the Secretary of State that he looks to what the Solicitor-General said——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. It is clear that the hon. Gentleman is raising a point of argument and not a point of order for me.

Mr. Ridley: I shall repeat the matters which seem to have caused the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) to be puzzled. There are the decisions of the courts on section 49, which we are discussing, and on whether the GLC had power to grant travel concessions. The courts found that what we believed was not the case. When the House was invited to legislate to give the GLC power to grant travel concessions in the 1982 Act, there were no accusations of impropriety and illegality, because the House was invited to change the decision of the courts. Of course there were not. I have never heard such a partial argument as that which has been advanced by the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich. I advise the House that there is no foundation for the charges which have been levelled.

The hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) said, "God help the ratepayers." It is the Government who will help them and not God. They will do so by proposing that the money resolution should be accepted by the House. If it is not, London ratepayers will pay twice for that which has been provided by London Regional Transport. There will be an uncovenanted windfall to the GLC which will not be used to the benefit of the ratepayers. They will be made to pay twice for something and they have not been told what it will be. I invite the House to support the motion.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

The House divided: Ayes 67, Noes 150.

Question accordingly negatived.
Main Question put and agreed to.
Resolved,

That provision may be made specifying as £258,179,588 the amount which the Greater London Council are to pay to London Regional Transport under section 49 of the London Regional Transport Act 1984.

Bill ordered to be brought in upon the foregoing resolution by the Chairman of Ways and Means, Mr. Nicholas Ridley, Mr. Secretary Jenkin, Mr. Peter Rees, Mr. John Moore, Mrs. Lynda Chalker, Mr. David Mitchell and Mr. Michael Spicer.

LONDON REGIONAL TRANSPORT (AMENDMENT)

Mr. Secretary Ridley accordingly presented a Bill to make provision specifying as £258,179,588 the amount which the Greater London Council are to pay to London Regional Transport under section 49 of the London Regional Transport Act 1984: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 77.]

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With the leave of the House, I will put the Question on the motions relating to statutory instruments according to subject.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 79(5) (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.).

Rating and Valuation

That the draft Water Undertakings (Rateable Values) (Scotland) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 15th January, be approved

That the draft British Waterways Board (Rateable Values) (Scotland) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 15th January, be approved.

That the draft Glasgow Underground (Rateable Values) (Scotland) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 15th January, be approved.

That the draft British Alcan Aluminium Limited and Lochaber Power Company (Rateable Values) (Scotland) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 15th January, be approved.

That the draft Scottish Electricity Boards (Rateable Values) (Scotland) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 15th January, be approved.

That the draft British Gas Corporation (Rateable Values) (Scotland) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 15th January, be approved.

That the draft British Railways Board (Rateable Values) (Scotland) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 15th January, be approved.

That the draft British Telecommunications plc (Rateable Values) (Scotland) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 15th January, be approved.

Terms and Conditions of Employment

That the draft Redundancy Payments (Variation of Rebates) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 15th January, be approved.

Libraries

That the draft Public Lending Right (Increase of Limit) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 16th January, be approved.

International Immunities and Privileges

That the draft International Union for the Protection of New Varieties of Plants (Legal Capacities) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 18th January, be approved.—[Mr. Mather.]

Question agreed to.

PETITION

Human Embryos

Mr. Tim Yeo (Suffolk, South): I beg to ask the leave of the House to present a petition signed by over 1,400 of my constituents who feel strongly about the need to enshrine in legislation protection for the human embryo as a real living individual human being, and the need to oppose those practices which violate his or her human dignity or right to life. I share their concern.

Wherefore your petitioners pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure that involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryo concerned).

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

To lie upon the Table.

Limited List Prescribing

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Mather.]

12.25 am

Mr. Thomas Torney (Bradford, South): When Nye Bevan introduced our National Health Service, he had to fight on two fronts. One was the doctors who were apprehensive about becoming civil servants and so possibly becoming subject to the dictates of some Government. The other was the Tory party. While the doctors finally agreed to become perhaps reluctant partners, they are now enthusiastic supporters of what was the finest Health Service in the world. They now believe that the welfare of patients counts before savings for the Treasury, whereas the Tory party against which in those days Nye Bevan was battling to establish this great service — from these very Benches — was opposing its establishment. It fought our Health Service every inch of the way.

The Tories have not changed. They believe now, as they did then, that only those who can afford to be sick should be allowed to be sick.

Restricting prescription strikes at the heart of our Health Service. To tell a doctor that he must take into account the patient's ability to pay before he decides what the patient needs is criminal and makes a mockery of the Prime Minister's statement:

"The Health Service is safe with us."

The National Health Service was founded by the Labour party upon the principle that the best health services should be available to all and that money should not be the passport to better or quicker treatment. The Government seek to undermine those unimpeachable principles by stealth.

I have a serious constituency problem created by those proposals. The city of Bradford has a serious unemployment problem. It has well over the national average of unemployment. Those unemployed people could never afford to pay the full price for the drugs at the chemists.

Bradford has an aging population. With the help of many of the drugs that the Government now propose to ban, people are living longer. The forecasters say that Bradford will have even more older people in the years ahead.

Those elderly folk are more likely to fall sick, often with serious and painful maladies. Many are pensioners on supplementary benefit who could never afford to purchase the drugs now prescribed for them under the National Health Service.

I have received hundreds of handwritten letters from constituents. I will quote from just a few. I apologise for any mispronunciation of chemical names as I am not a doctor. One constituent writes:

"I collected my prescription for Fybogel and was informed that the Government propose that it will be on private prescription only, from the 1st of April.

It is the only product I can have for my condition as everything else including pain killers give me a horrible itchy rash from top to toe. I am a pensioner aged sixty eight".

She complains that the cost would be too much for her to pay.

Another writes:

"I am very concerned regarding Propain tablets"

which the doctor gives her for arthritis

"as I suffer mostly in my knees and joints."

That constituent, aged 77, also complains about the high cost which she could never afford.

Another objects to the Government withdrawing the drug Gaviscon from the prescription list as he suffers from a hiatus hernia and has been told that it is "imperative that I be treated with Gaviscon or a similar drug."

He, too, is afraid that he will no longer be able to get the drug.

Another pathetic letter begins:

"To look at me now you would not tell I am arthritic, but I have suffered from Arthritis for 33 years. In that space of time I have progressed from being crippled to quite active, but believe me at times the pain is excruciating. Obviously after coping for so long I only take painkillers when really necessary.

I am only 35 yrs. old now, so if we take the average life-span I have another 35 yrs. of life left, with the distinct possibility that my Arthritis will worsen. I have faced this gruesome thought in the past, with confidence, as I have known if necessary I can take Distalgesic tablets when the pain is bad, but how can I and thousands of others now face the future, when we are given to understand we will no longer be able to obtain Distalgesic tablets on prescription?"

Many people who attend my regular surgeries tell me that their doctors have said that there is no generic alternative to the antacids asilone and mucaine, the analgesics distalgesic and equagesic or the laxative dobinex.

Branded drugs are made by reputable companies to the highest standards, backed by years of research at very high cost. Generic drugs may not be made by reputable companies. They may be produced in the far east or in eastern European countries. They may be sold cheaply without the Government safeguards and inspections that we have here. Will the National Health Service compensate patients if something goes wrong?

Another example of lack of consideration by the Department is the fact that only one benzodiazepine has been left in the Government formula — diazepam, otherwise known as valium.

I have it on the best authority that medical opinion is very concerned about the effects of the continued use of valium over a prolonged period. There are newer, more effective and less harmful drugs that could be used, but the Government have taken them off the list.

I have had letters galore from doctors, health authorities, community health councils and, above all, the BMA, all condemning the Government's pernicious scheme.

Mr. Tim Yeo (Suffolk, South): Is not valium some 14 times more expensive than a clinically identical substitute? Does the hon. Gentleman seriously suggest that the Government should, by including valium on the list, waste resources that could be used elsewhere in the NHS?

Mr. Torney: The hon. Gentleman cannot have listened to what I said. I said that valium is one of the few drugs that has been left on the list, although there are newer——

Mr. Yeo: It is not.

Mr. Torney: That is my information. [Interruption.] Conservative Members may scream as much as they like, but I have it on good medical authority that valium is on the list, although there are newer and better drugs. The medical profession does not like valium because of the danger to the patients if it is used for a long time.

In 1982, the informal working group on effective prescribing reported to the Secretary of State for Social Services. According to the report,

"There are in the region of 6,500 preparations available for prescribing at NHS expense and the new BNF lists some 4,500 of these. In comparison, the average prescriber is said to use a range of 200-300 drugs. A number of schemes for the introduction of a national Limited List of drugs has been proposed at various times by different people. We have considered these, but it is our view that a limitation on prescribing at NHS expense would be interpreted by some doctors as an attempt to curtail their clinical freedom. Since we have not seen any convincing evidence that suggested financial benefits would outweigh the administrative problems in drawing-up and maintaining the list, we have concluded that such a move would not be justified and we do not recommend any measures to introduce nationwide a Limited List."

On 9 January 1985, a resolution of the BMA council stated that

"The Government's intention to limit by Regulation the range of drugs available for prescription on the NHS from 1 April 1985 is in our opinion contrary to the spirit of the NHS Act. The Act lays a duty on the Secretary of State to provide a comprehensive health service, including the supply of proper and sufficient medicines ordered by a medical practitioner, free of charge except in so far as charges (e.g. prescription charges) are made under any enactment."

Between 8 December 1983 and 8 November 1984, there was a complete reversal of Government policy. There were no discussions or consultations, and no evidence was produced to explain the reversal of policy. The objections raised by the Department to the introduction of a limited list are still valid and the controversy that followed the announcement on 8 November 1984 proved the accuracy of the conclusion in the departmental paper that the introduction of a limited list would cast doubt on the Government's intentions towards the standard of provision of general medical services in the NHS.

Last but not least, the list makes for double standards in the Health Service. Those who can afford it can have the best that the drug industry can offer, but people who, like most of my constituents in Bradford, are poor, members of a low income group, dependent on pensions or benefits are condemned to suffer pain and hardship for the rest of their lives, and perhaps early death, simply because they cannot afford to pay for the drugs that are available and so that the Tory Government can save money, perhaps to give tax cuts to the better off.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I congratulate the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Torney) on his good fortune in the ballot, but I cannot say that I believe that he has made constructive use of it. With respect, his speech on our limited list proposals, on which we are still consulting, comprised an amazing amount of cant and nonsense.

The hon. Gentleman gave his version of the origins of the National Health Service and claimed that we are trying to change it into a service in which treatment is dependent on a patient's means, or ability to afford better treatment. Most of the objections to our proposals come from commercial and professional lobbies, which have obviously spent some of their time briefing the hon. Gentleman. They are perfectly entitled to lobby. The professional interests involved are extremely respectable people such as the British Medical Association. Whatever reasons might be raised against our proposals, I hope to persuade the hon. Gentleman, and anyone else who shares his feelings, that the argument that we face a two-tier service or that the poor and the elderly are threatened with suffering is misplaced.

[Mr. Kenneth Clarke]

To illustrate his point that elderly patients are at risk, the hon. Gentleman drew heavily on many letters that he has received from patients citing the drugs that they are using. It is obvious that they are not altogether spontaneous letters, because they are written in terms about the drugs that would not ordinarily come immediately to elderly patients. They cite the drugs that they are taking, and most patients do not know the professional name of drugs. Some of the names were given inaccurately, as though a layman was doing his best to give the name. It is quite obvious that, within the hon. Gentleman's constituency, there are some doctors who have been carrying out what I regard as an unethical and unscrupulous campaign by alarming their patients and telling them to lobby their Member of Parliament because they face the risk of pain and suffering because the Government are threatening to withdraw a drug.

A doctor is quite entitled to campaign against any part of the Government's proposals for the NHS if he wants to. We have invited every doctor to make his professional views known to the chief medical officer if he criticises the list that the Government have proposed. It is not right for doctors to alarm patients, such as those who have been writing letters in Bradford, by combining political campaigning with medical advice, thus inspiring patients to write what I accept are heart-rending letters in the hope that the Government will be pressurised into change.

I hope that, faced with these problems, the hon. Gentleman will show his usual concern for his constituents by trying to reassure them and by telling doctors that this is no way in which to conduct a sensible political debate. The hon. Gentleman should tell doctors in his area to respond to the request that they have had. If they are worried about the effect on patients of any changes in the drugs available, they should give their considered opinion, as forcefully as they like, to Ministers and the chief medical officer—our adviser.

The hon. Gentleman has obviously leapt on the opportunity that is provided by the letters to stoke up fears and alarm among the elderly and the poor in his constituency. He is lending himself to an unscrupulous campaign. I strongly regret that he and some of the doctors in his constituency have set about things in that way. If he will not reassure people in Bradford, it is obviously my duty to do so. The Government have no intention of debarring any of the poor or elderly from the treatment, free if necessary, under the NHS that they require. We have every intention that under the NHS it should be possible for doctors and patients to have access to a complete list of preparations, which is sufficient to cope with all the clinical and medical needs of the service.

Mr. Torney: When the right hon. and learned Gentleman said that my constituents would not know the names of their drugs, is he aware that when a doctor gives a patient a presciption to take to the chemist, in 99 out of 100 cases the chemist will write the name of the drug on the bottle for the patient to read? Some old people have been taking a drug for so long that they are well aware of the name of it. How does the Minister account for the fact that the BMA is opposed to the list—surely he does not doubt its bona fides?

Mr. Clarke: The BMA is opposed to the list for a variety of reasons. Some sections of the BMA are advising doctors to campaign in the way that has clearly taken place in Bradford. In some parts of the country pre-prepared letters are presented to patients when they visit their doctor, on which the name of the drug is written by the doctor so that the patient can send it to his Member of Parliament.

Mr. Torney: These are all hand-written letters.

Mr. Clarke: Those are obviously all hand-written letters, but, if the hon. Gentleman explores further, he will discover that one, or probably more than one, practice in Bradford has been inspiring patients in a subtle and varied way to write to him complaining about the proposals. I am not saying that such doctors are bad. All doctors have been asked to give their considered professional opinion, if they wish, to the chief medical officer about a proposal to limit the range of drugs in certain therapeutic categories that will be prescribable on the NHS. Doctors would have been better advised to give their professional opinion and to reserve judgment until they see the final proposals that will be published shortly. It was not right of doctors to campaign in such a way as to cause alarm and anxiety — the hon. Gentleman admitted that — to many frightened elderly patients who had visited the surgery for treatment, reassurance and help.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): Is it not a fact that the total number of letters received by the DHSS from our doctors in practice amounts to no more than 2 per cent. of doctors and that 1,800 of them either mention a particular commodity or make warm comments about the proposals?

Mr. Clarke: I am not sure of the precise percentage, but I accept that my hon. Friend may well be right. Certainly we have had 1,800 letters from doctors giving constructive comments on the contents of the list and saying which preparations they would like to see on the list, as it was suggested all those concerned should do.

We have not issued a final and definitive list, but a proposal that in certain therapeutic categories it would be wise for the service to restrict the total number of products available because at present the NHS provides a large number of similar, and sometimes identical, products at varying prices. We saw the possibility of making substantial savings for the NHS by restricting that range to the full list that is required to deal with all patients' clinical needs. We therefore issued a list for discussion, and have received the 1,800 responses that I mentioned, and many others from pharmacists and companies in the pharmaceutical industry. The chief medical officer and a panel of distinguished outside experts from all the specialties and areas affected by the proposals are considering what the final list should be. Nothing has yet been taken from the list. Any patient who is told, as the hon. Gentleman was told, that his drug will definitely not be available after 1 April has been misled, because no decisions have been taken about what drugs will be available on 1 April. Anyone who discovers when the final list emerges that the brand of product to which he is used is not available will also discover that the alternative is an equally effective drug, which will do the medical job required at somewhat less cost to the National Health Service.

I cannot emphasise too much the fact that there is no motive to introduce a two-tier service, thus driving patients to buy their health care, or any of the bizarre theories advanced by the hon. Gentleman. What we are doing here is what we are doing throughout the Health Service — seeking sensible economies that do not adversely affect patient care. We are seeking better value for money for the resources that we put into the National Health Service. We are increasingly trying to maximise the patient care that we obtain for the money that we spend. If we can save up to £100 million on the drugs bill without damaging patients, that will enable us to sustain the increased expenditure on the Health Service that we are planning for next year and the two years beyond that.

The subject of cutting drug costs has been examined for some time, including, in 1982, by the expert committee that produced the report cited by the hon. Gentleman, which is usually known as the Greenfield report. In all the discussions that we have had about drugs costs, one thing unites the Government, the BMA, the vast bulk of the medical profession and the pharmacists: everyone is agreed that it is legitimate to consider ways of reducing the drugs bill. Anyone who is interested in the NHS appreciates that it is undesirable that our drugs bill has continued to increase at the rate that it has. It is increasing by more than 5 per cent. above the general rate of inflation each year, and is now £1,400 million in total. The number of preparations and prescriptions is increasing, as is the cost per prescription. If that money continues to be drawn into an ever-increasing drugs bill, it will be more difficult for the Health Service to maintain other services. Everyone has co-operated in searching for ways to reduce drugs costs.

The Greenfield committee considered various methods, and recommended the system known as generic substitution. I will not burden the House with the details of that tonight, because it is not the issue raised by the hon. Member for Bradford, South. The Government rejected it because of the immense damage that it would have done to the British pharmaceutical industry, and because it was opposed by the British Medical Association. The BMA believed that it would create considerable difficulties if a doctor prescribed one drug and the pharmacist dispensed another. It was worried about instances of a doctor prescribing a drug and never knowing what the pharmacist eventually dispensed to the patient as the cheapest generic equivalent.

It is true, as the hon. Gentleman said, that the Greenfield report mentioned a limited list, and he fairly and accurately quoted the terms, saying that the committee was aware of it. It believed that some doctors would argue that their clinical freedom would be threatened if such a list were introduced. However, only some would do so, because it is extending the concept of clinical freedom a little far to say that it means that not only should doctors have the full ability to treat all the clinical needs of their patients, but that they should be able to prescribe any product on the market at any price, even though a cheaper alternative may be available.

The Greenfield report rejected a limited list because there was no evidence that financial savings could be made. Since 1982, we have done substantially more work on that aspect. We have considered experience here and abroad, and international experience is very enlightening. We realised that the paucity of evidence could be remedied. When one considers the experience abroad, it is plain that, although no country has exactly the same provisions for drugs as Britain does—every country has variants in drug pricing and policies—but every one of the Western developed countries has some element of selection of products and some element of listing of drugs in its health care policy.

More to the point, we are certainly the only country with our present system whereby every product that obtains a licence can come on to the market at a price determined by the manufacturing company and is immediately available for prescription by any doctor in the National Health Service, paid for by the taxpayer without question. The number of products available under the NHS has gone up to 18,000 and doctors can select any one of those.

I believe that the list we are producing will eventually be seen by doctors as useful guidance, based on the work of an expert panel which has sifted through all the advice we have received from the professions and set out a full list that will allow doctors to deal with all needs in these limited categories of drugs. Two thirds of the drugs we are talking about can be bought over the chemist's counter without a doctor's prescription, anyway. The prescription-only drugs are largely the tranquillisers, which are often criticised — the benzodiazepines, many people have argued, are over-prescribed in this country and not always prescribed carefully. Valium is a criticised drug and is not on our provisional list, contrary to what the hon. Gentleman asserts.

We will look at all the drugs and select those which are essential to patients out of the very wide range of very similar tranquillisers available on the Health Service at the moment, and similarly with sedatives and some sleeping pills. But we have very carefully confined the categories of drugs we are dealing with. We have not touched the life-saving drugs; we have not touched many of the more advanced areas. We believe that we can safely introduce a system within this section of the drugs Bill that does not adversely affect patients and saves money for the Health Service.

We are the real friends of the Health Service, by improving its efficiency and its cost-effectiveness, and making sure that its resources are devoted to patient care. The hon. Gentleman is rehearsing old arguments, old prejudices. He has not got any ground for rehearsing them on this occasion. He has been misled by a commercial campaign and the rather odd behaviour of some of his doctors into believing that there is a cause to be pursued here, which I believe, when he thinks about it more carefully, he will realise should not have been pursued on this particular ground.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at five minutes to One o'clock.

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Orders of the Day

Wildlife and Countryside (Amendment) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

9.35 am

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

It gives me great pleasure to move the Second Reading of this Bill. I am pleased that the House is reasonably full on this Friday morning. It is often perplexing to many people that we, who represent a very urban society, always devote great time, effort and care to discussing rural, wildlife and countryside matters. I think that it is no exaggeration to say that this private Member's Bill has probably resulted in the heaviest mailbags that some hon. Members have had for many a long year. However, I do not apologise for that, because it shows the interest that exists throughout the country for the careful preservation of our countryside.

However, we should not be surprised that our countryside is threatened. As the Minister has said, the forces of agriculture have changed dramatically in the past 30 years and we must ensure that we have the legislation not to inhibit agriculture—obviously farmers must do their job and the countryside cannot be "fossilised"—but to ensure that we do not allow the unbridled progress of agriculture completely to destroy our countryside and environment.

As we have so little countryside, we must ensure that it is of a high quality. As a small, densely populated nation, it is incumbent upon us to ensure that we get the balance right. Because there is so much congestion, we often find that the countryside comes right in to many of our towns. I represent, and live in, one of the most highly urbanised parts of the country, the Tyne and Wear metropolitan county. In that small, densely populated county, we have no fewer than 383 miles of footpaths, and 23 sites of special scientific interest, with a further eight in the pipeline. That is an example of how the countryside encroaches on our towns, and I think that that is why both Opposition Members, representing largely urban areas, and Conservative Members, representing rural and mixed areas, are concerned about the issue. That is the background to the Bill.

The Bill seeks to amend the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, which was founded on the basis of co-operation and consultation. There was a belief that the problems and conflicts within our countryside could be resolved by negotiation and conciliation. It would be less than honest if I did not say that some of us were at least sceptical about that approach and even now have doubts about it. Given the situation, and the fact that the Act is four years old, we may feel that some forms of planning controls are necessary. But that is not the path that we are pursuing today. Today I am attempting to persuade the House to amend, add to and build upon the basis of that 1981 Act. I move the Second Reading in that spirit of co-operation and conciliation.

We should like to be converted to the idea that conservation could be attained without this legislation. In drawing up the Bill, I felt that I should take the philosophy of the 1981 Act as its basis. I apologise for the fact that that has meant that the process has been long and slow and that we were, therefore, not able to bring the Bill to the House until Monday. That has meant, however, that it is an agreed Bill and that hundreds of man hours have been spent in drawing it up. I doubt whether any other Bill dealing with the wildlife and countryside has been presented to the House with such wide backing not only from the House but from those concerned with the countryside.

I was pleased to receive a letter signed by most of the active noble Lords saying that they will not attempt to alter the Bill, apart from any amendments made in this House. Of course, the noble Lords can do what they want, but 20 or 30 of the main Lords have given me that pledge. That is useful, because it means the Bill is manageable. That support negates one of the Government's main arguments against introducing it. The Government argue that countryside matters are not manageable. I believe that they are manageable, and I hope to prove that in this Bill.

We have the backing of the National Farmers Union, the Country Landowners Association, all the amenity societies represented in Wildlife Link, the Ramblers Association, the Open Spaces Society and the Nature Conservancy Council, which is the Government's adviser. I was delighted to receive yesterday a telex from the chairman of the Countryside Commission — another Government adviser—saying that his commissioners had met yesterday in Bristol and had decided to endorse the Bill fully.

As if those credentials were not sufficient to show the breadth of the Bill's backing, I was delighted to note the support of the Environment Select Committee. I pay tribute to the Committee's members, including many of those present in the Chamber. I am pleased that the Committee's Chairman, the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi), is present, and I know that he will probably try to catch your eye, Mr. Speaker, to make his point. I am pleased also that the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) is here, because he supports my Bill and has worked hard to achieve consensus.

It is difficult to imagine a body interested in the countryside which does not support the Bill. I hope that I am wrong in saying this, but there have been strong rumours that one body of opinion opposes the Bill. I hope that the Under-Secretary of State will reassure the House that the Government do not intend to oppose the Bill. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will tell the House that he not only supports clause 2 but realises that this is a minimum and agreed Bill supported by his advisers and all the countryside bodies. This Bill must not be decimated.

[Dr. David Clark]

I hope that the rumours and press leaks saying that the Bill is opposed by the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food are wrong. If those rumours are true, the Minister will be doing a great disservice to the House and to the countryside.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Will my hon. Friend note for the record that, despite the posturing on environmental affairs outside the House by the alliance, alliance Members have not even bothered to attend this debate and hear my hon. Friend's major contribution?

Dr. Clark: The House will note that no member of the Social Democratic party or Liberal party is in the House. That is not surprising. Alliance members occasionally turn up—all four, so to speak—often in the middle of the night. I regret that they are not here today. The Bill has two sponsors among those parties, and I should have liked them to be here today to show us their support. The House and the nation will judge them on their record. I do not want to cast aspersions on them or speculate about why they are not here.

I take seriously one point made in the report by the Select Committee on the Environment. I believe that there has been a general improvement in certain aspects—notably in the attitude of the farming lobby. The National Farmers Union has acted in an exemplary manner towards this legislation. Their assistance in creating the farm and wildlife advisory groups has been a great support. I am more optimistic today than I was four years ago, and we want to build on that optimism. That is why I took so much trouble in trying to achieve such a breadth of support for the legislation.

I do not believe that any hon. Member is surprised to note that the farmers and countryside people support the environment. It is their environment and most of them love the countryside. We should not be surprised, therefore, that the NFU and its supporters support the Bill.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle (Lincoln): The hon. Gentleman deserves great praise for getting the NFU so involved in the Bill. It is encouraging to note that, for the first time, the NFU has openly declared that all farmers must seek a balance between production and conservation in the countryside.

Dr. Clark: I happily agree with that point. Without hesitation, I pay tribute to the NFU and the Country Landowners Association, which have tried hard to bring the Bill forward. I am grateful for the time and effort their officers have put into drawing up the Bill. Although the majority of farmers try to conserve the countryside, there are mavericks. I guess that most of those mavericks are not members of the NFU, but I hope that the union will monitor the activities of those who are members of the NFU.

Statutory authorities in rural areas are often dominated by the farming community, and naturally they are reluctant to act against recalcitrant farmers. For example, in the county of Northumberland on two occasions during the past 18 months Farmer Benson was caught polluting a burn, with the result that trout were killed. I have it in writing from the Northumbrian water authority that that farmer was responsible for that pollution, but that the authority was not prepared to take action against farmers. I believe that whoever pollutes a stream—whether he is a farmer or an industrialist—must be punished. I hope that the message will go out from the House that, although we want to work in a spirit of co-operation, people must adhere to the law. That same farmer—he is certainly a maverick—erected a gate across one of the county roads and put up a sign: "Private. Keep Out." Fortunately, Northumberland county council is Labour-controlled and would not stand for this. The sign was quickly taken down.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor (Upminster): The hon. Gentleman can rely in general on the support of farmers and Conservative Members. It would be helpful, however, if he refrained from making too many strongly party political points. It is wrong to suggest that Conservative-controlled councils do not take action against such farmers. The hon. Gentleman is wrong to try to make the point that only Labour-controlled councils are prepared to take such action.

Dr. Clark: I did not want to be too party political but the Labour party is particularly proud that it controls Northumberland and the five northern counties. I apologise to the hon. Member if he thought that I was trying to make a party political point. There are recalcitrant farmers, and we all know that.

Sir John Farr (Harborough): It might help the hon. Gentleman and the House if the hon. Gentleman addressed the House from one of the empty Liberal Benches. He would be able to adopt a more impartial policy there.

Dr. Clark: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman made that point. I hope that he was trying to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the Liberal benches were empty. A Liberal representative—the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes)—has just come into the Chamber. I happen to be the Labour party spokesman on the natural environment and my Bill has the full backing of my colleagues on this side of the House.

I know that the hon. Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) is a fair man, but I must remind him that on two occasions last year the Opposition formally offered the Government our co-operation in amending the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981. I do not want to labour that point, but the offer was not taken up. As the hon. Member is aware, the Government were not prepared to make time for it. No Conservative Member was prepared to take up the matter—I am not making a party political point—so I took it up.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): If Labour Members wanted to make a party political point, they would want something much stronger. They accept that my hon. Friend has put forward the Bill in a spirit of compromise because it is essential that we make some immediate progress on this matter. If the matter were left to us, we would be aiming for a much stronger measure.

Dr. Clark: I agree with my hon. Friend. We are discussing the Wildlife and Countryside (Amendment) Bill which has been introduced in a spirit of reconciliation. It has wide backing from amenity and farming bodies. We must recognise that there are still problems. I have identified one of them. Such problems must be tackled.

My second main worry—I am making a general, not a party political, point—is that, while the NFU and the vast majority of farmers support the Bill, the main objections appear to be coming from the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. One can only surmise that, because one is not privy to what goes on in the Cabinet and its committees.

I understand that the Ministry is reluctant to take any action which might inhibit it, but it has made noises which suggest that it wants to try to extend environmental control of the countryside. The Bill is a way to do that. That is my second caveat.

I shall run through the main clauses. Clause 1 deals with the badgers. I have sought to amend section 11 of the Act, which deals with the control and killing of wild animals. Many of us thought that the badger problem had been overcome. My hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) got a Bill through the House with the support of Conservative Members, and we thought that the problems had been overcome by the Badgers Act 1973 and the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981. Unfortunately, they were not. It is illegal to take and kill badgers. If people are caught doing that they are punished. However, there have been too many cases lately where people have been caught digging badger setts, but they claim, time and time again, that they were not doing that. I have details of a case in Gosforth park nature reserve in my region where young men all aged about 22 were caught digging a badger sett. It was not possible to convict them, because they claimed that they were not digging for badgers. On occasion, people have been found with fox cubs to try to show that they were digging for foxes.

Such cases have caused many people a great deal of anxiety, because badger digging and baiting is a nasty pastime. I am sure that the House agrees with that statement. Therefore, anything that we can do to tighten up that legislation is welcome. It is a complicated subject to tackle. I am pleased to say that the Home Office has helped me. The Home Secretary saw a deputation of which I was not a member, and offered general support to try to tighten up the legislation. The clause was given to me by the Home Office. I am grateful for its assistance and the time it gave me to try to get this point right.

If the Bill receives a Second Reading, the House may wish, as it has the right, to amend it in Committee. I wish to emphasise that the draft of the clause was given to me by the Home Office. It spent many hours in consultation with interested bodies and its legal experts to try to come up with the right formula. The purpose of the clause is to block the existing loophole and to put the onus of proof on the defence to show that people were not digging for badgers. That is the only way to block the loophole. We are of course prepared to listen to other views in Committee.

Mr. Nicholas Lyell (Mid-Bedfordshire): I support the hon. Gentleman's broad objective of trying to tighten up the Badgers Act 1973. If he studies the clause carefully, he will notice that there is a serious mistake in it—as drafted, it does not seek to change the onus of proof, and it would be a grave mistake to make that its objective. The clause seeks to introduce the concept of recklessness, which will be helpful in stamping out badger baiting. That is what the hon. Gentleman should seek to do.

Dr. Clark: I am grateful to the hon. and learned Gentleman for making that point. He is parliamentary private secretary to the Attorney-General, so he will have studied the matter. He will be aware that there have been wide consultations among Government Departments on the point. However, of course we shall listen to such points and discuss them in Committee. He is almost certainly right in what he says. That is our objective, and if the form of words is incorrect, it is the one that I received from the Home Office.

Clause 2 is one for which I believe there is overwhelming support; even the Minister is keen. This clause was given to me by the Department of the Environment. It spent many weeks on this clause, which is incredibly complicated. We hope that it blocks the loopholes contained in sections 28 and 29 of the original Act. It provides that, once a site is notified as a designated site, it is protected. There is no loophole. As hon. Members are aware, 14 or 15 sites of special scientific interest have been destroyed as a result of loopholes in those sections. I thank the Government for their help with the clause. I do not need to spell out the need for it, because all hon. Members are aware of it. I hope that the clause will receive overwhelming support.

Clause 3 relates to marine nature reserves. When we discussed the Wildlife and Countryside Bill, there was a feeling that as an island nation we should have some marine nature reserves. It is disappointing that we have not been able to create any. Seven were suggested. Some of them were apparently innocuous—for example, around Lundy island, which is a bird reserve. We were unable to reach agreement on that. When I and my advisers considered the matter, we realised that people thought that the Act was too cumbersome. It gave the power of veto to a number of interested bodies.

No one would deny that interested bodies have a right to be consulted, but I am not sure that they should have the right to veto something of national interest. It would be unheard of in any other sphere of life for one vested interest to have the right of veto. We want interested bodies to be consulted, but the Minister will have the power to make the final decision in the interests of marine nature conservation. I feel that that is the right way to do this, as we might then get some marine nature reserves.

Clause 4 is one of the most important. It deals with the duties of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. We have heard many hot words from the Ministry about how it wants to do something to further conservation, and it has a duty to do so. I have already paid tribute to the wildlife advisory groups and I know the effort that the Ministry has made. I know what it does and that it is trying hard, but there comes a time when we legislators have to give officials a little push. The whole point about bureaucrats and the official machinery is that their own inertia keeps them where they are. It is up to us, as parliamentarians, to give officials a shove in the right direction.

Clause 4 builds on a section in the original Act by which water authorities were required to take account of nature conservation and the environment when carrying out their duties. The clause is taking the Government's form of words and intentions on water authorities and extending them to the Forestry Commission in clause 6 and to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in clause 4. People expect this clause to go through.

The hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle) made the point earlier that our agriculture Acts are largely based on the Agriculture Act 1947, which was introduced to try to overcome food shortages in Britain, Europe and the world. We live in a different world now, and, although it is important to produce food — that is the vital role of agriculture — we must at the same time protect our environment. That is almost equally important. As the general public — urban as well as rural — gives a fair subsidy to the agriculture industry, the Minister should listen to the voice of the nation on this point.

I hope that clause 4 will influence the philosophy of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in the making of grants to farmers, in the provision of advice, which is important because we are talking about conservation and conciliation, and in the Minister's consultations on EC matters. We are told that grants cannot be given because of EC rules, but I am advised that the Dutch Government take a different view. I know that the Minister is interested in, and supports us on, this point. If, when he went to Brussels, he could say that we have domestic legislation that requires us to take into account, and further nature conservation, that would help him in his negotiations.

Clause 5 is also important. As hon. Members know, national park authorities are required to map moors and heathlands. That has been a success, with the one problem of some inconsistency, because each local authority has to judge for itself what is moor and heathland. We felt — we had the support of everybody in this — that the mapping should be extended to cover a wider area, and to cover those areas that it is particularly important to conserve. The decision of the National Parks Authority as to which areas it should map will be taken in consultation with the Countryside Commission so that there is some uniformity, bearing in mind the different characteristics of the national parks.

I want my final point to ring loud and clear from the House today. We are discussing a consensus Bill—that cannot be said too firmly. It has been agreed by all interested parties. I believe that it represents the broad wishes not only of the House but of the overwhelming majority of people. The only rumours — whiffs — of opposition seem to be coming from the Government. I hope that they will listen to voices in the House and will be able to acknowledge that there is a tide of opinion so great that the Bill is the minimum that people will accept. It is less than the Select Committee suggested. I hope that the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, if he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will make it plain that the Government, subject to technical amendments to ensure that the clauses are correct, will accept that this is the right Bill and should have not only a Second Reading but the blessing of the Government in Committee.

10.4 am

Sir Hugh Rossi (Hornsey and Wood Green): I begin by congratulating the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clarke) on his success in the ballot. This is a matter of some envy for me, because, in my 18 years in the House, on the only one occasion that I have been successful in the ballot a general election was called in the middle of the Committee stage. We are glad to note that the hon. Member is at no risk from that.

I also thank the hon. Gentleman for his choice of a Bill giving effect to some of the main recommendations of the Select Committee report on the "Operation and Effectiveness of Part II of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981". The report identified a number of defects in the Act which were admitted to by officials in the Department of the Environment when giving their evidence. However, they told us that no Government time could be made available in this Session for introducing the necessary legislation. Therefore, sites of special scientific interest would continue to remain at very high risk but for the hon. Gentleman's initiative in introducing the Bill.

In passing—this is a matter for the House—it is a pity that urgent legislation such as this has to depend on the lottery of a private Member's Bill. It is sheer coincidence that the Select Committee's inquiry, with the evidence that it was making available, was virtually concluded at the same time as there happened to be an available successful Member in the ballot with a particular interest in this subject. Perhaps the House will consider enabling its Select Committees to promote legislation and to make time available in similar circumstances should they arise again.

Clause 1 deals with badgers, a subject which was not considered by the Select Committee, as it falls outside part II of the Act. However, I am sure that the Committee, if it had considered the matter, would have wished to afford greater protection to badgers than exists at the present. However, I was a little alarmed by the explanatory memorandum to the Bill, which suggests that the burden of proof should shift from the prosecution to the defence because that would imply that we were abrogating a time-honoured principle that a man is presumed innocent until proved guilty. The House will have to think carefully before abrogating one of the most fundamental of principles affecting the liberty of citizens. I was reassured to hear in the exchanges which took place between the hon. Member for South Shields and my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyell) that this is not necessarily the case. Perhaps the explanatory memorandum is wrong, but if that is not so that can be cured in Committee.

Clause 2 is most welcome because it closes what is known as the three-month loophole under section 28. This allows a farmer to damage or destroy an SSSI in the three-month period immediately after receiving a notice from the Nature Conservancy Council, but before formal notification. Many witnesses before our Committee expressed anxiety and gave examples of damage that could be caused, and, in some instances, was caused. I am delighted that the Bill follows the recommendations that the first notice takes effect as if it were formal notification and removes the pre-notification period while allowing the farmer the same time in which to object. However, I regret that the Bill does not follow the Select Committee's recommendation about closing the loopholes in section 29 of the Act.

A similar lacuna to that in section 28 results from the time that it takes the Department of the Environment to consider and prepare nature conservancy orders applicable to sites of special scientific interest which are of national importance. These sites remain vulnerable during the period before an order is made. During that period a farmer may, without fear of sanction, damage or destroy an SSSI of particular national significance. I appreciate that extending the period from three to four months for a potentially damaging operation affords a modest amount of protection as extending the period in which counter action may be taken by making an order.

However, many of the witnesses who appeared before the Select Committee favoured the use of a temporary stop order while a section 29 order was being prepared. The Committee recommended accordingly. It noted that the intentions of the Department were not sufficiently clear. This was recorded in paragraph 28 of the Select Committee's report. It seems that the hon. Gentleman has allowed the Department to distract his attention from imposing a completely watertight closure of the loophole. I hope that he will give further study to this very technical matter during the Committee stage, when he will have been able to make a closer study of evidence to the Select Committee.

Dr. David Clark: As the hon. Gentleman knows, I raised this point with the Department of the Environment. It is a very complicated matter. In the end we had to use diagrams. I have been assured that this loophole is closed. If it is not, we shall seek to close it at the Committee stage.

Sir Hugh Rossi: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, but I fear that there may still be gaps through which people can slip, and I think that it would be better to deal with the matter by means of a temporary stop order. There will then be no problems.

Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I have misunderstood what he is seeking to do, but clause 2(7) seems to create problems. Under this subsection a farmer can make an agreement with the Nature Conservancy Council not to carry out specified operations without obtaining consent. As far as I recall, this was not suggested by any witness who gave evidence to the Select Committee. If my understanding of the subsection is correct, a farmer gives notice that he wishes to carry out a potentially damaging operation under section 28 of the Act. He then agrees to carry it out only if he has obtained consent under the proposed new subsection (6A). He can follow this up by cancelling the agreement that he has made, under the new subsection (6B). If he cancels the agreement in this way he will be entitled to carry out his potentially damaging operation. Therefore, a clever farmer could reduce the four-month protection period to just over one month. I hope that I am wrong in my interpretation of the clause, but I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to that possible further loophole which may unwittingly have been created by the way in which the subsection has been drafted.

Clause 3 gives me particular satisfaction. The failure to create marine nature reserves under the 1981 Act was a matter upon which the Committee received a great deal of evidence. This failure caused great disappointment and acute concern. It was clear from the evidence we received that the Nature Conservancy Council had insufficient powers in the face of determined opposition by the sea fisheries committees and the reluctance of the Ministery of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to intervene. Witnesses posited three possible solutions to the deadlock which had been reached. I note that the hon. Gentleman has decided to go down the route of a weak SSSI-type designation. The evidence that we received from departmental officials showed that this was possibly the most inappropriate route, because SSSIs are all about management and management agreements, whereas marine nature reserves are about regulation and control. Emphasis should be placed upon byelaws and the power of the NCC to initiate those byelaws so as to enable the Secretary of State in appropriate cases to override the obstacles raised by the fisheries committees. That is a point which the hon. Gentleman may wish to reconsider in Committee.

Clause 4 is the Bill's most far-reaching clause. It brings together several recommendations in the Select Committee's report which have attracted the greatest public attention. It requires the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to further wildlife habitat and countryside conservation in the exercise of his duties. It imposes a positive duty which does not at present exist to the extent that was wished for by the majority of witnesses. In paragraph 24 of the Select Committee's report we noted that not only conservation groups but farmers and landowners want agricultural policy to place more emphasis upon conservation.

We also noted that there had been a welcome shift of emphasis in MAFF, but that it had not moved far enough nor fast enough. This is quite understandable. The whole ethos of MAFF, certainly during the majority of the post-war years, has been to increase farming efficiency and productivity in the interests of the nation. However, this has been at the expense of the countryside. As the National Farmers Union told us, the change would involve a major retraining policy by MAFF.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave), who gave evidence for the Department of the Environment, told us:

> "It would be easier if MAFF grants were not available for some things that may be damaging environmentally."

This view was supported by the NFU and the Country Landowners Association. The Committee therefore recommended a fundamental change in the approach by MAFF so as to redirect resources towards conservation-conscious methods of farming. The Bill also picks up the specific recommendation that conservation should be a greatly increased priority in the work of ADAS, the agricultural advisory service for farmers.

I am not quite sure of the extent of the several exhortations to MAFF in the latter part of the clause. However, there will still be a need, in accordance with recommendation 4 of the report, to set up a working party to investigate how the duties and structure of MAFF could incorporate a strong conservation element in all agricultural policies. Recommendation 5 of the report is that the Government should urgently undertake a review of the whole use of the rural estate and produce a White Paper. These recommendations are not legislative matters. They are for administrative action. However, I thought it only right to emphasise this aspect of the matter in view of the evidence which so clearly emerged from all those who had an interest in the countryside. The Select Committee made similar observations concerning the Forestry Commission because of the weakness of its conservation policy. That has now been corrected by clause 6.

Sir John Farr: As a country boy, I am following my hon. Friend closely, as he speaks with the benefit of a good deal of experience, but surely he is not suggesting that the main duty of the Ministry of Agriculture should be in the direction of conservation rather than the improvement of agricultural efficiency.

Sir Hugh Rossi: If I gave that impression, I wish to correct it at once. If my hon. Friend studies the Select Committee report he will see that we seek a better balance between the need to produce food and the need to conserve the countryside. Our criticism has been that in the past the thrust was entirely in one direction, to the detriment of the countryside. We suggest that conservation should be considered by MAFF in overall policy matters.

Clause 5 carries out the recommendations for the mapping of moors and heaths. Thus, every clause, except clause 1, follows one or several recommendations of the Select Committee. As I have said, some of the recommendations are not capable of legislation but require administrative action — also, for instance, financial guidelines in respect of management agreements for SSSIs. Others, such as the section 29 loophole and landscape conservation orders in national parks, however, are capable of legislation, although I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's anxiety not to risk losing his Bill by being overambitious and insisting on too much from the point of view of the Department.

Despite my wish for further consideration of certain matters, I regard this as a most welcome Bill and I congratulate and thank the hon. Gentleman once again for introducing it. I am also gratified to know that the hard work of all the members of my Committee has been of some help to the hon. Gentleman in doing that. I look forward very much to the Bill reaching the statute book.

Mr. Ron Davies (Caerphilly): I too congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) on his preparation of the Bill. I am glad that the Chairman of the Select Committee has welcomed it so warmly, and I hope that he and many of his hon. Friends will join us in the Lobby in the event of a Division.

I am, however, disappointed that the initiative has had to come from a private Member. Members who have spoken in various environment and Adjournment debates during the last 12 months have shown the depth and breadth of the consensus in favour of change. One would have hoped for an initiative from the Department of the Environment, perhaps jointly with the Ministry of Agriculture, so that wider proposals could be implemented. I appreciate that discussion would have been necessary and the Department might have seen fit to issue a Green Paper on its proposals before intiating a policy change. It is disappointing to have to rely on a private Member to introduce legislation of this kind.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Shields referred to the consensus. We are all aware of the pressure both from the unorganised public and from amenity groups. Reference has been made to the change in attitude in the agricultural community and to the development in the philosophy of the National Farmers Union. The Country Landowners Association has also welcomed the Bill. Conservative Members may be interested to know that the CLA has said in relation to the operation of the 1981 Act:

"we accept that its continued success depends on closing loopholes in the legislation which are found to exist."

The Bill must be considered in the light of that. My hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) spoke for many Opposition Members when he said that if the Bill had been introduced in a politically partisan spirit we should have sought far stronger and more detailed legislation, but we accept that in a private Member's Bill we must confine our attention to closing the loopholes.

We all appreciate the change of attitude in the agricultural community and the Government's appreciation of the stresses and strains between that community and the environmental lobby. Clearly, there is a basic incompatibility between the two interests. Successive Governments have pursued the objective of food production in a way that has inevitably led to the expenditure of public funds on schemes that we now regard as environmentally damaging or even disastrous. I believe that the public, too, recognise that incompatibility between MAFF and the Department of the Environment.

The consensus also depends on greater public awareness and there is now far greater public interest in the countryside and environmental issues than there was 15 or 20 years ago. There is also, especially in my native Wales, a general realisation that unless action is taken quickly to close loopholes and prevent abuses there will be precious little left to conserve.

As a result of serious damage, Wales has lost seven SSSIs since 1981. Details of the damage were given in a parliamentary answer to me on 22 January. Gwent has lost 67 per cent. of its natural broadleaved woodland because of the operations of the Forestry Commission, individual landowners and agriculture. The predations of the Forestry Commission have affected broadleaved woodlands especially in upland areas, with the loss of some 200,000 hectares since 1946. That reservoir of flora and fauna is important not just scientifically but for the enjoyment of the wider community, but in the past 30 years south Wales has lost about 50 per cent. of its moorland and upland.

For those reasons, I especially welcome clauses 2, 4 and 6, which block the loopholes. Those clauses are widely welcomed, although I suspect that clause 1 will be somewhat contentious. I understand that clause 1 may provoke objections from some Conservative Members for two reasons. The hon. and learned Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyell) referred to the Bill changing a time-honoured principle in that the burden of proof would be on the defendant to prove his innocence, although my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields has said that that is not necessarily so. In this context, I refer to some of the evidence on badger digging. I cannot for the life of me understand a law which allows the acquittal of individuals caught at a badger sett with terriers, spades and transporting equipment. Many prosecutions have failed because the defendants claimed that they were searching for a terrier down a rabbit hole. My hon. Friend the Member for South Shields referred to one such case.

This is a grey area, and I realise that some reservations exist because we may be impinging on the rights of the fox-hunting fraternity. In other cases, individuals take along a live or dead fox or fox cub, and if they are caught they say, "We are digging for foxes, not for badgers". As someone who is reasonably familiar with the countryside and who knows the difference between a fox hole, a rabbit hole and a badger's sett, I cannot accept that anyone who lives in the countryside would not know the difference. Those familiar with the countryside will know the location and characteristics of a badger's sett, and we cannot believe those who claim that they are in pursuit of foxes.

This loophole must be closed because there can be no question of innocence, and we must make no concessions to those who go badger hunting. In this case, the term "country sport" is offensive. Badger hunting is not a sport or a pastime that can be endorsed. It is one of the most barbaric of human activities. No one can claim to be a country lover if he engages in the sort of activities that we know are carried out by badger diggers. We must make no concessions. It is a vile, cruel and barbaric practice. It inevitably leads to the death of badgers and to the horrifying mutilation or death of terriers, and it must lead to the brutalisation and degradation of those involved in it. We must pursue vigorously all attempts to close the loophole.

Those involved in badger digging are invariably involved in other crimes, such as trespass and theft. In many cases, if they cannot find badgers to torment, they become involved, through disreputable organisations, in the pitting of terrier against terrier. Such practices must be stamped out in any way possible, and clause 1 will help to block the loophole. The loophole was not inherent in the 1981 Act, but has been created by those who wish to get round the Act. I ask Conservative Members to accept that the loophole has been created by those individuals. No one can have any complaints if the House says that the loophole should be closed by making it clear that anyone who is in pursuit of badgers, without reasonable cause, is deemed to be guilty. All the evidence will show that he is.

I realise that some objections will come from those associated with fox hunting. It is a matter of regret to me that people are still allowed, with the full blessing of the law, to find their enjoyment on Tuesdays, Thursdays or Saturdays in killing animals for fun. That is the be-all and the end-all of the argument about fox hunting. But the Bill is not about the outlawing of fox hunting, although some Conservative Members have reservations about clause 1 because of its association with that activity. They believe that a tightening of the law in relation to badger digging will impinge on their rights as fox hunters.

I draw their attention to a letter from the Under-Secretary of State at the Home Office relating to the proposed amendments:

"What we think may work is something on the lines of making it an offence under the Badgers Act to permit a dog to enter the underground retreat of any wild animal other than a badger when it is known, or should be known, that a badger may be encountered. We do not think this will interfere with hunt servants."

Some of us may wish to interfere with the activities of hunt servants, but the Bill will not. Conservative Members should think about the opprobrium that they will bring upon themselves if they oppose this tightening of the law on badger digging as a defence of their sport of fox hunting. They will do their cause a great deal of harm, and they will be guilty by association.

There is much good will for the Bill on both sides of the House. I know that there are reservations about it, but I hope that the House will give it a Second Reading.

10.35 am

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): I am glad to follow the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies). As a member of the Nature Conservancy Council, I can tell him that the input from Wales is first class and most important to our work.

The hon. Gentleman overestimates the objections to clause 1. Indeed, he is pushing at an open door. All of us want as much protection as possible for the badger; it is simply a matter of getting the wording of the clause right, which I am sure can be achieved in Committee.

I support the Bill of the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) and congratulate him on taking the opportunity obtained through the ballot to introduce this legislation. I hope that the Bill receives a Second Reading and that we can add to it in Committee.

I was much involved in the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, and I believe that it is still too early to judge the success of the Act. However, it is fair to say that it has brought new attitudes to conservation. It has been the only major legislation in about 15 years, with the exception of some valuable private legislation introduced by the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy), and it helped to focus opinion on important issues of habitat conservation and the encouragement of wildlife. The voluntary organisations appreciate that fact, although I sometimes wish that they would be more encouraging and complimentary about the Act, bearing in mind the important objectives that I am sure it will achieve in the long run.

Too often I read about the Act failing and the Nature Conservancy Council having no money. That is not true. No site of special scientific interest has been damaged through lack of money, and the Government have made it abundantly clear that money is available for management agreements or purchases. This year, the additional £7 million from the Department of the Environment was greatly welcomed by the NCC. It will enable us to accelerate our efforts on notification and renotification.

The NCC is enthusiastic about the Bill as it relates to section 28 of the original Act. It has been realised for some time now, and it was highlighted by my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi) in the Select Committee, that a stop power during consultations had been omitted. That is corrected in the Bill, although in a complicated piece of drafting, and I hope that it will achieve what it sets out to do.

We must accept that relatively few owners of sites of special scientific interest have damaged their properties during the consultation period, but every loophole that we can close must be closed to prevent this from happening again. Some owners believe that the notification of an SSSI means complete sterilisation. Of course it does not. Many operations are allowed within an SSSI, provided that they do not damage the scientific reason for the designation. That is when management agreements can be and usually are of mutual benefit. We are making great progress in changing attitudes towards sites of special scientific interest. Many landowners now feel proud that their estates have SSSIs and make great efforts to look after them. However, there are a few irresponsible landowners, and the proposed amendment to the Act should close the loophole. For that reason, I hope that the measure will be enacted soon. Like other hon. Members, I regret that this is not a Government Bill. We all recognise the fragility of private Members' Bills in regard to time and amendment.

I wish that the hon. Member for South Shields had seen fit to limit his Bill to the one significant point that concerns most hon. Members, and had drafted the long title accordingly, so that discussion on parts I and III of the original Act would be avoided. Had he done so, I would gladly have accepted his decision. From practical experience, we know that legislation on the countryside and the heritage is relatively rare. Therefore, whenever we have the opportunity to introduce valuable amendments it should be accepted.

[Sir Hector Monro]

I strongly support clause 1 in regard to the protection of badgers. As I said to the hon. Member for Caerphilly, I think that he is creating concern where none exists, but we must get the wording right. That can be dealt with in Committee.

The words in the explanatory memorandum with regard to clause 1 cause some concern, as the clause requires the proof of innocence rather than guilt. It is a matter of concern in regard not only to badger digging but to any legislation. I am sure that that aspect will be dealt with in Committee. I am keen to ensure that badgers are not molested in any way, and I welcome the opportunity to visit setts near my home.

Speaking for myself and not as a member of the NCC, I am glad that the Bill provides the opportunity to correct a failure in the 1981 Act to implement the wishes of this House and its own declared policy. I spoke on the subject at some length in Committee and on Report when I was the Minister in charge of the original Bill. In this respect I know that I have the support of my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr). If we had a guiding principle on bird protection and quarry species, we should have stuck to it. The principle was that birds remain on the quarry list unless the NCC specifically recommends their removal for conservation reasons. In another place, the curlew and redshank were removed from the list, but they were put back on it in Standing Committee in line with Government policy. That position remained on Report. However, during the spillover Session in October 1981, the Lords reinstated the provision. Unfortunately, because the Government — of which I was then no longer a member—said that they had not time to deal with Lords amendments, they accepted the position and failed to fulfil their duty of maintaining the policy and judgment of this House. It was a rather miserable procedural defeat.

My hon. Friend the Minister can put the matter right with an amendment in Committee. To do otherwise would involve a U-turn on policy. There is no conservation reason for the removal of curlew from the quarry list. There are hundreds of thousands of curlew and redshank, and the NCC advice of 1980-81 still stands. The facts can be argued in detail in Committee.

With regard to the Brent goose, the chairman of the NCC in the 1950s—Sir Arthur Duncan, who died a few months ago—made it clear, when the Brent goose was protected, that it would be back on the quarry list when the numbers became substantial again. That position had almost been reached in 1980-81, and it has now been reached. Therefore, Sir Arthur's undertaking should be implemented.

There should be a much more flexible approach in the schedules to movement of species, as seems appropriate to the NCC. The world population of the Brent goose is between 180,000 and 200,000, and probably 85,000 or more are in Britain. Wildfowling is a traditional sport and the Brent goose is becoming a great pest to farmers. Therefore, a return to the quarry list should be considered. It is interesting to note that the population of the Brent goose now exceeds that of the grey goose, on which there is at present a full open season.

I have never seen so many barnacles as there have been in the Solway this winter. Consequently, there has been considerable agitation by the farming community. If the barnacle could be removed from the protected list, it would remove a great deal of aggravation and unhappiness on the island of Islay.

We should consider the arrangements for the cold weather ban. I support the ban, but almost invariably we seem to get the dates wrong. That causes great unhappiness among wildfowlers.

The British Association for Shooting and Conservation, the British Field Sports Society and other bodies, including farmers, play a great part in protecting the habitat of birds, and their rights and interests have to be considered together with other shades of opinion. It is totally unacceptable that saboteurs and others should take action against country sports. They should receive short shrift from the police and the law.

There are vast numbers of stock doves. They were put on the protected list as a result of misunderstanding in the Ministry. There is no conservation, and many of them are shot, together with pigeons. The shooting should be made legal again.

There was no provision in the original Act for marine nature reserves. The provision was put in in another place because the Government foresaw certain difficulties. The NCC has found the establishment of marine nature reserves to be very complicated. I fear that the provision in the Bill may make the consultative processes marginally more difficult. There are many interests involved — fishermen, water sports, recreation bodies and landowners on the shore line. There is no point in trying to short-circuit those interests by legislation. We should take people's rights and interests into consideration and try to proceed by agreement.

I note with interest the new responsibilities that are to be placed on agriculture and forestry.

Dr. David Clark: Although the hon. Member is a very respected member of the NCC, I do not think that he is speaking for the council in regard to marine nature reserves. I have a letter from the council in which it says that it supports the proposed new clauses and welcomes the possibility of the Minister taking overriding decisions. The NCC's official position is that it supports the clause dealing with marine nature reserves. However, I know that the hon. Gentleman made it clear that he was speaking for himself.

Sir Hector Monro: Yes, I made it clear, after I referred to section 28 of the principal Act, that I was speaking for myself. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will be the first to accept that, as the Bill appeared only on Monday, the NCC has not had an opportunity to look at it. I am aware of the views of our experienced officials and, I am sure, the chairman. The point that I am seeking to highlight is that we shall not necessarily make it easier to obtain marine nature reserves by following a legal process rather than consultation.

My hon. Friend the Minister of State is not here at the moment but it would be fair to say that, following the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food had the greatest conversion since St. Paul to nature conservation and the improvement of the habitat. Now, having been converted, as so often happens, it is proceeding with tremendous zeal, and I am delighted at that. The appointment of experienced officials and the promotion of conservation through the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service is good news. It has all been made so much easier for the Ministry of Agriculture by the splendid lead given by the National Farmers Unions of England, Wales and Scotland and the farming and wildlife advisory groups. The Stanton survey in Suffolk is a fine example of what is being done.

All that is a great plus for the movement towards greater understanding of conservation, led now not only by the voluntary groups which have played such an important part, but also by the farmers, the country landowners and others.

I too am particularly pleased that there is emphasis now on the Forestry Commission. I welcome the commission's recent appointment of Dr. Morton Boyd, who used to be the director of the NCC in Scotland, to advise it on conservation. I hope that all the private forestry groups will make a particular effort to play their part along with the Forestry Commission in the promotion of countryside conservation and wildlife. I encourage all private groups and the Forestry Commission to go and see the Economic Forestry Group's headquarters at Eskdalemuir in my constituency, where it runs the most splendid operation to the benefit of wildlife. We must look after pests and predators if we want to promote wildlife, and foresters in the commission and in private groups, other than the EFG, have not played their full part.

Far too many people tend to underplay our achievements in recent years in the attitude to wildlife and the countryside, and over-emphasise our failures. There is much good in between. The biggest "but" is the future profitability of farming. As incomes decrease, so will the input to conservation. Therefore, we must look at the broad picture of a profitable agriculture and a great swell of enthusiasm for wildlife in the countryside throughout the nation.

The Select Committee's recommendations are excellent. I support nearly all of them. I hope that we shall have an opportunity to have a full debate on those recommendations, and, in particular, to go into the issue of the rural estate, a matter which I have tried to promote in the House for many years.

My final word is a wish for harmony. I wish the Bill success, but there will need to be some give and take. The Government, the voluntary bodies and the public will have to accept some compromises if we are to get the Bill through, as I wish. That is not complacency but a fact of life and practical politics. We must look at the matter in broad terms. I particularly hope that the amended section 28 goes through as it stands and I am sure that in that way we shall prevent unnecessary damage to SSSIs.

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): I want, sincerely and warmly, to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark). He is undertaking a task with which all of us would agree. He is trying to bring about real protection for the badger. I was pleased that he said he would be prepared to look at any amendments, because we must make illegal what is happening in the so-called sport of badger baiting, and we must ensure that we close all the loopholes so that we finally get rid of that practice in the same way as we have to a great extent got rid of cock fighting, although some still takes place, and bull baiting.

It is wrong that this measure should be a private Member's Bill. It should, as other hon. Members have said, be a Government measure. To describe badger baiting as a sport is something that I cannot understand. It is a barbaric practice and I cannot understand what kind of people partake in it. Yet much of it takes place in the north-west, some even in the urban areas there.

I saw a video film of badger baiting which the Sunday People had obtained from those who had partaken in such baiting. The League Against Cruel Sports showed it to me, and it is believed that the action took place in an urban area in Liverpool. The badger had been taken from its sett and was then attacked, not by one, but by countless dogs, which continued to attack it. As one terrier got tired another was put in, and at one point an alsation was used. That went on for hours. It is beyond belief how anybody could not only witness such an act but film it and then show it to clubs to get a wider audience. To hear those creatures laughing at the distress, pain and suffering that they were causing to that defenceless animal is something which, as hon. Members, we must ensure does not occur again.

We have all had a large postbag on this subject. Only this week I had a letter from a lady in west Wales, who said:

> "Only this week a trial took place in Haverfordwest of five men who carried out the most horrific cruelty on a badger, which included breaking the badger's back with a spade to make things easier for the dogs."

We are beginning to try to frame measures against that kind of background.

The real difficulty, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) referred, is to prove that people are going after badgers. Their defence has always been that they are digging for foxes. In 1984 the police brought a prosecution at Retford. They failed to establish the fact that the defendants were digging for badgers rather than foxes and, as I understand it, the police have not brought another prosecution. A private prosecution was painstakingly brought at great length and expense by the Derbyshire Naturalists Trust. I think that that is the only case that has been successful, because of the difficulty of establishing the fact that it is badgers rather than foxes that are being dug for.

After seeing the film, an all-party delegation went with the League Against Cruel Sports to see the Home Secretary. It may be of some comfort to my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields to know that two categorical statements were made at that time. The Home Secretary said:

> "We are entirely sympathetic with your objections to badger baiting."

Secondly, perhaps more importantly, he said:

> "If it is possible to stop badger baiting in a way that would not affect legitimate hunting, I think your proposals would have Government support."

That is what we are asking for this morning — Government support.

We are always up against the sacred cow of this so-called other sport called fox hunting, which I do not describe as a sport at all. I fail to understand how anybody can think that it is a sport to chance a defenceless animal such as a fox. Nevertheless, we were told that if the Bill did not affect legitimate hunting, it would have Government support.

We do not want my hon. Friend's Bill to go by the board because it runs up against opposition from the fox hunting fraternity. That is the difficulty that we must overcome. My hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly is right. There is a great distinction between a fox hole and a badger sett. However, members of the fox hunting fraternity might chase a fox into a badger sett and then put a terrier in, which I believe should be considered illegal and they should face the consequences.

Already voices have been raised in dissent because if we were to accept the Bill clause 1 would place the onus of proof upon the defence to prove that those people were not digging for foxes. I think that that is absolutely right. However, I hope that my hon. Friend will take on board

---

It being Eleven o'clock, MR. SPEAKER, interrupted the proceedings, pursuant to Standing Order No. 5 (Friday sittings).

Business of the House

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a short business statement.

Following discussions through the usual channels, the draft Regional Transport (Levy) Order 1985, which was not moved yesterday, will now be taken on Tuesday 12 February.

That day's business will now be as follows:

Transport Bill, Second Reading, followed by related money and Ways and Means resolutions

Motion on the draft Regional Transport (Levy) Order 1985.

A motion relating to the Housing Benefits (Amendment) (No. 4) Regulations 1984 will now follow proceedings on the Representation of the People Bill on Wednesday 13 February.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I thank the Leader of the House for accommodating the housing benefit regulations debate, which is on a prayer tabled by my right hon. and hon. Friends. Wednesday will be the proper time not only for that debate but for the first day of the two-day debate on the Representation of the People Bill. I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Will the Leader of the House pay attention to the fact that the change of business was necessitated by virtually all yesterday being taken up with discussion on Ministers sailing close to or across the margins of the law? Will he draw it to the attention of the Prime Minister, who has views on and expertise in the matter, particularly so that she might draw it to the attention of her next-door neighbour at No. 11, the Chancellor of the Exchequer?

Mr. Biffen: While I could not for one moment accept the premise of that request, I shall see that the request is passed on.

Sir John Farr (Harborough): Will my right hon. Friend make it clear that two days will still be devoted next week to the Representation of the People Bill?

Mr. Biffen: Yes, Sir.

Wildlife and Countryside (Amendment) Bill

Question again proposed, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

Mr. Hoyle: I should like amendments to be tabled to the Bill to ensure that no dog is put into a sett, or even a foxhole if necessary. I realise that that would not be acceptable to the Conservative party or the fox-hunting interests represented by Conservative Members. However, I should like to suggest an alternative, which my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields might support. I emphasise that clause 1, amending the Act, was suggested to him by the Home Office. These people are guilty of trespass. Will my hon. Friend consider making an amendment so that they could be found guilty of trespass unless they had received permission from the landowner to go on the land?

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I should like to correct the hon. Gentleman. Unfortunately, there is no criminal law against trespass. It is a civil offence, which can be proceeded with only by the landowner himself, and the only penalty is for damages done by the trespasser. I welcome the hon. Gentleman's apparent concern to see that a criminal law on trespass is introduced.

Mr. Hoyle: I was trying to get over the difficulty that I see even now with what my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields is doing. The police might be reluctant, if the onus is on the defence, to bring any prosecutions unless people are found in possession of a badger that is dead, alive or injured. I was trying to find a way round the difficulty and to prevent the sett being entered and the badger being attacked. I hope that there is a way round the problem.

Those concerned always say that they have permission to do what they are doing. I realise that there is a difficulty in relation to the law on trespass, and that at the moment it is a civil offence and the penalty is only for damage done. All that I am asking for is the opportunity to prove that such people are acting illegally in being at or near the sett. In that way we might overcome some of the difficulties and prevent the injury or death of a badger.

I welcome my hon. Friend's Bill. He deserves the gratitude of all hon. Members. I am pleased that he will consider amending it. Perhaps we can find amendments that will give greater protection to the badger. As my hon. Friends have said, we believe that the Act is too weak, and we shall do all that we can to assist my hon. Friend in what he is trying to do, which is once and for all to get rid of people who think that it is a sport to bait a defenceless animal.

11.6 am

Sir John Farr (Harborough): I am anxious to welcome the Bill promoted so effectively and clinically by the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark). I unreservedly welcome some parts of it more than others. Before I address myself to its contents, most of which I admire, I should like to refer to what was said by the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies). He suggested that there is always a clear distinction between a badger's sett and a fox's earth. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will take my word for it that that is completely wrong. Many dwellings are in multi-occupation. In Northamptonshire, where I live, there are setts and earths on our land, not far from Northampton, that today are occupied by both badgers and foxes, sometimes exclusively by badgers. The local conservation society was so keen that it placed ladders on trees so that people could film the badger family, with all the antics of the badger cubs at night. It is a large sett, and two years ago it was taken over by foxes. Now, two years later, it is in multi-possession, with the families of both foxes and badgers in the dwelling. Therefore, it is impossible to say that one hole or another is occupied by a fox or a badger or that no rabbits are in the same complex.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): I am aware of the hon. Gentleman's knowledge of the fox and the badger. However, does he accept that the sett that he is talking about is likely to be of considerable antiquity, and the badgers will have carried out excavations for many human as well as badger generations? The sett is likely to be so large that it can accommodate both fox and badger. I know setts that accommodate both, but does not the hon. Gentleman accept that it is highly unlikely that the badger will occupy the same part of the sett as the fox? I believe that he could tell the difference between the part of the sett occupied by the badger and the part occupied by the fox.

Sir John Farr: I should like to get on with my speech. I was merely saying that in most cases that I know of—I could take hon. Members to quite a few setts—there is multi-occupation, and unless one is a real expert, a Sherlock Holmes, on one's hands and knees with a magnifying glass looking for hairs, it is impossible to tell which animal is in occupation at any time.

Mr. Ron Davies: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir John Farr: I should like to get on with my speech. I shall come back to clause 1 in a moment, but I should like to deal with some other important aspects of the Bill. I especially want to congratulate the hon. Member for South Shields on choosing this subject. Clause 2 is badly needed and I congratulate him on his initiative.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro), who is a member of the Nature Conservancy Council, said that it may be too early to evaluate the effectiveness of the 1981 Act. I know that that is also the view of the chairman of the council, who says that parts of that mammoth Act, which was put on the statute book largely through the good work of my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries, are imperfect, but that it would be best to wait for at least five years before implementing any major restructuring or surgery on that legislation.

I welcome clause 2 and I would give the Bill more support if it were merely a one-clause measure. There is nothing to be gained by putting too many clauses into a private Member's Bill. I have initiated a number of such Bills, but I was successful only with the Deer Act in 1982. I had to cut that from 23 clauses to four before I could get it through.

I hope that the hon. Member for South Shields will understand that hon. Members on both sides of the House unreservedly wish him well with clause 2, but he could be in trouble on other clauses.

Dr. David Clark: The NCC is on record as supporting clause 2, but it has also said:

> "The NCC welcomes the extension of the duty to 'further' nature conservation proposed for MAFF and the similar new duty on the Forestry Commission."

It says of the marine nature reserves:

> "We welcome also the possibility of Ministers taking overriding decisions."

Those are the official views of the NCC, but I note the point made by the hon. Gentleman.

Sir John Farr: I am grateful for that helpful intervention. The NCC undoubtedly welcomes the hon. Gentleman's initiative in promoting the Bill, but the chairman told me in public at a meeting here on Wednesday that he thought that the 1981 Act should not be restructured for a few years because of its complexity.

There is no doubt that section 28 of the 1981 Act has proved to be inadequate, and the sooner that we can get on to the statute book the amendment set out in clause 2, the better. There was much debate in Committee when the 1981 legislation was going through the House about whether the structure in section 28 was sufficient to protect SSSIs. The Standing Committee in 1981 intended to set up a structure for countryside management till the turn of the century, based not on compulsion or direction, but on guidance on how best to run the countryside in the national interest.

Parts of the 1981 Act are imperfect and may need some muscle put into them in due course. Originally, the Government looked for co-operation rather than coercion, and they were right to do so.

Although the exploitation of the three-month loophole has not been widespread, the cases that have occurred have been significant. I understand that since the 1981 Act came into effect, only about 20 notified SSSIs have suffered damage, and most of that was accidental. By June last year, more than 160 management agreements had been signed and about 600 such agreements are being negotiated. There are a potential 5,300 SSSIs, so the percentage of sites that have been damaged is minute. Nevertheless, the House will welcome the resolute way in which the hon. Member for South Shields has dealt with the problem in clause 2.

Clause 3 deals with marine nature reserves. I remember the excitement of my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries and other Ministers when we established the concept of marine nature reserves in the 1981 Act. It met with the approval of conservationists, scientists, biologists and everyone else. My hon. Friend was careful throughout to avoid compulsion, and some of the original drafts of the 1981 Bill were restructured many times so that we could bring along with us people living near marine conservation areas.

There are no marine nature reserves in operation, but can the House be sure that three years is an adequate time in which to ensure co-operation on such a new concept as marine nature reserves? Is the House also sure that the hon. Member for South Shields is right to give power to the Secretary of State to override local objections?

How can a marine nature reserve work effectively without the willing co-operation of local fishermen and others? Is it not the duty of hon. Members to protect the rights and interests of individuals? The safeguards may be cumbersome, but they exist to protect the rights of individuals and it would be wrong for us to take short cuts and sweep away those rights. It is too soon to introduce the measures proposed in clause 3.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: What sort of time scale does my hon. Friend envisage before compulsion should be introduced?

Sir John Farr: I understood from my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries when he was piloting the 1981 measure through the House that there was to be no compulsion. We do not want compulsion in the management of our countryside. We do not want compulsion in the operation of marine nature reserves. If there are objections from local people in the vicinity of marine nature reserves it would be better to iron them out by Ministers and others visiting the area to see how the views of local people could be accommodated.

Clause 4 imposes new responsibilities on the Minister of Agriculture. I am not quite sure what is covered here because the Minister already has a statutory duty to further conservation.

Mention has been made of what is known as the FWAGs—the farm wildlife advisory groups. The farm wildlife advisory groups system has become widespread since the passing of the 1981 Act. When the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 was passed, I had never heard of these advisory groups, but they are now established as a network. They have been pushed, paid for and promoted by the National Farmers Union and the Country Landowners Association hand in hand, and they are available to give free advice to all farmers and others engaged in agriculture to improve the conservation of the land with which they are associated.

The hon. Member for South Shields may not be aware of it, but every two months, through the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service, the Ministry produces a booklet which is sent free of charge to all those engaged in farming. The last three or four have contained page after page explaining how a farmer can sensibly utilise a spare bit of land in the interests of conservation. With the purpose of making Britain more beautiful, odd corners of agricultural land which are not in full production can be turned into little reservoirs for water life or into small plantations or coppices — however tiny they are. Although grant money is not available, free advice, free help and the guidance of the plans in these booklets are available to all those engaged in agriculture. That has been a new and welcome feature of ADAS advice to farmers in the last two or three years.

I do not recall that these very helpful articles on conservation appeared before the passing of the 1981 Act, but they have since and they have played a major role in making those engaged in agriculture very conscious of the need to try to make the best use from the conservation point of view of spare corners on their farms.

Our Minister has been pressing in Brussels for a provision in EEC legislation allowing the promotion of farming systems in environmentally sensitive areas which are especially helpful to conservation. Recent important changes in our capital grants system have also had an emphasis on the promotion of conservation.

The hon. Member for South Shields has drafted clause 4 in such a way that it places too much emphasis on the duties of the Minister of Agriculture to promote conservation. First and foremost, a farmer's duty is to try to make his farm pay. He has to try to make it profitable. In recent times our farmers have experienced extraordinary difficulty, especially those in some of the hill areas and in the parts of the country where milk production is concentrated. Some of them are in real financial difficulty. The main job of the Minister must be to help farmers in all parts of the country to get through this period of financial uncertainty — not knowing where the next market is coming from or where tomorrow's crop is to be marketed—rather than our giving him the prime duty of promoting conservation. Long before the passage of the original Act, conservation was in the responsible hands of the farmer, and he has not made a bad job of it. He has made Britain's landscape and countryside the envy of the world.

Clause 5 deals with maps. This again is an innovation introduced by the hon. Member for South Shields. However, it is too soon, and I think that it would be very costly. As I understand it, there is nothing in the present law to prevent most of the items suggested in clause 5 being put into operation. In my view, this provision could be dispensed with and we should concentrate on the very necessary clause 2.

Clause 6 deals with the Forestry Commission. Again I think that this is a very sweeping step to take so soon after the passage of the original Act. The Forestry Commission is well aware of its major role in promoting conservation. It has already piloted many successful schemes with an emphasis on conservation rather than on production. No one is more aware of the unsatisfactory nature of purely softwood plantations than the Forestry Commission. It is now encouraging landowners and others to engage in broadleaved and softwood plantations, with special emphasis on the former which are attractive and which get a bigger planting grant from the commission.

As for clause 1, of course everyone in the House respects the badger. At the moment, his greatest enemy is the Minister of Agriculture, who is engaged in his TB eradication scheme in the south-west. I understand that he is persisting with this scheme despite expert reports that it is probably of little value in eliminating bovine TB. I hope that my hon. Friend will have a chance to reconsider the scheme in the south-west and whether it is necessary to continue it with its present ferocity.

The explanatory memorandum places the onus of proof on the person digging. I am sure that the House supports the hon. Member for South Shields in what he is trying to do, but this is the wrong way of going about it. There is no recognition in clause 1 of the fact that a badger does not live alone. As I explained earlier, he may share a sett with a fox or even with rabbits.

Funnily enough, in October and November of last year I received a communication from the Thurnby and Bushby society in my constituency about illegal badger digging. It wrote to me in October alleging that badger digging was going on in Leicestershire and asking me to see what could be done to stop it. It also urged me to support the Bill.

I first wrote to the chief constable of Leicestershire asking how prevalent this had been in recent times in the county and whether he thought that the existing law was adequate for the police to deal with people suspected of badger digging.

The chief constable replied on 31 October saying that he had had only one case in the county of alleged badger digging and that it had been denied by the youths involved. In response to my question about whether the existing powers in law were sufficient for the police to prosecute, he said that he thought they were. He wrote:

"I agree that the present law provides the police with sufficient powers of search and arrest . . . I must accept that a police officer who is not familiar with the provisions of the Badgers Act may advise a complainant to take civil action for trespass."

Judging by our experience in Leicestershire, there is little or no justification for clause 1.

I support what my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries said about the quarry list. He reminded me of how the curlew and redshank escaped that list. In 1981, it was the intention of the House and the Committee to keep them on the quarry list, but due to parliamentary procedure and the lack of time for considering Lords amendments, those two birds were lost as quarries. My hon. Friend also built up a very convincing case with regard to the shooting of Brent and barnacle geese. There is every reason for putting them on the quarry list now. In some parts of the country they are prolific, because there has been a population explosion, and they are doing a good deal of agricultural damage to some areas. However, we did not put forward statistical evidence earlier because we, too, felt that three years was perhaps too short a time for there to be a meaningful change in events since 1981.

Dr. David Clark: I do not want the House to go down that path, because it is outside our control. Unfortunately, barnacle and Brent geese are protected under EEC directive 79/409. The Government cannot alter that without abrogating the treaty of Rome. Those who voted for the Common Market are responsible.

Sir John Farr: Unfortunately, the hon. Gentleman has got it wrong again. Indeed, about the only part of the Bill that I unreservedly welcome is clause 2. The hon. Gentleman had got that 100 per cent. right, and if he concentrates on that I wish him the best of luck.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. Several more hon. Members wish to speak, and I remind the House that long speeches are made only at the expense of other hon. Members' time.

11.31 am

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): In an article on Wednesday 30 January, Martin Linton of The Guardian wrote:

"The entire bill does, however, enjoy the support of the National Farmers' Union and the Country Landowners' Association as well as the 30 largest conservation groups."

I have just listened to the hon. Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr), who is a farmer, and I wonder whether the NFU's support for the Bill enjoys his support. One wonders, because he seemed to disagree with the Bill in many respects.

I assume that it is true when the article says:

"Ministers have long ago acknowledged that its 1981 measure has a number of defects but it has refused to bring forward its own amending bill, offering, instead, to back a private member's bill."

I wonder whether the Government's support is solid, but that will be revealed later.

Obviously, we would love to have Tory support for the Bill, which does its best to plug certain loopholes. I do not know the technical details about badgers, foxes and so on, which are a little above my head. Nevertheless, I have listened with interest to the debate and have learnt a great deal. I want to protect the countryside and our wildlife. I have been a lifelong rambler and have a passion for preserving the countryside, so I should like to comment on the Bill.

The hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) made clear his reservations. I want to speak about clause 4—not the Clause IV that I have often mentioned, but clause 4 of the Bill. It embodies some of the things which I should particularly like to see happen.

The Wildlife and Countryside Bill, as it was, had my enthusiastic support, probably because of its title. I thought that we finally had something that would defend the countryside and our wildlife. That Act has many good aspects to it, but, probably due to omission rather than commission, it had many major loopholes which led me to believe that certain provisions were anti-wildlife and anti-countryside. My fears were confirmed some years ago when I made a rare train journey from King's Cross to Edinburgh. I had not made that journey for some years. Although I often go to Edinburgh, I usually go from Sheffield and use a different line.

As the train left London, I was appalled at some of the things that I had never noticed before. I usually ramble in Derbyshire — mainly based on Bakewell — and south

[Mr. Martin Flannery]

Yorkshire, and such things had not really begun to happen there. Until that railway journey, I had not noticed something which probably most other hon. Members had seen. Following what I saw, I asked a few supplementary questions and tabled one or two other questions, but I received no support from Conservative Members. Sadly, there were howls of abuse when I said, coining an expression, that I was appalled at the prairieisation of the countryside. I remember that my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) said, "That's a new word to me." I said, "Well, Jim, it reminded me of the Canadian prairies when I looked out of the window." I realised that the rape of the countryside was beginning, and I started to take notice. Since then, many hon. Members on both sides of the House have begun to worry about it.

Clause 4 has the backing of the first report from the Select Committee. I am not a member of that Committee, but the third recommendation states:

"Conservation should be given a greatly increased priority in the training and work of ADAS staff, with increased formal guidance from MAFF on conservation objectives."

Clause 4 commends itself to me. Indeed, I hope that it commends itself, along with the rest of the Bill, to Conservative Members. It states:

"In the exercise of such of his functions as relate to agriculture and forestry, the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food shall, in so far as its consistent with his statutory duties, further the conservation and enhancement of the natural beauty and amenity of the countryside".

There are then certain suggestions.

The prairieisation of our countryside made me consider other aspects. I often go rambling in moorland areas. In our area we have one of the many ad hoc committees which have sprung up as a result of the loopholes in the Wildlife and Countryside Act. We have a Sheffield campaign for access to moorlands. There are many moors in Yorkshire, and as I walked along one day I suddenly realised that I was witnessing fields which I had never seen before, and that the heavy new earth-moving equipment which can move boulders, and so on, with which we had had trouble hitherto now enabled local farmers to carve new fields out of the countryside. Of course, we had no say in that, because there was nothing to stop them doing it.

Then I saw a couple of programmes on the television. In one programme there were 20 or 30 farmers, and three or four conservationists were asking them questions. I am sad to say that not one farmer did other than defend the 1981 Act and call himself a conservationist. The conservationists questioned the farmers, but the voices of the conservationists were overwhelmed by those of a number of farmers trying to interrupt, all of whom were making vast amounts of money as grain producers.

On another programme we heard farmers saying that if someone was a grain or cereal farmer and owned more than 300 acres he was automatically a millionaire. They pointed out that nothing like that had ever occurred before. This was due to the immense grants, many of which were made before these moves to deprive the countryside. The NFU's support for the Bill is welcome, because it shows that the union realises the impact of the attacks on the countryside with the removal of hedges, ditches and walls. When one is out rambling, the noise of the chain saw is heard almost all the time. Trees are cut down, and tree stumps are left scattered around the countryside.

The fact that a great organisation like the NFU—which boasts that its people are at the House every day and that it has never lobbied for any measure which it has not finally achieved—is on our side means that the NFU realises, as we do, that lasting damage will be done to nature if the union does not protect the countryside and join us in supporting Bills such as this. In the long run, agriculture will be injured if prairieisation continues. People from the towns and from all over the country have offered help with this measure. The mailbags of Members of Parliament show how many people are deeply worried about the need to preserve the countryside. We welcome the help of farmers in this struggle.

Clauses 4 and 6 apply to the Forestry Commission. Deciduous trees are being destroyed on a large scale. Afforestation and reafforestation with conifers is occurring in areas where those trees do not grow naturally. Conifers en masse are dark and gloomy and militate against the beauty of the countryside. I note that some Conservative Members are nodding in agreement. They are as aware of this aspect as are many people who love the countryside.

We are not struggling against moves to produce food in the countryside, nor are we opposed to a good life for the farming community. I point out, however, that little of the money gained from the land finds its way into the pockets of the agricultural workers on those farms. That aspect must be considered, and anyone who disagrees should provide evidence to show that the money does find its way to those workers.

There is immense support for the Bill. I am one of those who have not taken a technical interest in matters involving the countryside, but I believe that my voice represents those of millions of people who, without technical data or knowledge, have seen what is happening in the countryside and want to investigate. They include organisations such as the Ramblers Association and local rambling clubs which are intimately connected with the countryside, whose friends are often farmers and farm workers and who will note what is happening in this minor, but important, debate. It is my dearest wish that the Conservative party will give strength to our elbow with this small measure and help us to make this legislation a real Wildlife and Countryside Bill, which we shall amend if we find further loopholes.

Mr. Nicholas Lyell (Mid-Bedfordshire): It is not all that often that I have an opportunity to fulfil the dearest wish of the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery), but I am glad to give my strong support to the Bill. I congratulate the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) on the balanced way in which he promoted the Bill. He has emphasised that his objective is to improve the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981. That is the right way to put it, because the benefits already conferred by that Act have often been unstated and people have not publicly recognised those achievements sufficiently.

I speak with confidence because I represent a number of interests and wear a number of hats. I am glad to speak for the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, which has its headquarters in my constituency; it has gone out of its way not to run down the existing legislation but to point to the way in which it can be improved. I speak also for the many millions of people who enjoy legitimate country sports and whose help is so much needed in promoting conservation. I speak as a small member of the NFU who has just a few acres. I join hon. Members in welcoming the fact that the Bill has the strong support of the NFU and the Country Landowners Association.

I emphasise conservation and habitat. No fewer than 5 million people take part in country sports which depend upon a good habitat for wildlife in our rivers, on our moorlands and over all our countryside. Their support for and keen interest in something that they enjoy is one of the safeguards of a secure future that we all wish to achieve for the habitats of flora and fauna.

Clause 2 contains the Bill's central objective. I believe that all hon. Members agree that it is high time we closed the three-months loophole. The Bill does so with the Government's strong support. I am confident that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will confirm that strongly. The RSPB asks whether the terms on which that loophole is being closed will also achieve what are sometimes referred to as the "stop" powers which have been thought to be necessary in respect of section 29 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act. My hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi), with his great knowledge about this matter, asked whether it would be effective. No doubt my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will provide some guidance.
